Where a sentence was imposed of fine and imprisonment, and the only legal penalty was fine or imprisonment, it was held in Ex parte Davis, 112 Fed. 139, that the prisoner would not be discharged on habeas corpus before he had either paid the fine or suffered the imprisonment. The excessiveness of the sentence was conceded, and it was said that the prisoner might be remanded to the lower court for proper sen- 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

for the release of a prisoner upon application for a writ of habeas corpus. Freeman, Judgm. 4th ed. § 620; Ex parte Siebold, 100 U. S. 371, 25 L. ed. 717.

The particular phase of the question here raised—i. e., that there was no arraignment of the defendants—does not seem to have been passed upon by any court of last resort, save that of the supreme court of Indiana, which court held, in the case of Winslow v. Green, 155 Ind. 368, 58 N. E. 259, that, where one has been tried and convicted in the superior court, he will not be released by habeas corpus because he was not arraigned and did not plead in such court, since, as such errors do not go to the jurisdiction of the court, its judgment is not subject to collateral tence, or he might be allowed to elect whether he would pay the fine or suffer the imprisonment; but since in this case part of the imprisonment has been served, the latter course was adopted.

And in Reese v. Olsen, — Utah, —, 139 Pac. 941, where the court had power to impose a fine and imprisonment, but illegally imposed also a sentence of imprisonment until the fine was paid, it was held that until the prisoner had served the legal term of imprisonment imposed as a penalty for the offense, he would not be released on habeas corpus.

To a similar effect is Ex parte Ellerd, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 158 S. W. 1145, where, for a contempt for which the court was authorized to impose a fine not exceeding $100, a fine of $250 was imposed, and the party committed until payment of the fine and costs, it being held that the judgment, although excessive as to the amount of the fine, was not void, and a discharge would not be granted on habeas corpus until the petitioner had showed payment of $100 and costs.

Where a legal sentence of eighteen months could have been imposed, and the prisoner had not yet served that length of time under a sentence of three years, the court in DeBara v. United States, 40 C. C. A. 194, 99 Fed. 942, in refusing to discharge the prisoner under a writ of habeas corpus, said that "it is true that the cases wherein the writ has been denied because a part only of the sentence was within the power of the court to impose have generally been those in which the judgment was of a clearly separable nature, as for costs and imprisonment, where there was power only to impose the one or the other. We see no reason why the rule should be limited to such cases, and think the true principle to be that, before a prisoner can be discharged upon habeas corpus, it must appear that he is serving by virtue of a judgment which the court had no power to impose. As long as he is serving an imprisonment within the limits of a term which the court might lawfully impose, acting within its power and jurisdiction, he cannot be discharged attack. In that case, as in the case now under consideration, it was not denied that the court had jurisdiction both of the subject-matter and the person of the defendant.

Our territorial supreme court, in the case of Re Peraltareavis, 8 N. M. 27, 41 Pac. 538, following Ex parte Siebold, supra, said: "That the only ground on which that court [United States Supreme Court], or any court, without special statute authority, will give relief on habeas corpus, is where there is want of jurisdiction over the person or the cause, or some other matter rendering the proceedings void, as distinguished from what is merely erroneous and reversible."

Our habeas corpus statute was adopted on habeas corpus, no matter how irregular or erroneous the judgment may be."

But in O'Brien v. McClaughry, 209 Fed. 816, it was held that under the Federal parole law, providing that a prisoner might be released on parole after he had served one third of the total of the term or terms for which he was sentenced, one who was confined in the United States Penitentiary under sentences of five and three years respectively, for burglary of and larceny from a postoffice, the latter sentence being illegal, was entitled to a discharge from the illegal sentence on habeas corpus, although he had not completed the burglary sentence. The prisoner was, however, remanded as to the latter sentence. The court approved DeBara v. United States, supra, but distinguished it from this case because the former was decided before the passage of the Federal parole law. It was said that ordinarily the law will on habeas corpus grant no release to a prisoner under the circumstances of this case, until he has served the larger sentence imposed on the two counts, if that is within the power of the court to impose; that the ground of the decisions so holding was doubtless in part that, where a prisoner is held under a sentence lawfully imposed, the question as to whether he was lawfully or unlawfully held upon another sentence was a mere moot question. But as applied to the facts of this case, it was said: "We cannot conceive that the second sentence against the petitioner, utterly void as it was and is, should be used to defer his right to apply for a parole, . . . and, while fully convinced that the rule would be otherwise in the absence of the parole law, this case is reversed and remanded, with directions to the district court to discharge the petitioner from the custody of the defendant [the warden of the penitentiary] as to the charge of larceny, but to remand him upon the charge of breaking into a postoffice."

Where a justice of the peace exceeded his jurisdiction in imposing a sentence of nine months imprisonment, it was held in Re Kenney, 147 Mich. 678, 111 N. W. 189, that, 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

prior to the rendition of the opinion on the Peraltareavis Case, and was doubtless carefully considered by the court at that time. We do not concede that the failure of the record, in this case, to show affirmatively an arraignment of the defendants, is a jurisdictional defect that would render void the judgment in the case and subject it to collateral attack. It has been held that, as to jurisdictional questions, a judgment under which the prisoner is held is aided by the same presumptions as in other cases of collateral assault. If the record is silent as to jurisdictional facts, jurisdiction is presumed. Freeman, Judgm. § 619; Ex parte Ah Men, 77 Cal. 198, 11 Am. St. Rep. 263, 19 Pac. 380.

In concluding our discussion upon this on petition for writ of habeas corpus, a discharge would not be granted, since the petitioner had not served the punishment, three months, which the justice was authorized to impose, a statute providing that whenever, in a criminal case before a justice of the peace, the defendant is adjudged guilty and punishment imposed in excess of that allowed by law, the judgment shall be valid and effectual to the extent of the lawful penalty, and be reversed only as to the excess.

In Re Groves, 83 Kan. 238, 109 Pac. 1087, where a sentence of imprisonment was imposed until certain payments were made and the costs paid, it was held on application for writ of habeas corpus that the petitioner would not be discharged even if the court had no authority to imprison for failure to pay the costs, since he had failed also to make the payments.

Where, in addition to imprisonment as punishment for the offense, the defendant was sentenced to confinement for payment of costs at the rate of 40 cents per day, instead of at the authorized rate of 75 cents per day, but had not, at the time of application for release on habeas corpus, served such term as, estimated at the latter rate, would satisfy the costs, it was held in Ex parte Smith, 1 Ala. App. 535, 56 So. 247, that the petitioner was not entitled to discharge.

Where, in default of giving a bond to keep the peace and paying of costs, the defendant was committed to jail, and the order as to the commitment for costs was illegal, it was held in State ex rel. Babin v. Foster, 109 La. 587, 33 So. 611, that the defendant should not be released unconditionally on habeas corpus, but should be released only on furnishing the bond, and that on writ of certiorari to a judge who had granted an unconditional release, the judgment would be ordered modified accordingly.

d. Discharged, proper sentence having been served.

Under the following circumstances, subject, we desire to observe that it is not contended by the petitioners that no arraignment was had; but their contention is entirely based upon the failure of the record to disclose the fact of arraignment.

The further contention of petitioners respecting defects in the complaint and impropriety of holding that the prosecution was had under ordinance No. 135 of the city of Raton, when the complaint was originally made under ordinance No. 133, are likewise collateral attacks upon the judgment of the justice court, which cannot now be entertained in this proceeding for the reason given.

of the defendants to sixty days in the county jail and to pay a fine of $25 and costs was excessive and beyond the power of the court to impose. The ordinance upon which the judgment was based provides: "Sec. 3. Any person violating any provisions of this ordinance shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be fined in a sum of not exceeding $25, or by imprisonment in the county jail for a period not exceeding sixty days."

It is urged by the petitioners that our statute is substantially the same as the statutes of Idaho and Missouri, and that our statute was adopted from the Missouri statute after it had been construed by the supreme court of that state in the prisoners having served legal sentences, where the sentences imposed were excessive, were discharged on habeas corpus:

—where imprisonment for costs at the rate of 40 cents per day was imposed, instead of at the authorized rate of 75 cents per day, and the defendant had served such term, estimated at the latter rate, as would satisfy the costs. Ex parte Haley, 1 Ala. App. 628, 56 So. 245;

—where the defendant was erroneously sentenced to hard labor for costs, and had served the sentence properly imposed as punishment for the crime. Ex parte Hill, 122 Ala. 114, 26 So. 230;

—where imprisonment for nonpayment of a fine was unauthorized and the term of imprisonment imposed as punishment for the offense had been served. Cruz v. Director of Prisons, 17 Philippine, 269;

—where, after conviction and sentence for ten years for assault with intent to commit murder, the defendant was convicted and sentenced for five years for burglary, and the court erroneously made the latter sentence cumulative, the prisoner having served the ten year term. Ex parte Morton, 132 Cal. 346, 64 Pac. 469;

—where, for an offense for which the maximum sentence was thirty days imprisonment, a sentence of six months was imposed, the defendant having served thirty days. Ex parte McClure, 6 Okla. Crim. Rep. 241, 118 Pac. 591;

—where, for a crime for which the legal punishment was imprisonment in the county jail not more than one year, or a fine not exceeding $500, the defendant was sentenced to the state prison for a term of from two and a half to eight years, of which he had served more than four years. Re Bolden, 159 Mich. 629, 124 N. W. 548;

—where a single sentence for a term in excess of the period specified by statute for a single offense, upon conviction of separate crimes charged in several counts of the indictment, was void as to the excess, although the sentence was for a less term than the court might have imposed as cumulative sentences. United States v. 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Peake, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 314, 82 C. C. A. 340, 153 Fed. 166, affirming 144 Fed. 1016.

The rule that one who has served the legal penalty may be released on habeas corpus from service of an excess sentence was approved in Re Holley, 154 N. C. 163, 69 S. E. 872, although it was held in that case by a majority of the court, that the sentence in question was not excessive. This rule was approved although a statute provided that the writ of habeas corpus should be denied where it appeared that the petitioner was detained by virtue of the judgment of a "competent tribunal."

In Munson v. McClaughry, 42 L.R.A. (N.S.) 302, 117 C. C. A. 180, 198 Fed. 72, one who had served a sentence for burglary of a postoffice building with intent to commit larceny was discharged on habeas corpus from a sentence for larceny, which, as a part of the same criminal act, it was held the court had no power to impose. To the same effect is Halligan v. Wayne, 102 C. C. A. 410, 179 Fed. 112, where under similar circumstances the prisoner was discharged.

But in Moyer v. Anderson, 122 C. C. A. 175, 203 Fed. 881, it was said that in the two cases last cited no question was presented as to the propriety of the writ of habeas corpus as a remedy, but that in each case its appropriateness was assumed, and it was conceded also that the burglary and larceny were parts of one and the same transaction. It was accordingly held in the Moyer Case that the prisoner, who had been convicted on separate counts of burglary from a postoffice building, with attempt to commit larceny, and larceny committed on the same date, would not be released on habeas corpus, although he had served the sentence for burglary. It was said that the petitioner upon his trial could have interposed the defense that the larceny was merged in the burglary charge, or vice versa, and, having failed to do so, and the record not sufficiently showing that the two crimes were committed at the same time and place, he could not reserve this defense for presentation on habeas corpus; that the trial court had jurisdiction to determine case of Ex parte Page, 49 Mo. 201. We are not convinced of the correctness of this contention, though there is great similarity between the statutes. The facts involved in the Missouri case, however, are not the same as those with which we are now concerned.

This case being similar to that of Ex parte Mooney, 26 W. Va. 36, 53 Am. Rep. 59, from the opinion therein we desire to quote at length with approval: "It is insisted, however, that, as the court had no legal right under the statute to sentence the petitioner both to confinement in the penitentiary and to pay a fine, it exceeded its jurisdiction, and thereby the whole proceeding became illegal and void. In support of this view the cases of Ex parte

Page, supra; Rex v. Ellis, 5 Barn. & C. 395, and Rex v. Bourne, 7 Ad. & El. 58, are relied on by counsel for petitioner. The two latter cases were decided upon writs of error by the court of King's bench, and by reason of the peculiar constitution of that court, the determination of such cases by it have no analogy to the proceeding by habeas corpus in our courts. I do not, therefore, regard those cases as authority in this case. The other case, from Missouri, was in some respects different from the one before us. In that case the extreme limit which the court could inflict as a punishment for grand larceny was fixed by statute at seven years' confinement in the penitentiary; but the court sentenced the petitioner to such confinement whether the petitioner was guilty of both defenses, and its decision could be questioned only by means of a writ of error, and not by a writ of habeas corpus.

And in Re Spencer, 228 U. S. 652, 57 L. ed. 1010, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 709, it was held that one under sentence by the state court to a fine and imprisonment for not less than eighteen months, nor more than two years, who had paid the fine and served less than six months of the sentence, would not be discharged on habeas corpus, on the ground that the law authorizing the imposition of such a sentence was ex post facto, the law in force at the time of the commission of the crime admitting only of punishment by imprisonment for a term of not less than six months, nor more than two years, where an unsuccessful application for a writ of habeas corpus had been made to the United States district court, and the question of the constitutionality of the statute was not raised in the trial court, nor on appeal to the superior court of the state, nor on an unsuccessful petition to the state supreme court, which had power to review and modify the judgment, to allow an appeal from the superior court. The decision apparently is not placed upon the ground that the sentence was valid at least as to the six months, and that the petitioner would not be released prior to the expiration of that time, but upon the ground that habeas corpus was not the proper remedy; but that the efficient and orderly course to obtain relief was through the state tribunals, which had power to grant relief, and whose decision on the constitutional question could have been reviewed by the United States Supreme Court.

But in Stevens v. McClaughry, — C. C. A. —, 207 Fed. 18, where a sentence of five years imprisonment was imposed for stealing from a United States mail car a letter pouch containing registered mail, and also an additional sentence of five years imprisonment for larceny of mail matter was illegally imposed, the crimes not being distinct offenses capable of separate sentences, it was held that, after having served the first term of imprisonment, the defendant §1 L.R.A.(N.S.) was entitled to release on habeas corpus; and the rule was laid down that he was not barred from such relief by the fact that he might have obtained it by writ of error, but failed to do so until it was too late.

IV. Effect on appeal or on writ of error.

Supplementing 45 L.R.A. 150.

In State v. Huggins, 84 N. J. L. 254, 87 Atl. 630, it was said that formerly in England and in New Jersey an excessive sentence rendered the judgment illegal, and called for a reversal for want of power in the higher court either to correct the sentence or remand the case to the lower court for that purpose; but that, to remedy this defect, it was provided by statute that whenever a final judgment in a criminal case was reversed on account of error in the sentence, the court making the reversal might remand the case for proper judgment, or might render such judgment therein as should have been rendered in the lower court. It was accordingly held in this case, where a maximum sentence of thirty years was imposed instead of the legal maximum of fifteen years, that the prosecutor might elect as to the form of relief to correct the sentence.

In State v. Arbruzino, 67 W. Va. 534, 68 S. E. 269, the rule was laid down in the headnote by the court that "if the error complained of be that the final judgment is in excess of the verdict, it is matter of record and may be reviewed on writ of error, without any formal exception being taken to the action of the trial court."

b. Sentence reversed, prisoner discharged.

Where, for a crime the maximum penalty for which was a fine of $50, a fine of $100 was imposed, and the defendant sentenced in default of payment to imprisonment, it was held in Derby v. State, 24 Ohio C. C. 304, that the judgment would be reversed, and as the time had passed for the profor that crime for ten years. The court on habeas corpus held that the trial court by that sentence had exceeded its jurisdiction, and therefore under the provisions of the statute of that state the petitioner was discharged. The statute referred to declared that when a prisoner is brought up on habeas corpus, if it appear that he is in custody by virtue of process from any court or judicial officer, he can be discharged only in one of the following cases: 'First, where the jurisdiction of such court or officer has been exceeded, either as to matter, place, sum, or person. . . . Sixth, where the process is not authorized by any judgment, order, or decree, nor by any provision of law.' Wagner's Stat. 690, § 35. The judge who delivered the opinion of the court, after quoting said statute, says: 'It seems to me that the court in passing the sentence exceeded its jurisdiction in the matter, and that it did not act by authority of any provision of law. This application, therefore, I think comes within the meaning of the statute.' 49 Mo. 292. It seems clear from the opinion that the court decided that case under the influence of the statute; and consequently it can be no precedent, and can have no application in a state like ours, where no such statute exists. But if that case could be regarded as decided upon principle, it must be disapproved, since it is not only contrary to the general rules hereinbefore stated, but it is in positive conflict with numerous other and seemingly better con-nouncing of sentence by the lower court, and its jurisdiction to pronounce sentence was lost, the defendant must be discharged.

Derby v. State, supra, was, however, overruled in Yocheim v. State, 31 Ohio C. C. 430, where the rule was laid down that, upon reversal by the court of common pleas for error in the sentence alone, and remand for resentencing, the lower court had authority to resentence, even though the time had elapsed after the trial within which judgment must be rendered.

c. Prisoner discharged, legal sentence having been served.

Supplementing 45 L.R.A. 152.

In Galeo v. State, 107 Me. 474, 78 Atl. 867, where a plea of guilty was entered, and the prisoner had suffered all the punishment that could legally have been imposed upon him for the offense committed, he was discharged on appeal.

In Com. v. Fetterman, 26 Pa. Super. Ct. 569, where an excessive sentence was imposed, it was said that the error might be corrected on appeal by reversing the judgment and remitting the record for proper sentence, or the appellate court might modify the judgment by passing proper sentence. The latter form of remedy was in this instance adopted, it being held that, where a prisoner had been sentenced to the penitentiary for a year and a half at solitary confinement at labor, and the only punishment which could legally be imposed was confinement in the county jail, the prisoner, who had served eleven months in the penitentiary, should be discharged, as the term served was adequate punishment for the offense.

Under statute providing that on appeal the appellate court might, in cases where an erroneous judgment had been entered upon a lawful verdict, correct the judgment, it was held in People v. Scheuren, 148 App. Div. 324, 132 N. Y. Supp. 1025, that one who had been convicted of a misdemeanor and sentenced as for a felony to not less than three nor more than five and one-half years imprisonment, and had 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) served over a year in the state prison under the erroneous judgment, would be discharged on appeal. It was said that the proper procedure under the statute would be to direct that the defendant be brought before the court for judgment on his conviction; but as the defendant had served already over a year, an additional sentence would not be imposed, but the judgment would be reversed and the prisoner discharged.

d. Sentence corrected or modified.

In some instances, instead of remanding the case to the lower court for resentencing, where the sentence was excessive, the appellate court has corrected the sentence, usually stating that as modified the judgment is affirmed. Statutes giving the courts authority to modify a judgment or sentence on appeal in some of the cases, but in others no reference is made to particular statutory power.

In Jackson v. United States, 42 C. C. A. 452, 102 Fed. 473, it was said that the courts are not entirely uniform as to the particular manner in which the correction of a sentence shall be made,—whether by the court imposing the sentence or by the appellate court; that the difference seemed to depend upon the particular way in which the question was raised, whether by habeas corpus or by writ of error; but that the rule that the sentence might be corrected in the appellate court should be applied especially in a case like the one in question, where the prisoner was confined in a prison remote from the place of sentence, and to take him back for modification of the sentence would incur great expense without any benefit to him.

In State v. Wisniewski, 13 N. D. 649, 102 N. W. 883, 3 Ann. Cas. 907, it was said that the power to modify a judgment, as authorized by statute, would not be exercised in a case involving the discretion of the trial court as to the sentence, where its judgment as to the punishment had not been indicated; but in this instance, where sidered decisions of courts of other states. Re Petty, 22 Kan. 477; Ex parte Parks, 93 U. S. 18, 23 L. ed. 787; People ex rel. Woolf v. Jacobs, 66 N. Y. 9; People ex rel. Tweed v. Liscomb, 60 N. Y. 559, 19 Am. Rep. 211; People ex rel. Trainor v. Baker, 89 N. Y. 460."

As pointed out in this opinion (Ex parte Mooney) the sentence under consideration by the Missouri Case was not severable, while in the Mooney Case, nine and imprisonment having been imposed, and one or the other being in excess of the statutory provision, it was held that the sentence was void as to the excess only, the sentence being severable. In the Idaho case, Ex parte Cox, 3 Idaho, 530, 95 Am. St. Rep. 29, 32 Pac. 197, a judgment imposed a sentence of five years for violation of an Idaho statute, when the statute in question authorized a maximum penalty of two years. This case is similar to the Missouri case of Ex parte Page, which was cited by the Idaho supreme court with approval.

In a later case, Ex parte Crenshaw, 80 Mo. 447, where the court exceeded the limit of punishment in imposing a fine of $500, the supreme court held: "Notwithstanding these errors in the proceeding of the court, we cannot discharge the prisoner, since the order for his commitment, until he shall have obeyed the order to restore the goods, was a legitimate exercise of the power of the court. Neither this nor any other court can, on a petition for habeas corpus, disan additional penalty of 200 days imprisonment was imposed for non-payment of a fine, instead of the legal penalty of six months, it was clear that the court would have imposed an additional sentence of six months, if the provision of the statute had not been overlooked. Accordingly, the additional sentence was reduced to six months.

In Jones v. State, — Okla. Crim. Rep. —, 137 Pac. 121, the court said regarding its power to reduce an alleged excessive sentence: "While this court has the power to modify a judgment and reduce a sentence inflicted by the jury or trial court, this power cannot be arbitrarily used, but can only be exercised where it appears from the record that an injustice has been done in assessing the punishment."

In Haynes v. United States, 42 C. C. A. 34, 101 Fed. 817, where the court erroneously added to a sentence of imprisonment the words "at hard labor," and designated the penitentiary instead of a county jail as the place of imprisonment, it was held on appeal that the appellate court might either correct the sentence or remit the record to the trial court for modification by eliminating the excessive part, and that in this instance the latter method would be adopted, because the appellate court did not have sufficient information to enable it to designate a suitable jail or other place of imprisonment in lieu of the penitentiary.

In State v. Van Waters, 38 Wash. 358, 78 Pac. 897, it was said that the sentence in question of twenty-one years seemed unnecessarily severe, and would have been reduced to five years if within the recognized powers of the court. But the court said that its investigation led it to doubt its authority to reduce or modify a sentence within the discretion of the trial court to impose, and the apparent excessiveness was mentioned in order that the prisoner might be aided thereby in application to the pardoning power for clemency after he had served a reasonable time.

Under the following circumstances it has been held that the appellate court would modify an excessive sentence or judgment: 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

—where the words "at hard labor" were erroneously included in a sentence of imprisonment, and the prisoner was confined in a prison remote from the place of sentence. Jackson v. United States, 42 C. C. A. 452, 102 Fed. 473;

—where imprisonment in the penitentiary at hard labor in default of payment of a fine was erroneously imposed instead of confinement in the county jail. Thompson v. State, 52 Fla. 113, 41 So. 899;

—where, in a conviction for second degree murder, the sentence was fixed by the verdict, but the court erroneously sentenced the defendant to an additional term at hard labor for costs. Weaver v. State, 1 Ala. App. 48, 55 So. 956, rehearing on other points denied in 2 Ala. App. 98, 56 So. 749;

—where the defendant was sentenced to a certain term at hard labor to pay costs at the rate of 40 cents per day, and, the statute fixing this rate having been declared unconstitutional, the judgment was corrected so as to require service for an additional term estimated under statute at the rate of 75 cents per day. Martin v. State, 1 Ala. App. 215, 56 So. 3; Crandall v. State, 2 Ala. App. 112, 56 So. 873;

—where a sentence of 294 days imprisonment in default of payment of fine and costs was reduced to six months, the legal maximum. State v. Stevens, 19 N. D. 249, 123 N. W. 888;

—where a sentence imposing imprisonment for a certain term, for assault, also imposed a fine, and erroneously directed additional imprisonment in default of payment of the fine, the judgment being modified by striking out that part directing imprisonment upon failure to pay the fine. People v. Kerr, 15 Cal. App. 273, 114 Pac. 534;

—where, after a verdict fixing the punishment as imprisonment, the court erroneously also imposed a fine. Shields v. People, 132 Ill. App. 109;

—where, in addition to payment of a fine, the court erroneously added a sentence of imprisonment. Johnson v. State, — Miss. —, 26 So. 967; charge the prisoner for a mere irregularity in the proceedings. It must be for an illegality which renders the commitment void. Hurd, Habeas Corpus, 327. Here the court had jurisdiction, and the imprisonment of the petitioner until he should comply with the order of the court was warranted by law. After he shall have restored the goods, the prisoner will be entitled to his discharge, the other requirements of the judgment being nullities. Feeley's Case, 12 Cush. 598; People v. Markham, 7 Cal. 208."

The great weight of authority is that, where a court has jurisdiction of the person and the offense, the imposition of a sentence in excess of what the law permits does not render the legal or authorized portion of the sentence void, but only leaves such portion in excess open to question and attack. Re Taylor, 7 S. D. 382, 45 L.R.A. 136, 64 N. W. 253, 58 Am. St. Rep. 843. See also authorities collected in note.

Counsel for petitioners contends that this rule is not applicable to the present case, because the judgment is not separable. In this he is mistaken, as the judgment here is separable. The principle is better stated, in its entirety, in the following language: A sentence is legal so far as it —where the court erroneously added to a sentence of life imprisonment for second degree murder, a provision that the defendant be disfranchised and rendered incapable of holding any office of trust for a period of ten years, the erroneous portion being ordered stricken out of the sentence. Dorsey v. State, — Ind. —, 100 N. E. 369;

—where, on a verdict for assault with intent to commit robbery, fixing the punishment at two years imprisonment, a judgment was entered for assault with intent to murder. Hernandez v. State, 60 Tex. Crim. Rep. 382, 131 S. W. 1091;

—where a verdict and judgment showed conviction for burglary, but the sentence was for assault with intent to commit murder, an order being made that the sentence be modified so as to show a sentence for burglary. Gradington v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 155 S. W. 210;

—where a sentence for one day imprisonment and the payment of a fine of $100 for an offense for which the legal penalty was a fine of from $10 to $50 was modified by striking out the imprisonment and reducing the fine to $50. Diamond v. State, 123 Tenn. 348, 131 N. W. 666;

—where the court included in a judgment a sentence of infamy for a crime which did not carry with it such punishment. Griffin v. State, 109 Tenn. 17, 70 S. W. 61;

—where, unless assessed by jury, a fine exceeding $50 was not authorized, and the court erroneously imposed a fine of $100, the fine being reduced to $50 and the judgment as modified affirmed, although the penalty for the offense in question was a fine of not less than fifty nor more than two hundred dollars. Shoun v. State, 111 Tenn. 166, 78 S. W. 91;

—where, for an offense for which the penalty was from $10 to $100, but under statute a fine exceeding $50 could not be assessed except by jury, the court erroneously assessed a fine of $100, it being held that the judgment was valid to the extent of $50 only. Madden v. State, — Tenn. —, 67 S. W. 74;

—where a sentence was imposed of a fine of $10 and confinement for six months, and the punishment authorized was a fine of not less than $10 nor more than $200, the 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

judgment being modified by striking out the imprisonment. Pressly v. State, 114 Tenn. 534, 69 L.R.A. 291, 108 Am. St. Rep. 921, 86 S. W. 378;

—where sentences were imposed for burglary and for larceny, although the two alleged crimes were not distinct offenses for which separate punishments could be imposed, it being held that the defendant should be released from the judgment for larceny. Cronan v. State, 113 Tenn. 539, 82 S. W. 477;

—where the sentence of two of the defendants was reduced from the extreme penalty of ten years imprisonment to seven years, it appearing that a third defendant was sentenced only for the latter term, and there was nothing in the evidence to indicate that he was less guilty. Keeler v. State, 73 Neb. 441, 103 N. W. 64;

—where a sentence of five years imprisonment for felonious shooting was regarded as excessive, there being mitigating circumstances, and was reduced on appeal to two years. Krause v. State, 88 Neb. 473, 129 N. W. 1020, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 736;

—where a sentence to the penitentiary for an indefinite term for burglary committed with intent to steal property worth $3.50 was reduced to nine months in jail, the time already served in the penitentiary being applied on the jail sentence. State v. Rogers, — Iowa, —, 137 N. W. 819;

—where the amount of a fine for contempt of a surety on a bond, for falsely representing his financial ability, was reduced to the amount recovered in an action upon the bond. Buffalo Loan, Trust & S. D. Co. v. Medina Gas & E. L. Co. 68 App. Div. 414, 74 N. Y. Supp. 486;

—where sentence was imposed under a statute admitting of a different and larger penalty than the statute applicable to the offense. Wechsler v. United States, 86 C. C. A. 37, 158 Fed. 579; Fletcher v. United States, 42 App. D. C. 8 (judgment being reversed and cause remanded for proper sentence as to all the defendants, although only those who had received a sentence in excess of that permitted by the statute applicable to the case raised the question of the illegality of the sentence).

The same remedy, correction of excessive sentence in the appellate court, has been is within the provisions of law and the jurisdiction of the court over the person and the offense, and only void as to the excess, when such excess is separable and may be dealt with without disturbing the valid portion of the sentence. United States v. Pridgeon, 153 U. S. 48, 38 L. ed. 631, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 746; State ex rel. Dudoussat v. Klock, 48 La. Ann. 67, 55 Am. St. Rep. 259, 18 So. 957; Ex parte Mooney, 28 W. Va. 36, 53 Am. Rep. 59.

It is our conclusion that the sentence in this case is separable, and that, had petitioners paid the fine or suffered the imprisonment, they would be entitled to the writ; but, having done neither, they are not entitled to release. In Ex parte Lange, 18 Wall. 163, 21 L. ed. 872, it was held that "the error of the court in imposing the two punishments mentioned in the statute, when it had only the alternative of one of them, did not make the judgment wholly void." In that case the petitioner, before applying for a writ of habeas corpus, had paid the fine imposed. He was discharged.

For the reasons given, the writ is denied.

Roberts, Ch. J., and Parker, J., concur.

applied under the following circumstances, in cases in which express reference is made to the statutory power of the court to modify or correct a sentence on appeal:

—where a sentence of twenty-five years imprisonment for a crime the maximum legal punishment for which was five years was reduced to the latter term. Williams v. State, — Okla. Crim. Rep. —, 136 Pac. 599;

—where a sentence of ten years imposed by the jury under erroneous instructions that the punishment for the crime was from ten to twenty years, the legal penalty being from five to ten years, was reduced to five years. Arnold v. State, — Okla. Crim. Rep. —, 132 Pac. 1123;

—where a sentence was imposed of a fine of $50, and in case of nonpayment of imprisonment for 100 days, the legal penalty for failure to pay a fine being imprisonment not to exceed one day for every dollar of the fine; and, although defendant had paid the fine, the sentence was corrected as to the term of imprisonment. People v. Jeratino, 62 Misc. 587, 116 N. Y. Supp. 1121;

—where the judgment erroneously recited that the defendant had been convicted of the crime charged in the first instead of the second degree. Sayers v. State, — Okla. Crim. Rep. —, 135 Pac. 944;

—where the verdict and judgment showed that the punishment was fixed at two years confinement in the penitentiary, but the sentence erroneously recited that the punishment had been assessed by the verdict at confinement for five years. Laudermilk v. State, 47 Tex. Crim. Rep. 427, 83 S. W. 1107;

—where the verdict assessed the punishment at a fine of $25 and twenty days imprisonment, but through inadvertence of the clerk the judgment assessed a fine of $100 and costs. Byrd v. State, 51 Tex. Crim. Rep. 539, 103 S. W. 863;

—where the defendant entered a plea of guilty to grand larceny as a first offense, and, it having been shown to the trial court by defendant's answers that he had been previously convicted of crime and sentenced to state prison, judgment was erroneously entered as for a fourth offense. People v. Bretton, 144 App. Div. 282, 129 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

N. Y. Supp. 247, motion for reargument denied in 158 App. Div. 904, 141 N. Y. Supp. 4, motion in arrest of judgment denied in 157 App. Div. 341, 142 N. Y. Supp. 256; —where a sentence of ten years imprisonment for a crime for which the jury had assessed the punishment at five years was reduced to the latter term. Martinez v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 153 S. W. 886;

—where the court reduced a sentence of capital punishment for murder, which it regarded as excessive, to life imprisonment. Fritz v. State, 8 Okla. Crim. Rep. 342, 128 Pac. 170;

—where a sentence of imprisonment in the penitentiary for a year for aggravated assault was regarded as excessive, and was reduced to confinement in the county jail for a period of thirty days. Kilgore v. State, — Okla. Crim. Rep. —, 137 Pac. 364;

—where a judgment of $50 for assault, regarded as excessive, was reduced to $10. Hooper v. State, 7 Okla. Crim. Rep. 43, 121 Pac. 1087;

—where a sentence of the maximum penalty of six months in jail and a fine of $500 imposed upon a negro boy for a first offense in selling whisky, the sale being induced by a detective, was reduced to imprisonment of sixty days and a fine of $100, although the jury had recommended the maximum punishment. Hall v. State, 7 Okla. Crim. Rep. 126, 122 Pac. 729;

—where the sentence of a boy of sixteen to confinement in jail for six months for stealing chickens was reduced to two months. People v. Loomis, 65 Misc. 166, 121 N. Y. Supp. 91;

—where a sentence of seven years imprisonment for larceny of a stray steer worth $20 was reduced to two years. Palmer v. State, 70 Neb. 136, 97 N. W. 235;

—where a sentence of five years imprisonment for larceny of property worth $40 was reduced to two and one half years. Junod v. State, 73 Neb. 208, 119 Am. St. Rep. 800, 102 N. W. 462.

In State v. Maher, 25 Nev. 465, 62 Pac. 236, it was said, regarding a contention that a judgment should be reversed because the court included as a part of the sentence "at hard labor," that if the claim were correct, the court could under statute modify the judgment by striking therefrom the unauthorized part.

In Williams v. State, 66 Ark. 264, 50 S. W. 517, where the jury erroneously assessed the punishment by a "quotient verdict" at five years, and the minimum for the crime in question was three years, the court modified the judgment by reducing the punishment to the latter term.

Also, in Walker v. State, 91 Ark. 497, 121 S. W. 925, where, after a finding of guilty of murder in the second degree, the jury erroneously assessed the punishment by lot at seventeen years imprisonment, the judgment was modified by reducing the sentence to five years, which was the minimum punishment for the crime.

In State v. Harness, 11 Idaho, 122, 80 Pac. 1129, it was said that where the evidence supports the verdict the judgment will not be reversed on the ground that the sentence is excessive, but the remedy is by way of modification of the judgment.

In several instances the court has modified excessive judgments and affirmed the judgment as modified, with directions to the lower court to impose proper sentence. State v. Stone, 40 Mont. 88, 105 Pac. 89 (where a judgment erroneously included payment of costs as a part of the penalty); Screen v. State, 107 Ga. 715, 33 S. E. 393 (where a sentence of imprisonment or work on a chain gang was either excessive or irregular).

In Re Gompers, 40 App. D. C. 293, on appeal from the supreme court of the District of Columbia, it was held that the appellate court had statutory power to modify excessive judgments, and sentences imposed upon certain labor leaders of one year, nine months, and six months, respectively, for contempt of court for violating an injunction restraining a boycott, were regarded as so grossly excessive under the circumstances that the case was remanded with instructions to the lower court to impose sentences in the one case of imprisonment for thirty days, and in the others of fines of $500.

And in State v. Neil, 13 Idaho, 539, 90 Pac. 860, rehearing denied in 13 Idaho, 554, 91 Pac. 318, the court regarded a sentence of ten years for assault with intent to commit rape as excessive under the circumstances, and remanded the case with directions to impose a sentence of two years.

f. Case remanded for proper judgment.

As will be seen from the cases under this section, the circumstances under which the courts have in some instances remanded cases to the lower court for proper sentence are similar in many instances to those above cited, where other courts have corrected or modified the sentence. Statutory 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

provisions may account in part for this difference in practice, although, as indicated above, reference to particular statutes is not always made in the cases, and in some instances it appears that the appellate court might either have modified the sentence and affirmed the judgment as modified, or remanded the case to the lower court for proper sentence.

Under the following circumstance it was held that the case would be remanded to the lower court for proper sentence, where the sentence imposed was excessive:

—where the court erroneously sentenced the defendant to hard labor in lieu of payment of costs. Lewis v. State, 3 Ala. App. 20, 57 So. 1012;

—where, in a sentence of imprisonment and payment of costs, the court erroneously ordered the defendant committed until payment of costs. Smith v. State, 24 Ohio C. C. 140;

—where, in a verdict for manslaughter, the jury, although authorized to fix the duration of the term, attempted also to fix the place of punishment, the verdict and sentence in accordance therewith being for one year in the penitentiary, but the court was authorized where the term was for one year or less, to sentence only to imprisonment in the county jail, or to hard labor for the county. Ex parte Robinson, — Ala. —, 63 So. 177;

—where the court, although authorized to impose a sentence only as indicated in the above case, erroneously sentenced to imprisonment in the penitentiary for six months. Minto v. State, — Ala. App. —, 64 So. 369;

—where a sentence of one year at hard labor in the penitentiary was imposed, and such imprisonment was legal only when the term exceeded one year. Mitchell v. United State, 116 C. C. A. 436, 196 Fed. 877, petition for writ of certiorari denied in 226 U. S. 611, 57 L. ed. 381, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 218 (However, in this instance, the legal limit of imprisonment for the crime in question was eighteen months);

—where the defendant was sentenced to pay a fine, and on default in payment to confinement in the state prison, and the statute authorized confinement only in the county jail on default in the payment of a fine. Taylor v. State, — Fla. —, 64 So. 454;

—where imprisonment only in the county jail was authorized, when the court imposed a sentence in the penitentiary. Com. v. Barge, 11 Pa. Super. Ct. 164; Com. v. Lewis, 29 Pa. Super. Ct. 282;

—where imprisonment in the workhouse at labor was imposed as part of a sentence, instead of confinement in jail. Arnsman v. State, 30 Ohio C. C. 445;

—where the only penalty authorized was imprisonment in the county jail or fine, and the sentence imposed was imprisonment in the county jail at hard labor. State v. Houghton, 46 Or. 12, 75 Pac. 822;

—where one under twenty-one years of age was sentenced to the penitentiary for life instead of to the state reformatory for an indeterminate period. People v. Rardin, 225 Ill. 9, 99 N. E. 59, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 282;

—where, instead of a sentence to the reformatory for an indeterminate period, the defendant was sentenced to the penitentiary for six years, the case, however, being remanded for a new trial because of other prejudicial errors. Neathery v. People, 227 Ill. 110, 81 N. E. 16; —where the defendant was sentenced to the penitentiary for ten years instead of for an indeterminate period of not less than one year. People v. Coleman, 251 Ill. 497, 96 N. E. 239;

—where, after a verdict fixing the punishment at imprisonment for three years, the court erroneously sentenced the defendant for an indeterminate period under the parole law. People v. Warfield, 172 Ill. App. 1, reversed on other grounds in 261 Ill. 293, 103 N. E. 979;

—where the court, although authorized only to sentence as for a first offense, pronounced sentence as for a second offense. Coeller v. State, 119 Md. 61, 85 Atl. 954; Kenny v. State, — Md. —, 87 Atl. 1109, the judgment, however, being reversed also for other errors; Oaks v. State, 100 Miss. 737, 57 So. 1;

—where a sentence of imprisonment exceeding the maximum was imposed, and the court said that for such an error in the judgment it was authorized under statute to remand the case for proper judgment; but since in this instance there was reversible error in addition to the erroneous sentence, the judgment was reversed and a new trial granted. Cochran v. State, 119 Md. 539, 87 Atl. 400;

—where the defendant was erroneously sentenced under a statute enacted after the commission of the crime, which deprived him of his right under the law previously existing to a deduction of his sentence for good behavior, and a statute required the remanding of cases to the lower court with instructions, where the judgment was reversed, affirmed, or modified. State v. Tyree, 70 Kan. 203, 78 Pac. 525, 3 Ann. Cas. 1020;

—where, for a misdemeanor for which imprisonment for from ten to sixty days only was authorized, a sentence was imposed of imprisonment for two years. State v. Williams, 114 La. 940, 38 So. 686;

—where a sentence was imposed as for another offense than that of which the defendant had been convicted. State v. Hesterly, 178 Mo. 43, 76 S. W. 985;

—where, on a verdict for second degree murder fixing the term of imprisonment at twenty years, judgment was entered as for first degree murder. Lewis v. State, — Ala. App. —, 64 So. 537;

—where a sentence was imposed for an offense greater than that charged in the information and found by the verdict. State v. Mead, 27 S. D. 381, 131 N. W. 305; not exceeding five years, or in jail not exceeding two years, a sentence was imposed of imprisonment in the state prison for not more than seven nor less than six years. Smith v. Com. 178 Mass. 340, 59 N. E. 1019;

—where, although the only authorized penalty was imprisonment in state prison 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

—where a fine of $300 was imposed, although the penalty authorized was a fine not exceeding $200. Carey v. State, 70 Ohio St. 121, 70 N. E. 955; —where imprisonment and fine were imposed, and only imprisonment or fine was authorized. State v. Swikert, 65 Or. 286, 132 Pac. 709;

—where an excessive minimum term was imposed, the legal punishment being a maximum of twenty years and a minimum of not less than six months or more than five years, the sentence imposed being from ten to twenty years. State v. Andrews, 71 Wash. 181, 127 Pac. 1102, —where a sentence of four years was regarded as excessive as to all over eighteen months, and the case was remanded with instructions to modify the judgment by remitting the excess. Hanley v. United States, 59 C. C. A. 153, 123 Fed. 849. But on rehearing in 61 C. C. A. 668, 128 Fed. 944, and 62 C. C. A. 561, 127 Fed. 929, it was held that the sentence was not excessive;

—where, on a conviction for embezzlement, in addition to a fine and imprisonment, the court erroneously sentenced the defendant to pay to the county all money embezzled less the amount he had already paid. Com. v. Shoener, 25 Pa. Super. Ct. 526, reversed on other grounds in 212 Pa. 527, 61 Atl. 1093;

—where the court without authority imposed a sentence of perpetual banishment from the state after five years imprisonment, with a penalty of two additional years imprisonment in case of return to the state. State v. Baker, 58 S. C. 111, 36 S. E. 501, 12 Am. Crim. Rep. 107.

In People v. Farrell, 146 Mich. 264, 109 N. W. 440, it was held by a divided court that a conviction of first degree murder of one who had on a former trial on the same information been convicted of manslaughter should be treated as a valid conviction for manslaughter, and that where, in accordance with the verdict of first degree murder, the court had sentenced the defendant to imprisonment for life, and the maximum sentence for manslaughter was only fifteen years, the trial court had power, although the illegal sentence had been partly executed, to impose a proper sentence; and that for resentencing the case would be remanded to the trial court. Some of the judges took the position that the appellate court should affirm the judgment as to fifteen years imprisonment, the maximum allowed for manslaughter, and reverse the judgment as to the excess, a statute providing that whenever punishment was imposed by imprisonment in excess of that allowed by law, the judgment should not be wholly reversed upon review, but should be valid to the extent of the lawful penalty, and only be reversed as to the excess. But a majority of the court held that this statute was inapplicable, apparently on the ground that the conviction, as well as the sentence, in this instance, was erroneous, although, as indicated, the conviction was upheld as valid for the crime of manslaughter.

g. Judgment reversed and new trial granted.

Supplementing 45 L.R.A. 157.

Where an erroneous instruction that if the defendant was convicted, since he was under eighteen years of age, he would be transferred from the penitentiary to the reform school, might have led the jury, in assessing his punishment for manslaughter at three and a fourth years in the penitentiary, to fix the penalty higher than they would otherwise have done, the court in Pittman v. State, 84 Ark. 292, 105 S. W. 874, reversed the judgment and remanded the case for a new trial, saying that it might follow this course, or it had authority to reduce the punishment to the minimum for manslaughter.

That a sentence is excessive is not ground ordinarily for a new trial. See subdivision II. supra.

h. Judgment reversed, but case not remanded.

Where one under twenty-one years of age was sentenced to the penitentiary for life, when he should have been sentenced to the reformatory for an indeterminate period, the court in People v. Smith, 253 Ill. 283, 97 N. E. 649, said that under the decisions in that state, if the prisoner was then under twenty-one, there was no question but that the judgment should be reversed and the cause remanded to the trial court for re-sentence to the reformatory; but since in this instance the prisoner, while confined in the penitentiary, had become more than twenty-one years of age, it was held that, while the judgment would be reversed, the cause would not be remanded.

To a similar effect is People v. DeGraff, 56 Misc. 429, 107 N. Y. Supp. 1038, where, on appeal from a judgment of a court of special sessions, imposing a fine of $100, although it had jurisdiction only to impose a fine not exceeding $50, it was held that the county court had no power to remit the case for proper sentence, but that the sentence was void and the judgment should be reversed.

i. Miscellaneous.

In State v. Davenport, 149 Iowa, 294, 128 N. W. 351, where it was contended that a sentence of life imprisonment for burglary was excessive, the court, while admitting that the sentence, being for a definite period, was contrary to the indeterminate sentence law, held that the ease was not one for interference by the appellate court, saying that the action of the court in fixing the definite period would not interfere with 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the adjustment of punishment as provided for by the indeterminate sentence law.

Under statutes directing the imposition of sentences notwithstanding exceptions, abolishing criminal terms, and authorizing the court to stay the sentence, it was held in Com. v. O'Brien, 175 Mass. 37, 55 N. E. 466, where the defendant was erroneously sentenced to imprisonment for a term of not less than three nor more than five years, that, after the overruling of exceptions in the appellate court, when the defendant was again brought before the trial court more than a year after the imposition of sentence, it could impose a proper sentence of three years imprisonment, the defendant in the meantime having been admitted to bail and the sentence being wholly unexecuted. To a similar effect, see Com. v. Lobel, 187 Mass. 288, 72 N. E. 977, although in this case the nature of the error in the sentence does not appear.

In Ex parte Phillips, 80 Ark. 200, 96 S. W. 742, it was held that certiorari would not lie to review an alleged excessive sentence, within the legal penalty for the offense, where no sufficient reason appeared for not prosecuting an appeal.

Where a fine was imposed and the defendant sentenced to work on the streets for thirty days in default of payment, it was contended in Brown v. Atlanta, 123 Ga. 497, 51 S. E. 507, in a petition for certiorari, that the alternative sentence to labor was illegal; but it was held that since it appeared the fine had been paid, the petition should be dismissed.

In Johnson v. Atlanta, 6 Ga. App. 779, 65 S. E. 810, it was held that the superior court had statutory power to modify a judgment on certiorari, and an alleged unauthorized sentence of labor in default of payment of a fine was changed to imprisonment.

In Cole v. State, 2 Ga. App. 738, 59 S. E. 24, the court said that it had no jurisdiction to review a sentence imposed in a criminal case, on the ground that it was excessive, if within the limits set by statute; but in this instance a sentence to the chain gang for four months or a fine of $40, when it appeared to the appellate court that a fine of $1 would have been ample, if not excessive, was regarded as so disproportionate to the offense that, on appeal from the superior court, which had refused a petition for certiorari from the trial court, while the judgment was affirmed, direction was given that the superior court might in its discretion, as authorized by law, review and correct the sentence.

Where the maximum penalty was $100 or imprisonment for not more than three months, but sentence was imposed of a fine of $1,000 or in default in payment two years labor on the public roads, it was held in State ex rel. Hart v. Hicks, 113 La. 846, 37 So. 776, on application for a writ of certiorari, that the verdict of guilty should remain, but that the sentence was void, and that the judgment of the trial court should cause the defendant to appear before him for resentencing.

And in State ex rel. Rivoire v. St. Paul, 104 La. 203, 28 So. 973, where a fine of $250 was imposed for contempt, and the legal penalty was a fine of $50, it was held that the judgment on certiorari should be set aside, leaving to the lower court the duty of imposing a new sentence. To the same effect is State v. Williams, 131 La. 392, 59 So. 822, where, instead of imprisonment not exceeding twenty-four hours, for contempt of court, a sentence of three days was imposed.

See also State ex rel. Babin v. Foster, under III. c, 2, supra.

VI. English, Canadian, and Philippine decisions.

By the English criminal appeal act 1907 (7 Edw. VII. chap. 23), "on an appeal against sentence, the court, if they think a different sentence should have been passed are to quash the sentence and pass such other sentence warranted in law as they think ought to have been passed, and in other cases are to dismiss the appeal; the substituted sentence may be more or less severe than the sentence passed; a different sentence may be passed, whether the appellant has or has not pleaded guilty." 9 Laws of England (Halsbury) 435. In the following, among other cases, the court under this statute reduced excessive sentences: Rex v. Davies, 28 Times L. R. 431; Rex v. Raybould, 25 Times L. R. 581, 73 J. P. 334, [1909] W. N. 118; Rex v. Syres, 25 Times L. R. 71; Rex v. Nuttall, 25 Times L. R. 76, 73 J. P. 30, 53 Sol. Jo. 64; Rex v. George, 25 Times L. R. 66; Rex v. Prince, 25 Times L. R. 197; Rex v. Bruce, 27 Times L. R. 51, 75 J. P. 111; Rex v. Brooks, 29 Times L. R. 152; Rex v. Trewholm, 29 Times L. R. 530, 77 J. P. 344; Rex v. Briggs [1909] 1 K. B. 381, 78 L. J. K. B. N. S. 116, 100 L. T. N. S. 240, 73 J. P. 31, 25 Times L. R. 105, 53 Sol. Jo. 164; Rex v. Bradford, 28 Times L. R. 26.

In Rex v. Davidson, 25 Times L. R. 352, [1909] W. N. 52, 100 L. T. N. S. 623, where a sentence of imprisonment at hard labor was illegally imposed on a plea of guilty to a misdemeanor, the court was of the opinion that it could not impose a proper sentence, as the statute authorized it to pass only such other sentence warranted in law by the verdict as it saw fit, and in this instance there had been no verdict. Therefore the sentence was quashed, but no other sentence was imposed.

where, although there had been a plea of guilty, an excessive sentence was reduced.

The English practice on an appeal against sentence, as to reducing an alleged excessive sentence, is well illustrated by the case of Rex v. Nuttall, 25 Times L. R. 76, 73 J. P. 30, 53 Sol. Jo. 64, it being said that where there had been a trial, the trial judge had a far better opportunity of justly determining the proper sentence than the court of criminal appeals, and in such a case the latter court would be slow to interfere with a sentence, although it might feel that it would have imposed a different sentence; but that this reason did not extend to cases where the defendant had pleaded guilty, and the circumstances were before the court of appeals to much the same extent as before the trial court. So that where the defendant had pleaded guilty to a minor offense, which it appeared had been committed probably when drunk, a sentence of eighteen months imprisonment at hard labor was reduced to six months, although it appeared the defendant had previously been convicted of other crimes.

The Canadian cases appear to be of little value as precedents outside of the territorial operation of the statutes, under which for the most part they were decided.

In Reg. v. Spooner, 4 Can. Crim. Cas. 209, the court on certiorari, under statutory authority, reduced a sentence which was in excess of that authorized by law.

In Rex v. McKenzie, 12 Can. Crim. Cas. 435, it was held that the supreme court of Nova Scotia had power on certiorari to amend a conviction which imposed a longer term of imprisonment than the statute permitted in case of failure to pay a penalty.

In Rex v. Shing, 20 Manitoba L. Rep. 214, it was held that a sentence of a fine of $200 for the keeping of a common gaming house was excessive, in that the court had no power to impose a fine exceeding $100, but that the case was not one in which the appellate court could modify the sentence; and the conviction was quashed on certiorari.

In Rex v. Sperdakes, 40 N. B. 428, it was held that a sentence was excessive which imposed a sentence of two years imprisonment and a fine of $1,000, for fraudulently abstracting electricity of the value of $13, one half of the fine to be paid to the company from whom the electricity had been stolen, and that on appeal the court had power to modify the sentence; that a proper penalty was a fine of $500 and six months imprisonment, with the further imprisonment of six additional months in case of nonpayment of the fine. Accordingly, the sentence of the lower court was set aside and the case remitted to that court, with directions to pronounce the sentence indicated in place of the one imposed.

In Rex v. Baird, 13 Can. Crim. Cas. 240, it was held that on appeal from a justice court, to the district court, the case being heard de novo, an excessive judgment should be amended; and that in this instance, where a justice had imposed the maximum penalty of a fine of $200 and in default of payment six months imprisonment, the sentence should be reduced, on the ground that under the circumstances it was excessive, to $50 fine, and in default of payment one month imprisonment.

And in Rex v. Williams, 21 Ont. L. Rep. 467, where a sentence of three years imprisonment was imposed, and the maximum authorized by law was three months, it was held on appeal that under statutory authority to pass such sentence as ought to have been passed, or make such other order as justice required, the court had power to discharge the prisoner, the confinement he had already suffered being regarded as sufficient for the crime.

In Rex v. Kavanagh, 5 Can. Crim. Cas. 507, it was held that an alleged excessive term of imprisonment imposed by the county court judge's criminal court was not ground for releasing by habeas corpus in the supreme court of Nova Scotia.

In Reg. v. Dupont, 4 Can. Crim. Cas. 566, a sentence of seven years imprisonment, when the maximum authorized was three years, was reduced by the court of appeals under statutory power to the latter term.

In Rex v. Simmons, 17 Ont. L. Rep. 239, where a sentence of four months imprisonment, the statutory penalty for a second offense, was imposed, upon an insufficient admission of the defendant of a first offense, it was held that a discharge should be granted on application for writ of habeas corpus. The court indicated that it would have amended the conviction by substituting the maximum penalty authorized for a first offense, but doubted its power to do so.

And in Rex v. Hayward, 6 Can. Crim. Cas. 399, where, on a plea of guilty to theft of 80 cents, an imprisonment of two years was imposed, and the confinement actually suffered was in a different place than that specified in the commitment, the prisoner was discharged on habeas corpus after he had served two months, although the maximum penalty for the offense was six months.

Also, in Reg. v. Randolph, 4 Can. Crim. Cas. 165, a prisoner was discharged on habeas corpus, although he had served less than a month of a sentence of two years, and the maximum penalty authorized was six months, but the sentence imposed was also erroneous in fixing the place of confinement in the central prison of the province, instead of in the common jail.

Among possibly other cases in which the supreme court of the Philippine Islands has exercised its power to modify or reduce sentences on appeal are the following: United States v. Lariosa, 15 Philippine, 208 (where an excessive sentence was imposed under a statute not applicable to the offense); United States v. Baguio, 14 Philippine, 240; United States v. Goboy, 17 Philippine, 615 (penalty of imprisonment reduced on account of the defendant's ex-51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

treme age); United States v. Penalver, 17 Philippine, 616 (penalty of imprisonment reduced on account of defendant's youth).

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, EIGHTH CIRCUIT.

CHARLES A. STEVENS, Alias Charles Savage, Appt.,

v.
ROBERT W. McCLAUGHRY, Warden of the United States Penitentiary.

(— C. C. A. —, 207 Fed. 18.)

Criminal law — sentence — concurrent offenses.

1. The sentence of a defendant, convicted under separate counts of an indictment under § 5469, Revised Statutes (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3692), of larceny of a mail pouch containing registered letters and of letters, and also of larceny of registered letters and embezzlement of their contents, committed at the same time and place and as parts of a continuous criminal act to separate punishments, is beyond the jurisdiction of the court, and void as to the excess above the maximum punishment that may be imposed for a single offense; and, after the defendant has satisfied such a sentence, he is entitled to his release by habeas corpus.

Separate offenses which are committed at the same time and are parts of a continuous criminal act, inspired by the same criminal intent which is an essential element of each offense, are susceptible of but one punishment.

Habeas corpus — judgment not void.

2. The proper Federal court may release by writ of habeas corpus one who is being restrained of his liberty for many years by virtue of the judgment of a Federal court beyond its jurisdiction and therefore void, but it may not release one so held by virtue of a judgment which is erroneous but within the jurisdiction of the court which rendered it, and hence not void. The writ of habeas corpus is not available to perform the function of a writ of error where the judgment assailed is not void.

Note. — The right to convict for several offenses growing out of the same facts is treated in the note to Hughes v. Com. 31 L.R.A. (N.S.) 693, and see also Munson v. McLaughry, 42 L.R.A. (N.S.) 302. For stealing property from different owners at the same time as distinct offenses, see note to State v. Sampson, 42 L.R.A. (N.S.) 967.

As to effect of excessive sentence, including the remedy by habeas corpus, see notes to Re Taylor, 45 L.R.A. 136, and Re Cica, ante, 373.

Criminal law — excessive sentence — effect.

3. The excess of a judgment beyond the jurisdiction of the court which renders it is as void as a judgment without any jurisdiction, and a prisoner held under such excess only is entitled to his release by writ of habeas corpus.

Habeas corpus — delay in seeking writ of error.

4. One who is being restrained of his liberty for many years by virtue of the judgment of a Federal court which is beyond its jurisdiction and void is not barred from a release therefrom, by writ of habeas corpus, by the fact that he might have secured such relief by a writ of error, but failed to apply for it until it was too late.

APPEAL by petitioner from an order of the District Court of the United States for the District of Kansas denying his petition for a writ of habeas corpus to secure his release from the United States Penitentiary. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Sanborn and Carland, Circuit Judges, and Willard, District Judge.

Mr. Turner W. Bell for appellant.

Messrs. H. J. Bone and A. M. Harvey, with Mr. Charles S. Briggs, for appellee.

Sanborn, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from an order which denied the petition of Charles A. Stevens, alias Charles Savage, for a writ of habeas corpus and a release from the United States penitentiary at Leavenworth, Kansas. He was indicted, convicted, and sentenced, under the first two counts of an indictment, to imprisonment for five years under § 5469 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3692), for feloniously taking, stealing, and carrying away on June 6, 1908, "from and out of a certain United States mail car lying and being upon a side track at the Union Depot Transfer Station for United States mails at Kansas City, Jackson county, Missouri, and then and there being the duly authorized depository for registered mail matter, a certain letter pouch containing registered mail, . . . from Los Angeles, California, to New York, New York, which said pouch contained large quantities of registered mail matter, from United States postoffice at Los Angeles, California, and intended for delivery at United States postoffice at New York city, New York," and 108 letters and packages which had been lately deposited in the United States mails for mailing and delivery. At the same trial he was convicted and sentenced to an imprisonment for five years more, under § 5469, of the Revised Statutes, under four counts of the same indictment, for feloniously taking, stealing, and carrying away on June 6, 1908, "from and out of a certain United States mail car lying and being upon a side track at the Union Depot Transfer Station for United States mails at Kansas City, Missouri, and then and there being a duly authorized depository for registered letters, certain mail matter," to wit, four registered letters numbered 96,419, 96,420, 96,421, and 96,422, and feloniously embezzling and converting to his own use the contents thereof. Each of these four letters was thus described in the indictment:

"A certain letter which had theretofore been deposited in the United States postoffice in Los Angeles, California, for mailing and delivery, to wit, registered letter No. 96,419 (or one of the other numbers), of the United States postoffice at Los Angeles, California, mailed and deposited in said postoffice by the Farmers' & Merchants' National Bank of Los Angeles, California, and intended to be conveyed by mail and addressed to and intended for the Importers' & Traders' National Bank of New York City, New York, which said letter then and there contained" $12,500 lawful money of the United States.

The petitioner served his term of five years under the first two counts of the indictment, and then presented his petition for his release on the ground that all the offenses of which he was convicted constituted a single continuing criminal act, inspired by the same felonious intent, which was equally essential to each of the offenses charged in the indictment, and that the excess of his sentence beyond imprisonment for five years, which was the maximum punishment prescribed by § 5469 for a single offense, was beyond the jurisdiction of the court which sentenced him, and void, under the decision of this court in Munson v. McLaughry, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 302, 117 C. C. A. 180, 198 Fed. 72, 75, 76, the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals of the Ninth Circuit in Halligan v. Wayne, 102 C. C. A. 410, 179 Fed. 112, and the opinions in Re Snow, 120 U. S. 274, 285, 30 L. ed. 658, 662, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 556; Re Nielsen, 131 U. S. 176, 182, 190, 33 L. ed. 118, 120, 122, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 672; Kite v. Com. 11 Met. 581, 583; Triplett v. Com. 84 Ky. 193, 1 S. W. 84; Yarborough v. State, 86 Ga. 396, 12 S. E. 650; Com. v. Birdsall, 69 Pa. 482, 485, 8 Am. Rep. 283.

The principle upon which the decisions in these cases rests is that two or more separate offenses which are committed at the same time and are parts of a single continuing criminal act, inspired by the same criminal intent which is essential to each offense, are susceptible to but one punishment. The most familiar illustration of the rule is that burglary with intent to commit larceny and larceny committed at the same time and as one continued act do not subject the perpetrator to two punishments,—one for the burglary and another for the larceny,—because the same criminal intent is indispensable to each, and they are each parts of a continuing criminal act. In order to take this case out from under this principle, counsel for the government argue that § 5469 denounces several separate offenses, two of which are: (1) Stealing the mail, or any letter or packet from any authorized depository for mail matter; and (2) taking the mail, or any letter or packet, which contains an article of value, from any authorized depository for mail matter, opening and embezzling the contents thereof; that the intent to embezzle is not essential to the former, but is indispensable to the latter, offense; that the two offenses are therefore separate. Let all this be conceded. Nevertheless, in the case at bar, the pleader alleged the stealing of the letters in the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth counts of the indictment in the same words in which he alleged the stealing of the letter pouch and the letters in the first and second counts. He averred that the defendant "did unlawfully and feloniously take, steal, and carry away from and out of a certain United States mail car" the letters whose contents he also alleged that the defendant embezzled. Conceding, but not admitting, that the United States might have charged and upon conviction have punished the separate offense of taking the four registered letters and embezzling their contents, its averment in the four counts which treat of these letters, of the intent to steal them and of their stealing made that intent an issue under each count and an essential element of each offense charged, and thus brought this case directly under the rule and the authorities cited. In burglary with intent to commit larceny and larceny committed at the same time, the intent to break and enter is not essential to the offense of larceny, but the intent to steal is indispensable to each offense. So, in the case at hand, the intent to embezzle is not essential to the offense of stealing a mail pouch and the letters, but under this indictment the intent to steal and the stealing is made by the pleadings as indispensable an element of the four offenses charged in the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth counts of the indictment as it is of the offenses charged in the first two counts.

Counsel call attention to the conceded rule that charges of separate offenses of the same class may be joined in separate counts in the same indictment. But this rule and the practice under it does not detract from the soundness or effect of the principle that two or more separate offenses which are committed at the same time and are parts of a continuing criminal act inspired by the same indispensable felonious intent are susceptible of but one punishment. The two offenses in Munson v. McClaghry, 42 L.R.A. (N.S.) 302, 117 C. C. A. 180, 198 Fed. 72, were charged in separate counts of the same indictment, and the situation was the same in Halligan v. Wayne, 102 C. C. A. 410, 179 Fed. 112.

Finally it is said that the record fails to prove that the stealing and carrying away charged in the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth counts of the four registered letters, and the conversion of their contents, was a part of the same continuing act as the stealing and carrying away of the mail pouch and the 108 letters charged in the first and second counts. Let us see. The record is that the defendant was tried and convicted under each of these counts; hence that the charges they contain are true. The first count charges that on June 6, 1908, the defendant, at Kansas City, Missouri, took, stole, and carried away—"from and out of a certain United States mail car lying and being upon a side track at the union depot transfer station for the United States mails at Kansas City, Jackson county, Missouri, and then and there being the duly authorized depository for registered mail matter, certain United States mail, to wit, a certain letter pouch containing registered mail, the lock on said pouch being number 2,424, rotary number 311, from Los Angeles, California, to New York, New York, which said pouch then and there contained large quantities of registered mail matter from United States postoffice at Los Angeles, California, and intended for delivery at United States postoffice at New York city, New York."

Each of the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth counts charged that the defendant on June 6, 1908, at the same time that he took the mail pouch, at Kansas City, Missouri, at the same place that he took the mail pouch, feloniously took, stole, and carried away a registered letter "from and out of a certain United States mail car lying and being upon a side track at the Union Depot Transfer Station for United States mails at Kansas City, Missouri," a mail car at the same place and described in the same words as the car from which he took the registered mail pouch, "a certain letter which had lately theretofore been deposited in the United States post-office at Los Angeles, California, mailed and deposited in said postoffice by the Farmers' & Merchants' National Bank of Los Angeles, California, and intended to be conveyed by mail and addressed to and intended for the Importers' & Traders' National Bank of New York City, New York," such a letter as, in the ordinary and almost invariable course of business, would be in the letter pouch, and nowhere else, containing registered mail from Los Angeles, California, to New York, described in the first count of the indictment.

The averments in each of the counts of this indictment that the six stealings occurred at the same time, at the same place, from a mail car described in each of them in the same words, and that the registered letters described in the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth counts were such as in the usual course of business would have been in the mail pouch containing registered letters from Los Angeles to New York described in the first count, converge upon the mind with such compelling force as to leave no doubt that all these stealings were committed at the same time, were parts of a single continuous criminal transaction, and that they were inspired by the same indispensable felonious intent. This conclusion is in accord with the decision in the circuit court of appeals of the ninth circuit in Halligan v. Wayne, supra, and with the decision of this court in Munson v. McClaughry, supra, where the fact that a count for burglary with intent to commit larceny charged the commission of the offense at the same time and place as a count for larceny was held sufficient, without more, to satisfy the court that the offenses charged were parts of the same continuous act. The case at bar, therefore, falls within the rule upon which the decisions in these cases are founded. It rests upon the principle that no man shall be twice punished for the same offense, so that when under the first two counts of the indictment the district court had sentenced the petitioner to the maximum punishment fixed by the law, it had exhausted its power, and its second sentence to imprisonment for five years more on the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth counts was in excess of its jurisdiction and void. The excess of a sentence or judgment beyond the jurisdiction of the court which renders it is as void as a judgment without any jurisdiction, and a prisoner held under such excess may be released by writ of habeas corpus. Ex parte Lange, 18 Wall. 163, 176, 178, 21 L. ed. 872, 878, 879; Re Snow, 120 U. S. 274, 285, 30 L. ed. 658, 662, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 556; Re Nielsen, 131

U. S. 176, 182, 190, 33 L. ed. 118, 120, 122, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 672; Mackey v. Miller, 62 C. C. A. 139, 141, 126 Fed. 161, 163; Ex parte Peeke (D. C.) 144 Fed. 1016; Bigelow v. Forrest, 9 Wall. 339, 19 L. ed. 696; Foltz v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 8 C. C. A. 635, 639, 19 U. S. App. 576, 60 Fed. 316, 320.

Since this case was argued and submitted, however, the Supreme Court has handed down, on May 26, 1913, its opinion in Re Petitions of Spencer, Scholl, and Moyer, 228 U. S. 652, 57 L. ed. 1010, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 709, who had applied for writs of habeas corpus to release them from imprisonment under sentences of a state court requiring them to pay fines and costs and undergo an imprisonment for an indeterminate period, the minimum of which should be eighteen months and the maximum two years, upon the ground that when they committed their crimes the maximum imprisonment which could be imposed upon them was two years and the minimum six months, and that the amendment which permitted the sentences imposed was an ex post facto and unconstitutional law. They had first appealed from their sentences to the superior court of Pennsylvania, where the judgments had been affirmed. They had then petitioned the supreme court of the state for a special allocatur to allow an appeal to that court from the judgment of the superior court. The supreme court had given the amendment such a construction as rendered it constitutional and valid, and had denied their petition. The petitioners had not raised the constitutionality of the amendment to the law which they sought to challenge in either of the courts of the state, nor had they sought a writ of error to the supreme court of the state from the Supreme Court of the United States. They had, however, applied to the United States district court after their defeats in the state courts for writs of habeas corpus, those applications had been denied, and they were met in the Supreme Court of the United States by the objections that they were too late, and that their claims had been adjudicated in the United States district court. They had paid their fines and costs, and their contention was that their sentences of imprisonment were void, although it was plain that under any interpretation of the original statutes and the amendment to them their sentences were legal and valid for at least six months of the terms of their imprisonment, and they had not served that much of those terms. The Supreme Court refused to issue the writ of habeas corpus, on the ground, among others, that their sentences to imprisonment were not void, but were merely erroneous, and that the national courts in the exercise of their discretion may and should, save in exceptional cases of which that was not one, refuse to interfere by habeas corpus with the course or final administration by the state courts of the criminal justice of their state, and should require the petitioners to present their claims by writs of error, citing Urquhart v. Brown, 205 U. S. 179, 51 L. ed. 760, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 459, which rests on the latter ground, and Re Lincoln, 202 U. S. 178, 50 L. ed. 984, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 602, which is founded on the rule that the Supreme Court may deny the writ in petty criminal cases where no writ of error has been sought and no application for a writ of habeas corpus has been made to any lower court, although the prisoner is restrained under the judgment of a Federal court and there is full jurisdiction to issue the writ. The circumstances in Lincoln's Case were these: The petitioner had been sentenced by the United States district court to jail for sixty days and to pay a fine of $100, for selling liquor to Indians. His jail sentence had expired. Under the law he could either pay the fine, of which he was complaining, or be discharged within ninety days from February 19, 1906, by taking the poor debtor's oath. The Supreme Court declared that the case was practically a moot one, for the decision was filed on May 14, 1906, only five days before he could be discharged under the poor debtor's oath; that in Ex parte Mirzan, 119 U. S. 584, 30 L. ed. 513, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 341, it had declined to issue a writ of habeas corpus after a conviction, "holding that it might be issued by the proper circuit court, and that application should be made to that court, except in cases where there were some special circumstances making immediate action by this court necessary or expedient," and it declined to issue the writ, with the concluding remark that "to permit every petty criminal case to be brought directly to this court upon habeas corpus, on the ground of an alleged misconception or disregard of our decisions, would be a grievous misuse of our time, which should be devoted to a consideration of the more important legal and constitutional questions which are constantly arising and calling for our determination." This brief review of Lincoln's Case seems to demonstrate that it is no authority for any claim that a district court ought not to issue its writs to relieve a prisoner, like the petitioner here, who is otherwise remediless, from an illegal and unconstitutional imprisonment for five years under a void sentence of a Federal court, because this decision rules the practice of the Supreme Court only, and not that of the district court, because it is limited by its facts to a moot and a petty criminal case, and a case which involves one's deprivation of his liberty for five years is not petty, and because in the case in hand the petitioner applied for his writ to a lower court, to which he was directed to apply by the Supreme Court in the Lincoln and Mirzan Cases. Moreover, the Supreme Court calls special attention in that decision to the fact that, even that court had issued the writ and discharged a prisoner although the claim to his discharge could have been and was not litigated by writ of error in Re Heff, 197 U. S. 488, 49 L. ed. 848, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 506, and that it would do so in a matter involving a question of great significance involving the rights of many. 202 U. S. 178, 183, 50 L. ed. 984, 986, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 602. What question is of greater significance, or involves the rights of more persons, than the right to the constitutional immunity from a second punishment for the same offense? Re Nielsen, 131 U. S. 176, 183, 184, 33 L. ed. 118, 120, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 672.

We return to the cases of Spencer and others. The opinion in that case sets forth the facts that by writ of error to the superior court of Pennsylvania and by petition to the supreme court of that state the petitioners had challenged the sentence of which they complain, and had not in either case raised, as they might have done, the issue that it was based on an ex post facto law; that they had applied to the United States district court for a writ of habeas corpus on that ground, and their application had been denied; that their sentence was in any event valid for six months of their terms, and those six months had not expired, and after reciting all these facts it reviewed the opinion in Ex parte Lange, 18 Wall. 163, 21 L. ed. 872, where a prisoner was relieved of a void sentence by writ of habeas corpus from the supreme court, and distinguished the cases of Spencer and others from that case on the ground that their sentences were erroneous but not void, while the sentence in the Lange Case was void, invoked the rule that a writ of habeas corpus may not be used to perform the function of a writ of error, called attention to the fact that the amendment to the statute which was claimed to be ex post facto had been so construed by the supreme court of Pennsylvania as to have no ex post facto effect, and then because the application was too late, coming after a decision of a like application by the United States district court and after reviews by the state courts, because the statute challenged had been construed by the state supreme court to be harmless, and because the sentence assailed was erroneous but not void, it refused to issue the writ. In the course of the opinion the Supreme Court called attention sharply to the fact that the sentences of the petitioners were subject to review and modification by the supreme court of Pennsylvania, and that no application therefor on the ground that the amendment to the law was ex post facto had been made to that court. This portion of the opinion suggests two questions: Did the Supreme Court hold or intend to hold by its decision in these cases, or in the Lincoln Case, that a United States district court may not and ought not, in any case, to issue a writ of habeas corpus and release a person otherwise remediless, who is being restrained of his liberty by virtue of a judgment of a Federal court beyond its jurisdiction, where he might have obtained his release by a writ of error, but failed to do so until it was too late, and, if not, does the case in hand fall within the class of cases in which such a writ may and should issue? The circuit court, of appeals of the fifth circuit seems to have been of the opinion that the first of these questions should be answered in the affirmative. Moyer v. Anderson, 122 C. C. A. 175, 203 Fed. 881. After a careful consideration of the purpose and effect of the right to the writ of habeas corpus, and of the rules and practice which govern it, it has been found difficult for us to reach that conclusion. In deference to the profound learning, commanding ability, and long experience of the eminent jurists who occupy the bench in that circuit, and to the high authority of that court, it has seemed proper to state the reasons which have forced us to a different conclusion.

The judgment in the case at bar was rendered by a national court, and the cogent reasons against interference by the Federal courts with the administration of justice in the state courts are inapplicable here. Ex parte Royall, 117 U. S. 254, 29 L. ed. 872, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 742; Re Dowd (C. C.) 133 Fed. 747, 754; Re Lincoln, 202 U. S. 178, 182, 50 L. ed. 984, 986, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 602. While it is a conceded rule that a writ of habeas corpus may not be used as a mere writ of error, it has been an established principle of our national jurisprudence for many years that one restrained of his liberty by virtue of a judgment or order of a court which that court had no jurisdiction to make might be released by the writ of habeas corpus, whether such a release could have been secured by writ of error or not. Ex parte Lange, 18 51 L.R.A. No. 1,862; Ex parte Wilson, 114 U. S. 417, 422, 429, 29 L. ed. 89, 91, 93, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 935, 4 Am. Crim. Rep. 283; Re Snow, 120 U. S. 274, 285, 30 L. ed. 658, 662, 7 Sup. Ct. The cases of Spencer and others questioned a judgment of a state court imposing a sentence of imprisonment for an indeterminate period the minimum of which should be eighteen months and the maximum two years, on the ground that there was no law, except an ex post facto law, which authorized an imprisonment for more than six months. The petitioners had not served six months. The judgments under which they were restrained were not void because the court had jurisdiction to sentence them for six months. Moreover, their validity depended upon the construction of statutes of the state which its courts on writs of error had construed against them, so that the judgment challenged was an erroneous and not a void judgment, and the writ of habeas corpus was not available under the rule of Re Nielsen, 131 U. S. 176, 183, 184, 33 L. ed. 118, 120, 121, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 672.

On the other hand, the case at bar is one in which the trial court had jurisdiction to sentence the petitioner, for all the offenses with which he was charged to an imprisonment for five years, and no longer. It imposed that sentence, thereby exhausting its power to sentence him to imprisonment, and then without jurisdiction sentenced him to an imprisonment for another five years. The second sentence alone is challenged; no part of it is valid; he did not seek to reverse it by writ of error, and his time to apply for such a writ has expired. Is he barred from all relief? In Ex parte Lange, 18 Wall. 163, 169, 173, 21 L. ed. 872, 876, 877, the petitioner had been tried, convicted, and sentenced for an offense for which he was liable to the alternative punishment of fine or imprisonment. The court imposed both. He paid the fine, and made application to the same court by writ of habeas corpus for release on the ground that he was then entitled to a discharge. The circuit court set aside its judgment, and sentenced him to imprisonment only. He then applied to the Supreme Court by writ of habeas corpus for his release. Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court, and, among other things, he said: "If there is anything settled in the jurisprudence of England and America, it is that no man can be twice lawfully punished for the same offense. And though there have been nice questions in the application of this rule to cases in which the act charged was such as to come within the definition of more than one statutory offense, or to bring the party within the jurisdiction of more than one court, there has never been any doubt of its entire and complete protection of the party when a second punishment is proposed in the same court, on the same facts, for the same statutory offense. . . . But it has been said that, conceding all this, the judgment under which the prisoner is now held is erroneous, but not void; and as this court cannot review that judgment for error, it can discharge the prisoner only when it is void. But we do not concede the major premise in this argument. A judgment may be erroneous, and not void, and it may be erroneous because it is void. The distinctions between void and merely voidable judgments are very nice, and they may fall under the one class or the other as they are regarded for different purposes. We are of opinion that when the prisoner, as in this case, by reason of a valid judgment, had fully suffered one of the alternative punishments to which alone the law subjected him, the power of the court to punish further was gone; that the principle we have discussed then interposed its shield, and forbid that he should be punished again for that offense. The record of the court's proceedings, at the moment the second sentence was rendered, showed that in that very case, and for that very offense, the prisoner had fully performed, completed, and endured one of the alternative punishments which the law prescribed for that offense, and had suffered five days' imprisonment on account of the other. It thus showed the court that its power to punish for that offense was at an end. Unless the whole doctrine of our system of jurisprudence, both of the Constitution and the common law, for the protection of personal rights in that regard, are a nullity, the authority of the court to punish the prisoner was gone. The power was exhausted; its further exercise was prohibited. It was error, but it was error because the power to render any further judgment did not exist."

And the court discharged the prisoner.

In Ex parte Bridges, 2 Woods, 428, Fed. Cas. No. 1,862, the petitioner had been tried, convicted, and sentenced for perjury by a state court without jurisdiction of the subject-matter. He prayed a writ of habeas corpus and a discharge. Mr. Justice Bradley said: "It is contended, however, that where a defendant has been regularly indicted, tried, and convicted in a state court, his only remedy is to carry the judgment to the court of last resort, and thence by writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States, and that it is too late for a habeas corpus to issue from a Federal court in such a case. This might be so if the proceeding in the state court were merely erroneous; but, where it is void for want of jurisdiction, habeas corpus will lie, and may be issued by any court or judge invested with supervisory jurisdiction in such case."

In Ex parte Wilson, 114 U. S. 417, 422, 429, 29 L. ed. 89, 93, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 935, 4 Am. Crim. Rep. 283, a prisoner convicted and sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor on a trial upon an information sought release by writ of habeas corpus because he had never been indicted or presented by the grand jury, and the Supreme Court granted his release although the question raised by the petition had not been urged at the trial.

In Ex parte Bain, 121 U. S. 1, 13, 14, 30 L. ed. 849, 853, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 781, 6 Am. Crim. Rep. 122, the prisoner had been tried, convicted, and sentenced to imprisonment on an indictment which the court had amended before the trial. He prayed a writ of habeas corpus and a discharge. The Supreme Court held that the trial court lost its power to try him by the amendment, and discharged him.

In Re Snow, 120 U. S. 274, 285, 30 L. ed. 658, 662, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 556, § 3 of the acts of Congress of March 22, 1882, chap. 47, 22 Stat. at L. 31, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3634, provided that if any male person in a territory of the United States should cohabit with more than one woman, he should, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not more than $300, or by imprisonment for not more than six months, or by both said punishments. On December, 5, 1885, three indictments were found against Snow, the first for continuously living and cohabiting with seven women named as his wives, between December 31, 1882, and December 31, 1883, the second for continuously claiming, living, and cohabiting with the same women as his wives between January 1, 1884, and December 1, 1884, and the third for continuously living and cohabiting with the same women between the 1st day of January, 1885, and 1st day of December, 1885. There was a separate trial and conviction on each indictment. After the verdicts had been rendered, the court sentenced Snow on the same day to pay a fine of $300 and to imprisonment for six months on each indictment. After serving six months and paying a fine of $300, Snow prayed the trial court for a writ of habeas corpus and a release from further imprisonment, on the ground that the offenses charged in all the indictments constituted a single continuous offense, that the court had been without jurisdiction to impose more than one punishment therefor, and that the sentences on the second and third indictments were void. The district court denied the application, and the petitioner appealed to the Supreme Court. That court sustained the claim of the petitioner, held that the acts charged in the three indictments constituted one continuous criminal act, and said: "Not only had the court which tried them no jurisdiction to inflict a punishment in respect of more than one of the convictions, but, as the want of jurisdiction appears on the face of the judgment, the objection may be taken on habeas corpus, when the sentence on more than one of the convictions is sought to be enforced;" reversed the court below and ordered the issue of the writ.

In Re Nielsen, 131 U. S. 176, 182, 190, 33 L. ed. 118, 120, 122, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 672, 674, another case with parallel facts, is reported. To the objection that the validity of the second sentence could not be assailed by writ of habeas corpus, Mr. Justice Bradley replied: "It is firmly established that if the court which renders a judgment has not jurisdiction to render it, either because the proceedings or the law under which they are taken are unconstitutional, or for any other reason, the judgment is void and may be questioned collaterally, and a defendant who is imprisoned under and by virtue of it may be discharged from custody on habeas corpus. . . . It was laid down by this court in Re Coy, 127 U. S. 731, 758, 32 L. ed. 274, 280, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1263, 1272, that the power of Congress to pass a statute under which a prisoner is held in custody may be inquired into under a writ of habeas corpus as affecting the jurisdiction of the court which ordered his imprisonment; and the court, speaking by Mr. Justice Miller, adds: And if their want of power appears on the face of the record of his condemnation, whether in the indictment or elsewhere, the court which has authority to issue the writ is bound to release him.' . . . It is difficult to see why a conviction and punishment under an unconstitutional law is more violative of a person's constitutional rights than an unconstitutional conviction and punishment under a valid law. In the first case, it is true, the court has no authority to take cognizance of the case; but, in the other, it has no authority to render judgment against the defendant. This was the case in Ex parte Lange, where the court had authority to hear and determine the case, but we held that it had no authority to give the judgment it did. It was the same in the case of Snow: The court had authority over the case, but we held that it had no authority to give judgment against the prisoner. He was protected by a constitutional provision, securing to him a fundamental right. It was not a case of mere error in law, but a case of denying to a person a constitutional right. And where such a case appears on the record, the party is entitled to be discharged from imprisonment."

And here is the true distinction between the cases in which the writ of habeas corpus may and those in which it may not issue. If the judgment or sentence challenged is without the jurisdiction of the court and void, the writ may issue. If it is erroneous, but within the jurisdiction of the court which rendered it, the writ may not issue. The parallel between the cases of Snow and Nielsen and the case at bar is complete, and unless the decision in the case of Spencer and others has overruled the cases which have just been reviewed, and departed from the fundamental principles they sustain and the practice under them which has prevailed for years in Re Mayfield, 141 U. S. 107, 116, 35 L. ed. 635, 638, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 939; Re Ladd (C. C.) 74 Fed. 31, 42; Re Waite (D. C.) 81 Fed. 359, 362, 372; Mackey v. Miller, 62 C. C. A. 139, 126 Fed. 161, 163; Ex parte Peeke (D. C.) 144 Fed. 1016,—there would seem to be no doubt of the power or duty of the court to issue the writ in the case in hand. We are not persuaded that it has overruled them, departed from the rules they maintain, or decided that everyone restrained of his liberty by a void judgment which he might have challenged by a writ of error, is barred of relief by means of the writ of habeas corpus. It has not expressly declared that those decisions are wrong, or that the principles on which they rest are erroneous, and they are too firmly established to be overthrown by silence. On the other hand, it has carefully distinguished the leading case, the Lange Case, from those in which its opinion was delivered, and to hold that one who is being deprived of his liberty for a long term of years by virtue of a sentence beyond the jurisdiction of the court which rendered it has deprived himself of his right to relief by writ of habeas corpus, because through ignorance, poverty, or neglect he failed to challenge that judgment by writ of error until it was too late, is to rob the writ of the very purpose of its existence,—the purpose to afford speedy and inexpensive relief from unlawful imprisonment to those otherwise remediless. To us it is incredible that the Supreme Court ever intended to decide, to take the striking illustrations of Mr. Justice Miller in Ex parte Lange, 18 Wall. at page 176, 21 L. ed. 878, that one who should be sentenced by a justice of the peace having jurisdiction to fine for a misdemeanor, or by a court of general jurisdiction on an indictment for a libel, to imprisonment and death, who through ignorance or neglect should fail to appeal or procure a writ of error within the prescribed time, would be barred of relief by the writ of habeas corpus. It is a writ of right. The acts of Congress declare that the court to which the application for it is made "shall forthwith award a writ of habeas corpus, unless it appears from the petition itself that the party is not entitled thereto," and "shall proceed in a summary way to determine the facts of the case, . . . and thereupon to dispose of the party as law and justice require." Revised Statutes, §§ 755, 761, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, pp. 593, 594. The petitioner is being restrained of his liberty for five years by a judgment of a Federal court which was beyond its jurisdiction and void.

And our conclusion is that one who is being restrained of his liberty for many years by virtue of the judgment of a Federal court which is beyond its jurisdiction and void may, and should, be relieved from that restraint by the proper Federal court by means of the writ of habeas corpus, and that he is not barred from such relief by the fact that he might have obtained it by a writ of error, but failed to do so until it was too late. The case at bar falls under the rule we have announced and within the class of cases governed by it, and the court below should have issued the writ and discharged the prisoner. The order denying the petition for the writ of habeas corpus and for the release of the petitioner from the penitentiary is accordingly reversed, and the case is remanded to the District Court, with directions to discharge the prisoner.

F. C. HEWSON, Appt.,
v.

PETERMAN MANUFACTURING COM-PANY, Resp't.

(— Wash. —, 136 Pac. 1158.)

Statute of frauds — sale of stock not yet issued.

1. A contract for the sale of corporate stock thereafter to be issued is one for the 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

sale of goods, wares, and merchandise, with- in the meaning of the statute of frauds.

Same — part payment.

2. The resignation of his former position by one who had entered into an oral contract with a corporation whereby it was to sell him some of its stock, and to employ him as its bookkeeper, does not constitute giving "something in earnest to bind the bargain, or in part payment," so as to take the contract out of the statute of frauds.

Damages — breach of contract to employ.

3. No recovery can be had for breach of contract to employ one as secretary and treasurer of a corporation, since, being a position of responsibility and trust, the incumbent was removable at will.

Appeal — review — nominal damages.

4. A judgment will not be reversed for the purpose of permitting the appellant to recover nominal damages.

(December 12, 1913.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Pierce County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for breach of an oral contract to sell corporate stock and give employment to plaintiff. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Garvey, Kelly, & MacMahon, for appellant:

The mere fact that, after having employed him, the defendant could have discharged him at will, does not justify defendant in breaking a contract to employ.

26 Cyc. 977, 978; Davis v. Barr, 12 N. Y. S. R. 111; Watson v. Russell, 149 N. Y. 388, 44 N. E. 161.

If plaintiff's resignation was known, acquiesced in, and accepted by the defendant as a part performance of his contract, it was one of the considerations upon which the contract was made, and was a part payment.

White v. Drew, 56 How. Pr. 53; Post v. Wilson, 5 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 368; Raymond v. Colton, 43 C. C. A. 501, 104 Fed. 219.

Mr. John E. Gallagher, for respondent:

A contract for the sale of corporate stock is one for the sale of goods, wares, and merchandise within the statute of frauds.

Note. — Contract for the sale of corporate stock as one for the sale of "goods," etc., within statute of frauds.

The earlier cases on this question are discussed in the note to Sprague v. Hosie, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 874.

The rule stated in the earlier note as followed in the courts of this country, that a sale of corporate stock is a sale of "goods," etc., within the statute of frauds, has been

Sprague v. Hosie, 155 Mich. 30, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 874, 130 Am. St. Rep. 558, 118 N. W. 497; Franklin v. Moota Gold Min. Co. 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 381, 86 C. C. A. 145, 158 Fed. 941, 14 Ann. Cas. 302.

If the alleged agreement to sell is invalid, the balance of the contract is also invalid.

20 Cyc. 285.

The respondent, even though the appellant had rendered any services, could have discharged him at any moment without being liable for any salary except that already earned.

Llewellyn v. Aberdeen Brewing Co. 65 Wash. 319, 118 Pac. 30, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 667.

followed in the late cases passing upon that question. Stift v. Stiewel, 91 Ark. 445, 125 S. W. 1008, 18 Ann. Cas. 597; Russell v. Betts, 107 Ark. 629, 156 S. W. 457; Korrer v. Madden, 152 Wis. 646, 140 N. W. 325; Snow Storm Min. Co. v. Johnson, 108 C. C. A. 615, 186 Fed. 745. But see Clement v. Rowe, infra.

Consequently, in an oral sale of stock the vendor cannot recover the price, in the absence of anything taking the transaction out of the statute. Stift v. Stiewel, supra; Korrer v. Madden, 152 Wis. 646, 140 N. W. 325.

Nor can one who has orally made a conditional sale of his stock enforce the same upon the happening of the contingency upon which the sale was to be completed. Russell v. Betts, 107 Ark. 629, 156 S. W. 457. The agreement in this case was that if the owner of the stock would sell the same to another party, the defendant would pay him a certain amount if the dividends on the stock and the owner's equitable interest in the assets of the corporation when the same became insolvent, if it did become insolvent, did not amount to the stated sum. This was treated as a conditional sale and the validity determined as above.

Nor can the corporation refuse to issue a new certificate of stock to replace a lost certificate on the ground of an oral contract of sale of the stock by the stockholder. Snow Storm Min. Co. v. Johnson, 108 C. C. A. 615, 186 Fed. 745.

The question what constitutes a sale is not properly within the scope of the present note, and the following cases which pass upon this question are inserted for illustrative purposes merely.

A qualified sale of stock upon condition that should the purchaser become dissatisfied therewith or want his money the seller would refund, upon a notice of a certain length of time, is not a contract for the sale of property from the purchaser to the seller within the statute of frauds. Schaefer v. Strieder, 203 Mass. 467, 89 N. E. 618.

In Hankwitz v. Barrett, 143 Wis. 639, 128 N. W. 430, it is held that where stock is sold, paid for, and delivered in pursuance 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Gose, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff claims damages for breach of an oral contract to sell corporate stock and give employment. His complaint alleges that he and the defendant entered into an oral contract, whereby the defendant agreed to increase its capital stock and sell him 50 shares of such increase at par, that is, at $100 a share, and to employ plaintiff as its "bookkeeper under the title of secretary and treasurer," at a salary of $150 per month, in consideration of his resigning the position which he then held with another company and paying to defendant $5,000 for the stock. It is further alleged that, in fulfilment of the contract, the plaintiff, upon the day of the bargain, received of a contract wherein the vendor, as a condition of the sale, agrees to repurchase it, at the option of the buyer, the whole constitutes but an entire original contract that is sufficiently performed to take it out of the statute.

An oral agreement by the agent of a corporation to induce a prospective purchaser to take stock therein that he would pay her upon demand the amount of money paid for the stock was held in Trenholm v. Klopper, 88 Neb. 236, 129 N. W. 436, not to be an agreement to purchase stock, but an entire contract, the purchaser's part in which was fully executed.

So, an oral contract by a stockholder who has a large personal interest in a corporation, by which he agrees, upon a sale of the corporate stock through him as agent, to personally take the stock if the purchaser should become dissatisfied therewith, is not void as being a sale of goods, wares, or merchandise from the purchaser to such stockholder. Schaefer v. Strieder, supra.

But an oral agreement by a third person, although made at the time of the sale, to take the stock at the purchaser's option, is a sale within the condemnation of the statute. Korrer v. Madden, supra.

A subscription to take a number of shares in a corporation about to be formed is not a sale of stock within the condemnation of the statute. Clapp v. Gilt Edge Consol. Mines Co. — S. D. —, 144 N. W. 721.

Nor is the original issue of stock to one by the corporation a sale within the meaning of this section of the statute. Peninsula Leasing Co. v. Cody, 161 Mich. 604, 126 N. W. 1053.

An oral agreement by one to induce another to exchange land for stock in a corporation, that he would purchase the stock at a stated time in case it failed to come up to his representations, is held in Clement v. Rowe, — S. D. —, 146 N. W. 700, not to be within the provisions of a statute making void an oral agreement for the sale of goods, chattels, or things in action in value not less than $50, but why it is not within the statute is not stated.

signed his position, and thereafter tendered to the defendant his services and the sum of $5,000, both of which the defendant rejected; that the defendant increased its capital stock; that its capital stock is of the market value of $150 per share; and that his resignation was "known, acquiesced in, and accepted" by the defendant as a part performance of the contract. The prayer is for $2,500 damages for failure to deliver the stock, and $600 for breach of the contract of employment. A demurrer to the complaint was interposed on three grounds: (1) That several causes of action are improperly united; (2) that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; and (3) that the contract, under the statute of frauds, is required to be in writing. The demurrer was sustained and judgment of dismissal entered. The plaintiff has appealed.

The respondent's contention is twofold: (a) That shares of corporate stock are "goods, wares, and merchandise" within the meaning of the statute of frauds; and (b) that the act of the appellant in resigning his position was not the giving of an earnest or a part payment under the statute. Our statute (Rem. & Bal. Code, § 5290) provides: "No contract for the sale of any goods, wares, or merchandise, for the price of $50 or more, shall be good and valid, unless the purchaser shall accept and receive part of the goods so sold, or shall give something in earnest to bind the bargain, or in part payment, or unless some note or memorandum in writing of the bargain be made and signed by the party to be charged thereby, or by some person thereunto by him lawfully authorized." Section 3693, Rem. & Bal. Code, provides that the stock of a corporation shall be deemed personal property.

It is established by the great weight of authority that corporate stock is goods, wares, and merchandise within the meaning of the statute of frauds. 20 Cyc. 244; Cook, Corp. § 339; Helliwell, Stock & Stockholders, p. 15; 4 Words & Phrases, p. 3131; Sprague v. Hosie, 155 Mich. 30, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 874, 130 Am. St. Rep. 558, 118 N. W. 497; Franklin v. Matoa Gold Min. Co. 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 381, 86 C. C. A. 145, 158 Fed. 941, 14 Ann. Cas. 302. This construction of the statute is not seriously disputed by the appellant. He contends, however, that a contract for the sale of stock to be issued does not fall within the ban of the statute; but he offers no sound reason for the distinction. It is well settled, we think, that a contract for the sale of stocks at a future date is within the statute. Franklin v. Matoa Gold Min. Co. supra, and authorities there cited. In 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Meehan v. Sharp, 151 Mass. 564, 24 N. E. 907, cited by appellant, the court suggested that it was "at least doubtful" whether a contract for the sale of corporate stock that had not been regularly issued was within the statute, but the case was affirmed upon the ground that there had been a delivery of the stock.

The second proposition is: Did the resignation of the appellant constitute giving "something in earnest to bind the bargain or in part payment?" The statute obviously contemplates that something of value shall pass to the promisee; that is, that something of value "must be really given and received toward payment." Benjamin, Sales, 7th ed. p. 180. "There must be an actual payment" of money or something of value "in the eye of the law." Clark, Contr. § 57. "To constitute a payment as earnest, or a part payment within the meaning of the statute of frauds, there must be an actual transfer or delivery of the thing or the money agreed to be given as earnest or part payment." Walrath v. Ingles, 64 Barb. 265. "Acts merely preliminary or ancillary to the agreement, such as delivering an abstract of title, giving directions for a conveyance, the preparation of the agreement, making valuations, and other like acts, are not sufficient." Reynolds v. Scriber, 41 Or. 407, 69 Pac. 48. The allegation that the appellant's resignation was "known, acquiesced in, and accepted by the defendant" as a part performance of the contract is merely the conclusion of the pleader. There is but one fact pleaded touching part payment and that is that the appellant resigned an employment which he held with a third party. In White v. Drew, 56 How. Pr. 53, cited by appellant, one of the elements of the consideration agreed upon passed from the vendee to the vendor. In the instant case the appellant merely resigned after the agreement had been made. Nothing actually passed to the respondent. Although not cited in the briefs, we have not overlooked the case of Harris v. Johnson, 75 Wash. 291, 134 Pac. 1048. The question there was: What constitutes a sufficient consideration for a promise to pay money? The question here is the correct interpretation of the words of a particular statute. The rule applicable to the one question is not necessarily controlling in the other. We conclude that there was nothing given in earnest to bind the bargain, or in part payment within the meaning of the statute. It follows that the contract for the sale of the corporate stock was void under the statute of frauds.

The appellant argues, however, that the contract is not an entirety, and that he is entitled to recover at least nominal damages for a breach of the contract to give him employment. Had he been given employment, he would have occupied a position "of responsibility and trust," and would have been removable at the will of the respondent. Llewellyn v. Aberdeen Brewing Co. 65 Wash. 319, 118 Pac. 30, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 667. It cannot be doubted that the position of bookkeeper "under the title of secretary and treasurer" would be a position of responsibility and trust. If he had the title of secretary and treasurer, we think the legal presumption would be that he would exercise the functions of secretary and treasurer.

This court has held that, where the action is one for damages only, there being involved no property or personal rights having value in themselves, a failure to prove substantial damages is a failure to prove the substance of the issue, and warrants a judgment of dismissal. Woodhouse v. Powles, 43 Wash. 617, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 783, 117 Am. St. Rep. 1079, 86 Pac. 1063, 11 Ann. Cas. 54; Casassa v. Seattle, 75 Wash. 367, 134 Pac. 1080. This view is sound for another reason; that is, the law "does not concern itself with trifles." Matzger v. Page, 62 Wash. 170, 113 Pac. 254.

The case will not be retained for the purpose of determining the question of nominal damages.

The demurrer was properly sustained, and the judgment is affirmed.

KEARN FITZPATRICK, Appt.,

v.

AGE-HERALD PUBLISHING COMPANY.

(— Ala. —, 63 So. 980.)

Pleading — libel — effect of innuendo.

1. An innuendo cannot add to, enlarge, or change in any degree words alleged to be libelous.

Libel — house or occupants.

2. A written statement that a particular house has a bad reputation with the police is a libel on its occupants.

Same — bad reputation with police.

3. To write that one has a bad reputation with the police is libelous per se.

Note. — For defamation of occupants of house by imputing to it a disorderly character, see note to Hyatt v. Lindner, 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 256, and notes on analogous subjects therein referred to.

Same — definiteness of statement.

4. That the house is not designated in a statement that a shooting occurred on a named street between two other streets, in a house which bore a bad reputation with the police, does not prevent it from being a libel on the occupants if those familiar with the facts know which house was referred to.

Pleading — libel — failure to demand retraction.

5. Under a statute denying punitive damages against a newspaper for publication of a libel unless a demand for retraction has been made, the failure to make such demand is matter of defense.

Same — excessive demands — demurrer.

6. Demurrer is not the proper remedy for an excessive demand for damages in a libel suit.

(November 27, 1913.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the City Court of Birmingham in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the publication of an alleged libel. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Harsh, Beddow, & Fitts, for appellant:

It does not appear but that plaintiff could have shown by extrinsic evidence that the publication referred to his home, although it did not name him.

He certainly had the legal right to adduce such proof.

It is not necessary that all the world should understand the libel; it is sufficient if those who know the plaintiff can make out that he is the person meant.

Plaintiff was sufficiently identified, and could recover.

The statement in the publication to the effect that the house "had a bad reputation with the police" was the equivalent of saying that the house was one which, to say the least of it, had been the subject of police surveillance; and the common understanding of the words could convey to the ordinary mind even stronger and more offensive suggestions.

Unless an inspection of the publication convinces the court that no reasonable construction of the language employed could carry a defamatory meaning, then its meaning and interpretation must be left to the jury.

Mr. Nathan L. Miller for appellee.

Dowdell, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action of libel brought by appellant, Kearn Fitzpatrick, against the Age-Herald Publishing Company. From a judgment 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

for defendant the present appeal is prosecuted.

There is but one count in the complaint; the court sustained a demurrer thereto, and, the plaintiff declining to amend, judgment was thereupon rendered for the defendant, permitting it to go hence without day. The publication complained of is set forth in hæc verba in the complaint. It appears that a man by the name of Michael Brennan, otherwise called Micky Brennan, was shot in the city of Birmingham, Alabama, on July 2, 1911, and on the next morning the defendant company published in its paper, the Age-Herald, an account of the shooting, detailing some sensational facts with reference to the affair. The "offensive statement," constituting the alleged libel of plaintiff, is: "The shooting occurred on Avenue E. between Eleventh and Twelfth streets, in a house which bears a bad reputation with the police." The complaint avers that the house mentioned in the publication was at the time, and had been for a long time prior thereto, and has been ever since said time, occupied by plaintiff, with his family, as a residence, and that, as a proximate consequence of said libel, the plaintiff was greatly humiliated, his reputation greatly impaired, etc. Numerous grounds of demurrer were assigned to the complaint. The vital question in the case is whether or not the published words were libelous, and, if so, did they constitute a libel of the plaintiff, or of the house in which the plaintiff avers he was residing; that is, were they a libel of the person or of the thing—the house?

Counsel for appellee devotes practically his entire brief to the support of the proposition that the libel, if any, was of the thing,—the house,—and not of the plaintiff. The plaintiff charges that the alleged libelous words were falsely and maliciously published "of and concerning him." There is no mention of the plaintiff's name in the publication. By way of innuendo, the plaintiff avers that the said house mentioned in said publication was, at the time, and had been for a long time prior thereto, and has been ever since said time, occupied by the plaintiff, with his family, as a residence. The plaintiff insists that this averment sufficiently explains the precedent matter,—the publication,—and shows that the said publication related to, and was a libel upon, him. Unless the published words are fairly susceptible of the meaning attributed to them by the pleader in the innuendo, the actionable quality of the words is not disclosed, for the innuendo is but the deduction or conclusion of the pleader. The only office of the innuendo is to explain some matter already expressed, or to serve to point out where there is precedent matter. It may apply what is already expressed, but cannot add to, enlarge, or change the sense of the previous words. If the meaning given to the words by the innuendo is broader than the words would naturally bear, the pleading is bad; for, in law, the innuendo is but the deduction of the pleader from the words used in the publication, and this court has repeatedly held that it is for the court to say whether the meaning charged by the innuendo is supported by the language used in the publication. Henderson v. Hale, 19 Ala. 159; Wofford v. Meeks, 129 Ala. 349, 55 L.R.A. 214, 87 Am. St. Rep. 66, 30 So. 625; Gaither v. Advertiser Co. 102 Ala. 458, 14 So. 788. As above stated, the appellee insists that the alleged libel was of the "house," and not of the plaintiff. It is also pointed out that the particular house referred to in the complaint is uncertain. The only house mentioned is the house which the plaintiff alleges was his residence, and the word "said" before the word "house" makes it certain that the plaintiff intended to and did aver that the alleged libelous publication referred to the particular house occupied by the plaintiff with his family.

It is strenuously argued that the plaintiff's complaint shows that he was not libeled, and that the libel, if any, was of the thing—the house; that it is the house which has a bad reputation with the police, and not the occupants thereof. In support of this contention the following Alabama cases are cited: Cahn v. State, 110 Ala. 56, 20 So. 380; Toney v. State, 60 Ala. 97; Wooster v. State, 55 Ala. 221; Price v. State, 96 Ala. 5, 11 So. 128. The cases are not in point. The principle announced in two of these decisions is that, in a prosecution for keeping a certain character of house prohibited by law, the state cannot offer evidence of the character of the house. The house acquires whatever reputation it has from the occupants thereof; it can make or earn none for itself; it can and does reflect only the reputation of its occupants, or those who frequent it. We know of no way by which a house can, of its own act, acquire a reputation. This being true, when we speak of a certain house as being disorderly, we must necessarily be understood as referring to the conduct of those who live in, or who frequent, the same by and with the permission of the occupants. When, therefore, it is said of a house, "It has a bad reputation with the police," we refer to the head of that house, and, in fact, we reflect upon each member of the same. The language of the publication is, "The shooting occurred on Avenue E, between Eleventh and Twelfth streets, in a house which bears a bad reputation with the police." This charges that, at the present time, the house bears a bad reputation with the police; and, under the plaintiff's averment, it was at that moment of time, an "had been for a long while prior thereto, the place where he and his family resided. This reflected upon the plaintiff, for he and his family must be held to be the ones who gave to the house, and continued to give to it, that reputation, for the house is void of life and could not make for itself a bad reputation.

The case of McClean v. New York Press Co. 46 N. Y. S. R. 706, 19 N. Y. Supp. 262, is very similar in many respects to the case under consideration. The publication there charged that No. 234 West Twenty-Ninth street, in New York city, was disorderly. In that case the same question was raised as is raised in this case; that is, that the libel was of the thing,—the house,—and not of a person. Addressing itself to this point the court said: "It is manifest that this point is not well taken. The phrase used, it is true, is 'disorderly house'; but a house cannot be disorderly; . . . it refers entirely to the character of the occupants; and it is their character which fixes the character of the thing. When, therefore, a house is spoken of as disorderly, or as a bawdyhouse, or as disreputable, it is that the occupants are disorderly, are lewd persons, or are disreputable. It is idle in a charge of this kind to talk about it being a libel of the house where a house is called 'disorderly.'"

We are of the opinion that the publication in question was "of and concerning" the plaintiff, who resided in the house in question.

In the case of Iron Age Pub. Co. v. Crudup, 85 Ala. 520, 5 So. 332, this court said: "The definitions of libel, as found in the cases, vary somewhat in phraseology, and are more or less comprehensive, as may be called for by the particular charge involved in the case. Generally any false and malicious publication, when expressed in printing or writing, or by signs or pictures, is a libel, which charges an offense punishable by indictment, or which tends to bring an individual into public hatred, contempt, or ridicule, or charges an act odious and disgraceful in society. This general definition may be said to include whatever tends to injure the character of an individual, or blacken his reputation, or imputes fraud, dishonesty, or other moral turpitude, or reflects shame, or tends to put him without the pale of social intercourse."

The published words did not, it is true, charge the plaintiff, or any member of his family, with an indictable offense; but, giving to the publication the meaning that the words employed generally and fairly import, it tended to subject the plaintiff, the head of the house, to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule, and tended to reflect shame upon him, and to put him without the pale of social intercourse. This being true, the words were libelous per se. Trimble v. Anderson, 79 Ala. 514; Iron Age Pub. Co. v. Crudup, supra.

And, as we have above pointed out, the words, when published, were a libel upon the plaintiff. No one could doubt that the neighbors and friends of plaintiff, on reading this account of the shooting of Brennan, would conclude that the libel was directed to the plaintiff. It is not necessary that all the citizens of Birmingham should understand the libel, or know that the shooting occurred at plaintiff's house; it is sufficient that those who knew could understand that he was the person meant. Odgers, Libel & Slander, p. 567; Petsch v. Dispatch Printing Co. 40 Minn. 291, 41 N. W. 1034.

It is also objected that the complaint is faulty, in that punitive, as well as special, damages are claimed, and it is not averred that a demand for retraction was made before the institution of the suit, and that there was failure on the part of the defendant company to retract. The case of Comer v. Age-Herald Pub. Co. 151 Ala. 613, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 525, 44 So. 673, is cited in support of this contention. There is no merit in this contention. The law in force at the time the Comer suit was brought (Acts 1899, p. 32) is not the law now in force on this subject. The change is wrought by § 3750 of the Code of 1907. Assuming, without deciding, that the matter published was proper for public information, the failure to demand retraction is now, under the law, defensive matter. The act of February 20, 1899, inhibited the institution of suits for libel brought against a publisher of a newspaper, unless a demand for retraction was made before the institution of the suit. This court, in Comer's Case, supra, held that this inhibition did not prohibit the bringing of suits for the recovery of actual damages. There is no inhibition against bringing a suit to recover damages, under the law now in force, without first having made a demand for retraction, but simply a denial to the plaintiff of the right to recover punitive damages unless such demand was previously made. Code 1907, §§ 3750, 3751.

Assuming further, without deciding, that the plaintiff has failed to state a cause 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

entitling him to punitive damages, but to actual damages, the proper way to get rid of the improper demand is not by demurrer, but by motion to strike, objections to the evidence, or special instructions to the jury. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Garthright, 151 Ala. 413, 44 So. 212; Hayes v. Miller, 150 Ala. 621, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 748, 124 Am. St. Rep. 93, 43 So. 818; Woodstock Iron Works v. Stockdale, 143 Ala. 550, 39 So. 335, 5 Ann. Cas. 578.

After a careful consideration of this case we are of the opinion, and so hold, that the defendant's demurrer should have been overruled, and that in failing to so rule there intervened error for which the judgment of the court below must be reversed.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

MACKAY TELEGRAPH-CABLE COMPANY, Appt.,

v.
WILLIAM F. VAUGHAN.

Damages — mental anguish — lost telegram — sick child.

A telegraph company which causes a delay of a couple of days in the starting of a sick child for another climate through loss of a message is not answerable in damages for the mental anguish suffered by the father pending the delay, because of the child's condition; at least, if there was nothing to prevent the starting of the child without fixing definitely its accommodations at destination, which the message was intended to effect.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Phillips County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for mental anguish alleged to have been suffered because of defendant's negligent delay in transmitting a telegram. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Note. — The so-called mental-anguish doctrine is treated in a series of exhaustive notes in 49 L.R.A.(N.S.); the character of mental anguish necessary to sustain an action for mental anguish being discussed in a note to Western U. Teleg. Co. v. McKenzie, 49 L.R.A.(N.S.) 296; and the necessity of distinguishing between mental anguish caused by the sickness and death, and that caused by defendant's negligence, in the note to Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Chouteau, 49 L.R.A.(N.S.) 249.

Messrs. Fink & Dinning for appellant.
Messrs. Moore, Vineyard, & Satterfield for appellee.

McCulloch, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellee instituted this action against appellant telegraph company to recover damages on account of mental anguish alleged to have been suffered by reason of delay in transmitting a telegraph message from Helena, Arkansas, the place of appellee's residence, to his mother at Cumberland, Virginia.

Appellee had been living in Helena a little over a month, and his infant child was in bad health, and under the care of a physician, who recommended that the babe be sent away for a change of climate. His mother lived at Cumberland, Virginia, and kept house there, and took a few boarders. He had a sister, also, who lived at the same place. He decided to send his wife and baby to Cumberland, and, in anticipation thereof, sent the following message directed to his mother: "Baby some better though not improving. Doctor thinks best she and Florence go to you for a while. Now have to feed her on bottle and both worn out losing sleep. Wire collect if convenient to have them and we leave soon as can get ready. Can arrange suitable diet for trip. Lovingly." This message was delivered to appellant's operator at Helena on the evening of March 6th about 7:45 o'clock. The operator was not in the office at the time, but told the appellee over the telephone to leave the message there, and that he would come down to the office and send it. It was not sent at all, but was lost, and during the next day the operator, upon inquiry of appellee, informed him, from hour to hour, that no reply had been received. Finally, on March 8th the operator informed appellee that he had lost the message, and that it had never been sent, and suggested to him that he send a day message by another telegraph company, and that he (the operator) would pay the difference between the price of a day and night message. Appellee then sent the message to his mother, and received a prompt reply, and his wife and baby started on the trip the next day. The operator, according to his agreement, paid to appellee the difference between the cost of the day and night message. According to the undisputed evidence, there was a delay of nearly two full days, caused by the negligent omission of appellant's operator. The jury awarded damages to appellee in the sum of $300, and judgment therefor was entered by the court, and an appeal has been duly prosecuted.

We are of the opinion that the evidence does not establish any right to recover damages, in that the testimony as to mental anguish does not bring it within the rules of law which permit recovery of damages. Appellee was not prevented by the delay from starting his wife and baby on their journey; in fact, they did start the next day after receiving reply from his mother, and made the journey successfully. Appellee testified that, when he sent the message, he had fully determined that his wife and baby should go to Cumberland, but the only uncertainty was as to whether he would ask his mother or his sister to receive them, and take care of them. The following is his statement on the subject:

Q. Well, you had every assurance to believe that your mother would welcome your wife and child at her home?

A. Yes; I did.

Q. It was merely a matter of courtesy that you sent the telegram to her?

A. Well, she had some people boarding with her,—some school teachers or some other people, and I never knew whether she had room.

Q. Did you not know that she would make room for you, and your wife, and your child?

A. I thought so.

Q. Were you sure of that?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You knew that, if you had gone on without any telegram, that you would have been welcome?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now, during these two days, if it had proved that it was not convenient for you to have gone there, you could have gone elsewhere?

A. I would, no doubt, have gone to my sister's there in town.

Q. At any event, you were going to one of the two places?

A. Either there or to her mother's.

Q. And you were getting ready, although you never got a reply from your mother, to take it some place?

A. Yes sir; I was naturally uneasy about the child. The baby was better, but not improving.

Q. And your anxiety at that time grew out of the physical condition of your child?

A. Yes, sir; principally. I do not know how much of my anxiety was caused by the physical condition of my child, and how much by a desire to receive a reply from my telegram.

Now, it is clear from this testimony that the mental anxiety suffered by appellee was over the condition of his sick infant. The anxiety concerning the time when his wife and child would leave home, and which one of his relatives in Cumberland would meet them, were mere incidents. It was a species of anxiety that is too remote to attribute to the delay in sending the message, for appellee could have started his wife and child on the journey at any time with the certain knowledge that either his mother or sister would receive and take care of them. His anxiety over the condition of his child was manifestly such that the slightest inconvenience would disturb him; but that does not constitute an element of damages for which the statute allows a recovery.

In the case of Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Archie, 92 Ark. 59, 121 S. W. 1045, we said: "In order to recover damages under the mental anguish doctrine, it is necessary that the mental anguish suffered be real and with cause, and not merely the result of a too sensitive mind or a morbid imagination."

In that case the plaintiff sued to recover damages on account of failure to transmit the reply to a message to her husband notifying him of the birth of their child, and requesting him to come to her immediately, to which he replied, acknowledging the receipt of her message, and saying that he would start immediately. She testified that she was very ill at the time, and suffered mental anxiety on account of her failing to hear from her husband, and was apprehensive, on account of the delay, that he had failed to receive her message. We held, as above stated, that such anxiety did not constitute mental anguish within the meaning of the statute.

The case of Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Reed, 37 Tex. Civ. App. 445, 84 S. W. 296, is directly in point, and the doctrine of the case was approved by this court in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Shenep, 83 Ark. 476, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 886, 119 Am. St. Rep. 145, 104 S. W. 154.

In the Texas case cited, the plaintiff's sister died in another town, and she corresponded by telegraph to know whether the funeral would be postponed in time for her to attend it. There was negligent delay in transmitting the message; but the funeral was, in fact, postponed, and the plaintiff had the opportunity to, and did, attend the funeral. She claimed that she suffered great anxiety on account of the uncertainty as to whether she could attend the funeral, and sought to recover damages on that score. The Texas court held against the right of recovery, and said: "It appears from the petition in this case that the plaintiff was not deprived of the privilege of being present at the funeral of her sister, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

but that the anguish she suffered was from the uncertainty of whether the funeral would be postponed to enable her to be present. She was not deprived of this privilege, and in fact attended the funeral. To allow damages in such a case would be an extension of the rule beyond any decision heretofore made by the supreme court."

So, in the present case, the plaintiff was not deprived of the privilege of sending his wife and daughter away, as recommended by a physician, but merely suffered annoyance on account of the delay and his extreme anxiety concerning the health of his infant. This was, as before stated, too remote to justify a recovery of damages. Howard v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 106 Ark. 559, 153 S. W. 803.

Learned counsel for appellee seek to sustain the right of recovery on the decision of this court in the case of Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Hollingsworth, 83 Ark. 39, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 497, 119 Am. St. Rep. 105, 102 S. W. 681, 13 Ann. Cas. 397. But we do not think the doctrine of that case has any application to the present one. In that case plaintiff suffered real anguish on account of the critical illness of his brother in another town, and the delayed message would have relieved that distress, and he was allowed to recover an account of his suffering during the period of the delay. Here the plaintiff's anxiety was concerning the illness of his child, and, as before stated, the communication with his mother had nothing to do with lessening that anxiety.

We are of the opinion that the evidence does not make out a case, and that it should not have been submitted to the jury. The judgment is therefore reversed, and the cause dismissed.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

LITTLE ROCK FURNITURE MANUFACTURING COMPANY et al., Appts.,

v.

W. M. KAVANAUGH et al.

(— Ark. —, 164 S. W. 289.)

Principal and agent — Liability of committee for supplies.

An executive committee appointed by the citizens of a municipality to have control of the arrangements for the entertainment of an organization which has been invited to meet in the municipality is not personally liable for supplies ordered by it if it sees that the funds contributed for the enterprise are honestly accounted for and equitably disbursed.

Note. — Personal liability of committee appointed at public meeting for services or supplies.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Pulaski County in defendants' favor in an action brought to recover the balance due for supplies ordered by them for the entertainment of an organization holding a reunion in Little Rock. Affirmed.

The authorities upon the above question are not in harmony, in some instances the committee being held personally liable, in others not liable. This conflict, where the party furnishing the supplies or rendering the services knew of the relation of the committee to the project, apparently arises largely from a difference of opinion as to the presumption in the giving of credit, whether presumably credit was given to the committee personally, or whether the services or supplies were furnished in reliance upon the fund which the committee held, or the generosity and good faith of those it represented. Of course, the terms of a special contract may be such in any event, even though indicating that the supplies or services were furnished to a committee, as to create a clear personal liability of its members.

Upon grounds somewhat similar to those on which the decision rests in LITTLE ROCK FURNITURE MFG. CO. v. KAVANAUGH, it was held in Trastour v. Fallon, 12 La. Ann. 25, that members of a "permanent committee" appointed at a public meeting to take charge of the project of building an isthmus railroad to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, subscriptions being taken to defray expenses, were not personally liable to one engaged by them to make a preliminary survey. The burden of proof in this instance, it was said, as to the terms of the contract, was upon the plaintiff, and to hold the defendants liable he must show that he contracted with them personally, or that they misled him by assuming to act for others without sufficient authority; and the evidence was regarded as showing that the plaintiff, knowing of the representative capacity in which the committee acted, looked to the funds held by it, and not to the committee individually, for compensation. The controlling question, it was said, was, whom did the employee trust? And that if no artifice or deception was used in making the contract, and he knew the capacity in which the employers acted, and looked to a special fund to reward him, he could not hold the agents personally liable, if they had not misappropriated the fund.

Statement by Smith J.:

Appellants were plaintiffs below, and alleged in their complaint substantially the following facts: The plaintiffs are corporations, organized under the laws of the state of Arkansas, and are engaged in the manufacture and sale of furniture. At a mass meeting of the citizens of Little Rock, held in the summer of 1910, to arrange plans for entertaining the Confederate Reunion in May, 1911, the defendants were selected as an executive committee, with W. M. Kavanaugh as chairman, to control the arrangements to be made for said reunion. That said mass meeting was a mere voluntary association, not incorporated, and had no legal existence, and could make

67, 40 Am. Dec. 540, members of a committee appointed at a political meeting to arrange for a free public dinner were held liable therefor to one who furnished it at their request. The court distinguished between liability of an entertainment committee appointed by an unorganized temporary body such as that in question, and a committee appointed by a permanent organization such as a club, holding that the presumption of credit in the former case was that the party furnishing the services or supplies relied on the responsibility of the individual members of the committee. The plaintiff testified that he looked for payment to the committee, but the case was apparently decided on the theory of presumption of credit given the committee, rather than on definite proof to that effect. It was said: "Now, it will not be pretended that nobody was responsible to the plaintiff for the order; and, if the defendants were not, who else was? Were they to be viewed as the agents of a club, we would have something palpable to deal with. The question would be whether they had become personally liable by having exceeded their authority, or whether they had not contracted on the credit of their constituents. But a club is a definite association, organized for indefinite existence; not an ephemeral meeting, for a particular occasion, to be lost in the crowd at its dissolution. It would be unreasonable to presume that the plaintiff agreed to trust to a responsibility so desperate, or furnish a dinner on the credit of a meeting which had vanished into nothing. It was already defunct; and we are not to imagine that the plaintiff consented to look to a body which had lost its individuality by the dispersion of its members in the general mass."

It was also held in Eichbaum v. Irons, supra, that members of the committee who had opposed the plan, but eventually yielded to the majority and were present when the order was given, were liable, as well as those who originally favored it, although afterwards, when the dinner was in preparation, the opposing members requested the plaintiff to give the matter up. It was said that if they would have escaped respon-no contracts. That such defendants, as such executive committee, assumed and exercised full control of the affairs of said Confederate Reunion, made all contracts, controlled the collection of the subscriptions and the expenditures of funds, and the making of payments of the obligations incurred in connection with the said reunion. That said defendants, as such executive committee, acted through subcommittees appointed to attend to different departments of the work of caring for the reunion, one of which committees was the eating and lodging committee. That, in caring for the visitors' cots and mattresses were necessary, and were used for the reunion. That on February 23, 1911, the plaintiffs entered into the following contract with the defendants, for the furnishing of cots and mattresses, to wit:

Eating and Lodging Committee, Confederate Reunion,

Little Rock, Ark.

Gentlemen:—We hereby jointly agree to furnish, as per samples shown, woven wire top cots, mattresses, and pillows for use during the Confederate Reunion in Little Rock, at a rental of one dollar and sixty cents ($1.60) for each complete outfit.

Mattresses to be made of felted lintars covered with ticking and tufted sufficiently to hold them in shape, and to weigh 10 pounds. Size 2' 6" x 6' 0". Pillows made of felted lintars, covered with ticking, and to weigh 3 pounds. Complete outfits in lots of 5,000, 10,000, 15,000, or any number designated by committee, will be furnished at above price on the following conditions: Contract for first 10,000 to be placed not later than January 15, 1911. Contract for first additional 5,000 or less to be placed not later than February 15, 1911, and order for all over 15,000 to be placed not later than March 15, 1911. Rents for the above outfits are to be paid as follows: One third cash at the time contract is signed and orders placed; one third when outfits are delivered to places designated; and the balance the day following the close of the reunion, an ample guaranty to be given by the committee that all payments will be made according to above conditions. It is also understood that the committee will reimburse us for all lost or damaged cots, mattresses, or pillows as follows: One dollar ($1) for each cot; one dollar and thirty cents ($1.30) for each mattress, and 30 cents for each pillow. We further agree to submit any damages that may occur to sibility, they should have protested and given up membership at once.

It appears in Eichbaum v. Irons, supra, that only certain members of the committee were sued; but the court dismissed this point by saying that no objection had been made by pleading in abatement nonjoinder of the other members.

Or the principles announced in Eichbaum v. Irons, supra, a committee appointed at a general meeting of creditors to carry on the mining business of the debtor was held liable in Manley v. Hickman, 1 Chester Co. Rep. 557, for commissions to a traveling salesman whom it employed. This conclusion was reached in spite of the fact that the salesman, who himself was a creditor, was present at the meeting of the creditors, and had knowledge at the time of his employment that the defendants were a committee appointed at such meeting. It was said: "The meeting, so far as appears, acted and adjourned without day, and lost its individuality. We have no information as to who were present and would be bound by the appointment. No tangible third party is presented as responsible for the debt. The contract of the plaintiff was with the defendants, and, when it was made, no principal was named, so that the plaintiff might inquire into his or their liability."

In regard to the knowledge of the salesmen of the relation of the committee to the undertaking, it was said in Manley v. Hickman, supra, that the committee undertook to operate the mines, and the salesmen had a right to presume that, having charge of them, they would make provision for the payment of debts; and it would be unreasonable to presume that he entered into the service agreeing to look for his compensation to a party called a "meeting of creditors."

In Powers v. House, 35 Neb. 129, 52 N. W. 849, where, at a public meeting of citizens, a committee was appointed to provide for a survey of a proposed railroad, and to disburse the funds raised at the meeting by subscription for carrying on the project, and the committee employed an engineer at a stated salary to assist in locating the railroad, a member of the committee was held liable for the engineer's salary and expenses, although it appears that the latter, at the time his services were engaged, was informed of the nature of the employment and the relation of the committee thereto. The principal question discussed, however, was whether the engineer had so failed to carry out his part of the contract as to defeat recovery, the court dismissing the point as to whether the defendant was liable on account of being a mere agent, by saying that there was no proof that he acted as agent for anyone in the transaction. No point was made of the fact that process was served upon only one member of the committee.

But in Sloan v. Whitlock, 13 Rich. L. 174, where, at a meeting of persons interested in a graveyard, the defendant and another were named as a committee to have charge of the building of a wall around the yard, it was held that in the absence of a special contract making the defendant personally liable to one whom he employed to do the work, the latter could not recover on an implied contract from the defendant alone for services rendered.

That plaintiffs complied with said contract, upon their part, and furnished the supplies contemplated by the contract to the amount of $17,060.37, and have been paid upon said indebtedness the sum of $13,802.90, leaving due and unpaid to plaintiffs the sum of $3,257.47. That in furnishing said cots and outfits the plaintiffs relied upon the personal liability of the defendants and extended credit to them.

Appellees filed a general demurrer to the complaint, and also a motion to make other parties defendants, and to transfer to chancery.

Where, at a general meeting of master and journeymen boat builders, held for the purpose of making arrangements to celebrate the completion of the Erie canal, a committee of arrangements was appointed, which, through an agent, employed men to build boats for use in the procession, the committee was held liable in M'Cartee v. Chambers, 6 Wend. 649, 22 Am. Dec. 550, for the services of the employees, as against a plea in abatement that the others present at the meeting should have been joined as defendants. It was said that there was nothing to warrant the conclusion that the workmen employed looked to the association, that is, to all the master and journeymen boat builders for their pay, but that the committee employed the workmen, and if anyone was legally responsible, they were; that the association, as it was called, was nothing more than a public meeting of a certain class of mechanics for a special purpose, who designated a committee to carry into effect its resolutions; and that the committee, and not the individuals composing the meeting, were the responsible persons in such cases.

Where, as an inducement to the location of a proposed mill in the town, a committee was appointed at a meeting of citizens to carry out the project of strengthening a

The answer contained a general denial of all the material allegations of the complaint, and alleged: That the executive committee was but a subcommittee of a general committee, composed of persons who actively participated in all plans and arrangements pertaining to said reunion, and that there were, altogether, 40 subcommittees; each having certain authority and responsibility delegated by the general committee. That plaintiffs, as merchants in the city of Little Rock were interested in said reunion, and were active in the promotion thereof, and were part of a small number largely profited thereby. That plaintiffs understood that they must depend upon public subscriptions to raise funds necessary to pay off any demands accruing by reason of any materials furnished or services rendered to said general committee, or to the city of Little Rock, for said reunion, and that said supplies were furnished with the understanding that they would be paid for, if a sufficient fund, was raised by public subscription, and each of said plaintiffs did receive their proper pro rata of all sums so raised. That each of the plaintiffs subscribed to the fund, out of which claims of the nature of plaintiffs were to be paid (that is to say, bridge, so as to sustain cars passing from the railroad to the mill, subscriptions being raised for this purpose, and the committee made a written agreement, reciting that, in consideration of the plaintiffs repairing the bridge, they would pay him certain sums, and affixed their signatures and seals, the members of the committee were held personally liable in Ulam v. Boyd, 87 Pa. 477, although the word "committee" was added to the signatures as well as after the names of the parties in the first clause of the contract, designating by whom it was made. The court said that the fact that the defendants described themselves as a committee did not change the express language of the agreement, which in every part was personal to themselves, and not applicable to any principal, and which they confirmed by their own seals; and that the only effect of the word "committee" was like that of "executor" in a personal obligation,—to identify the transaction, and not to qualify the act.

And in Rowland v. Phalen, 1 Bosw. 43, it was held that parties who "acting as a committee of management of the Italian Opera," made a contract for services of certain artists, in which they undertook to "bind themselves" to carry out the agreement, were personally liable thereon. The words above quoted were said to be at most descriptio personarum, not importing authority to contract for any other person, and not implying that any other person would be bound by their act. R. E. H.

the Little Rock Furniture Manufacturing Company subscribed the sum of $200, and the said Jones House Furnishing Company subscribed the sum of $100); but they have failed to pay their subscriptions.

It was further alleged: That on May 5, 1911, the Confederate Veterans' Reunion Association was incorporated under the laws of the state of Arkansas relating to corporations for benevolent purposes, fair associations, et cetera, the general purpose of which was to arrange and prepare to take care of and entertain the Confederate veterans who might visit the reunion in Little Rock, in May, 1911, and to apply to that purpose all funds and things of value collected by that association, and to do and perform all other acts necessary to carry out the reunion plans. And it was provided that no member of said association should ever be liable for any indebtedness of said association, nor upon any obligation or contract of said association. That this association handled and disbursed all funds raised on account of said reunion, and plaintiffs received from it their proper pro rata share of all its funds.

There appears to be no serious conflict in the evidence. Appellants testified they knew nothing of the incorporation of the Confederate Veterans' Reunion Association, and furnished the supplies sued for under their contract hereinabove set out; and it appears this contract was made before the incorporation of this association, and its existence is therefore of no importance. Appellants say they furnished the supplies on the faith of the credit of the executive committee; but there is no evidence that this committee was so advised, until after the reunion had been held, and the supplies furnished.

It will be observed that the proposition submitted by appellants was a joint one, and the account was kept upon the books of the Little Rock Furniture Manufacturing Company; and it will also be observed that the proposition was addressed to the eating and lodging committee, and it was accepted by that committee, although it was indorsed as accepted by the chairman and secretary of the executive committee.

Wide publicity was given to the reunion, and a very large number of people were concerned in its promotion. A committee solicited funds from the business concerns, and also from the citizens of Little Rock, and a number of other towns of the state raised public subscriptions, and these operations extended over the period of time covered by appellants' contract. Appellants knew the money to defray the expenses of the reunion was being thus raised by popular subscriptions, and each of them had subscribed for that purpose, and one of them made a second subscription to this fund, and the manager of the appellant Jones House Furnishing Company was the chairman of the subcommittee, having the duty of securing the necessary halls. Appellants' proposition called for "an ample guaranty to be given by the committee that all payment will be made according to the above conditions;" but this demand was not insisted upon, although the manager of one of the corporations testified he asked the executive committee for a guaranty, but this request was never complied with. The Confederate Veterans' Reunion Association disbursed all its funds, and there was found to be quite a deficit, but it was supposed that $12,000 would extinguish this deficit, and the quorum court of Pulaski county made an appropriation of that amount for that purpose; but it was found that this appropriation paid only .225 per cent of the balance due the various claimants, and the appropriation was prorated on that basis. Appellants sued for the balance due them, and upon a trial before a jury a verdict was returned in favor of defendants. A number of questions were raised at the trial and are discussed in the briefs, which we find it unnecessary to discuss in this opinion, because of our view of the law applicable to the facts of this case.

Messrs. Jones & Danaher and E. L. McHaney, for appellants:

Each member of an association is liable for the debts thereof incurred during his period of membership, and which have been necessarily contracted for the purpose of carrying out the objects for which the association was formed.

Tracy, 11 Iowa, 530; Drake v. Oskaloosa Normal School, 11 Iowa, 54; M'Cartee v. Chambers, 6 Wend. 649, 22 Am. Dec. 550.

Messrs. Morris M. Cohn and Louis M. Cohn for appellees.

Smith, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellants say the evidence is practically undisputed, and that a verdict should have been directed in their favor. That this is true, because appellees were members of a voluntary association and acted within the scope of their authority in making the contract sued on, and that they are therefore within the rule of law that

"each member of an association is liable for the debts thereof, incurred during his period of membership, and which have been necessarily contracted for the purpose of carrying out the objects for which the association was formed." The law is so stated to be in 4 Cyc. 311. Appellants cite and quote freely from the cases of Lewis v. Tilton, 64 Iowa, 220, 52 Am. Rep. 436, 19 N. W. 911, and Fredendall v. Taylor, 23 Wis. 538, 99 Am. Dec. 203.

In Lewis v. Tilton, supra, r lease had been taken by the executive committee of a temperance club, and in a suit for the rent it was there said: "It is insisted that the lease shows that credit was extended to the club, and that the contract was made with it; that the principal was named; and therefore the defendants cannot be made individually liable. This line of argument possibly would be conclusive if there was a principal. But there is none. The club is a myth. It has no legal existence, and never had. It cannot sue or be sued. The defendants contracted in the name of a supposed principal; that is, they claim there was a principal for whom they were acting, but it now appears that there was no principal known to the law. But, under the allegations of the amended petition, it should be assumed, we think, that there was, as a matter of fact, a body of men associated together for a benevolent purpose, who had assumed the name above stated, for the avowed purpose, by their united efforts, of suppressing intemperance. There is, however, some doubt in our minds whether it can be said that the plaintiff extended credit to an organization that had no legal existence. As the law does not recognize such an organization, we are at a loss to know how or why it can be said as a matter of law that the plaintiff contracted with, and extended credit to, a mere myth. In legal parlance, the organization cannot be named. It has no habitation or place of abode. . . . But it is said these defendants did not contract. They certainly represented that they had a principal, for whom they had authority to contract. They, for or on behalf of an alleged principal, contracted that such principal would do and perform certain things. As we have said, there is no principal, and it seems to us that the defendants should be held liable, and that it is immaterial whether they be so held because they held themselves out as agents for a principal that had no existence, or on the ground that they must, under the contract, be regarded as principals, for the simple reason that there is no other principal in existence." But the force of this opinion as an authority in the 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

instant case is lost when the following language from that case is quoted: "It is also insisted that a fund was provided for the payments of debts, and hence it must be presumed that the plaintiff contracted in reliance upon such fund, and therefore the defendants cannot be made individually liable. What the fact may be we are not advised, but certainly this does not appear on the face of the petition, and we have looked into the lease, and there is no provision in it from which such an inference can be drawn."

In the case of Fredendall v. Taylor, supra, it was decided that "a committee appointed by an unincorporated association to make arrangements for a public exhibition are individually liable for work necessary for the occasion, which a subcommittee of their number procured to be done, although in making the contract the subcommittee assumed to act as officers of the association." But that case was appealed from a judgment returned in favor of defendants by direction of the trial court, and in discussing the facts of that case the court said: "It is not to be presumed in this case that the plaintiff contracted upon the credit of the association. And there is proof tending to show that, although he fully understood that the committee was acting for the association, yet he relied on the personal liability of the committee." The cause was remanded for a new trial, and at this trial the court charged the jury as follows: "If the plaintiff entered into this contract and performed this work, believing that Spencer was acting in that behalf for a committee of the State Fireman's Association, consisting of all the defendants, and if the plaintiff relied for payment upon the personal responsibility of the defendants, whom he believed constituted such committee, then if either Leitch, Kreiss, or Taylor, with full knowledge that Spencer had assumed to act for such committee, that the plaintiff contracted upon the faith of the personal responsibility of the alleged members thereof, and that the work had not been paid for, assured the plaintiff that he should be paid for his work, made no objection to the manner in which the contract had been made, and participated in using the reservoir, such acts, with knowledge of the facts aforesaid, are a ratification of the contract, and render the defendants thus ratifying it liable thereupon; and this although no such committee or subcommittee were in fact appointed, and although the contract was made without the advice, consent, or approval of the defendants so ratifying it, and, further, although the reservoir was unnecessary for the purpose of the tournament." This instruction was approved as a correct declaration of the law, and the court, in approving it, said: "As the defendants had no principal, no legal association or body which they could represent, act for, or bind, they must be held, in all the transactions, to have represented, acted for, and bound only themselves, in the same manner and to the same extent as if there had been no assumed authority to act for the State Fireman's Association." Frendall v. Taylor, 26 Wis. 286.

In the case of Heath v. Goslin, 80 Mo. 310, 50 Am. Rep. 505, it was said: "It is well settled that although a party may be a mere agent, and known to be such, yet if he contracts in his own name, or in his name as agent when his principal is incapable of contracting, or is irresponsible, the law presumes he intended to bind himself. Story, Agency, §§ 281, 282." And in that case a number of authorities, both English and American, were reviewed, and the regents of the school in which the plaintiff had taught were held liable for the teacher's salary, but the court there said: "Had the people subscribed a certain sum to promote the project, to be paid annually, or otherwise, and the defendants had engaged the plaintiff with the understanding that they were the mere agents of this public body to disburse the fund subscribed, she could not have held them personally bound. Story, Agency, 287."

Other cases which discuss and illustrate the principles here involved are Davison v. Holden, 55 Conn. 103, 3 Am. St. Rep. 40, 10 Atl. 515; Bennett v. Lathrop, 71 Conn. 613, 71 Am. St. Rep. 222, 42 Atl. 634; Lawler v. Murphy, 58 Conn. 294, 8 L.R.A. 113, 20 Atl. 457; and other cases cited in notes 61, 62, and 63, 4 Cyc. 311.

In the recent case of Belding v. Vaughan, 108 Ark. 69, 157 S. W. 400, the plaintiffs and defendant were jointly interested in forming a corporation, and defendant signed an agreement for the lease of a machine from the plaintiffs, when the corporation was formed, and agreed to pay a definite sum of money therefor, at a fixed time, but the corporation was never organized. Suit was brought upon the theory that defendant had contracted in the name of a nonexistent principal, and the court there said: "Appellants invoke the familiar rules that one becomes personally liable who acts as agent for an undisclosed principal, or who assumes to act for a principal who does not exist; but neither of those rules are applicable to the facts of the case, for appellee did not act for an undisclosed principal, nor did he assume to act for a principal who did not exist. His undertaking was to act for the principal (the proposed corporation) when it came into existence, and not before. Therefore he is not liable personally. Hersey v. Tully, 8 Colo. App. 110, 44 Pac. 854. If the corporation had in fact been organized pursuant to the terms of the subscription contract, then the obligation of appellee would have been complete, for he undertook to pay as the agent of the corporation when organized, and if, upon the occurrence of that event, authority from the corporation had been withheld, then his personal obligation and liability would have attached, for his undertaking was, as before stated, to pay as agent of the corporation as soon as it was organized. That would have constituted a case of one who had impliedly contracted that he had authority, in the contingency named, to act for the corporation, and the obligation would have rested on him to make good the contract if the actual authority had been withheld. It is also argued that appellee is liable as a promoter of the proposed corporation, who induced a third party to extend credit, and is personally liable. The rule upon which liability in that case rests is however, limited to dealings with strangers who act in expectation of payment from the prospective corporation. 2 Cook, Corp. § 705. The rule does not apply in this case, for the reason that appellants became equally interested with appellee in the promotion of the affairs of the proposed corporation, and there is no reason why either one should be liable to the other except under the strict letter of the contract. If appellee had induced appellants to accept an unconditional obligation of the proposed corporations, then there would be reason for holding him personally liable as a promoter of the corporation; but that is not the case here, for, as before stated, the parties were jointly interested in the enterprise, and by the terms of the contract itself the obligation to pay was based on the condition that the corporation should thereafter be organized. The rule with reference to liability on that score is stated by the author of a recent text-book as follows: 'Promoters are merely persons who, for purposes of their own, bring about the formation of the corporation. In assuming to make contracts in its name or behalf before it comes into existence, they do not stand in the relation of agency, and they represent only themselves, inasmuch as a nonexistent body cannot have agents.' Alger, Promoters and Promotion of Corp. p. 199. Stress is laid upon the language of the contract stating the promise to pay on a definite date, 'or upon the organization of the corporation,' as characterizing the obligation as an absolute one to pay on the date named, whether the organization was completed or not. Authorities are cited in suits based upon promissory notes, where similar obligations are construed to amount to an absolute one to pay on the date named, or earlier upon the happening of a certain contingency. Ordinarily that is the proper interpretation of a written obligation for the payment of money; but when this contract is read as a whole, and in the light of the attending circumstances, it is manifest, as we have already shown, that it was not intended as an absolute and unconditional obligation to pay, but was merely an obligation to pay upon the organization of the corporation, which the parties to this contract were jointly interested in organizing."

Where one assumes to act as agent for another, he impliedly represents that his principal has existence, and that he has authority to act for him, and, if either of these things be false, the agent becomes personally liable. But "when the agent makes full disclosure of the facts constituting his authority, as where he shows to the other party the power of attorney, or letter of instructions under which he acts, the question of his authority becomes a mere question of construction or of law, and no warranty of the sufficiency of the authority can be implied." Tiffany, Agency, § 92; McReavy v. Eshelman, 4 Wash. 757, 31 Pac. 35; Jefts v. York, 10 Cush. 392.

Appellants contracted for the sale of their supplies with full knowledge of all the facts in regard to the connection of appellees with the reunion. These gentlemen were selected to serve upon the executive committee because of their executive capacity and public spirit, and all persons who dealt with them knew the only source of their revenue; appellants had this knowledge, for they were contributors to this public subscription; and all other creditors must also have had this knowledge, for none of them have brought suit for the balances due them.

Facts such as we have stated were evidently in mind of the author when, § 287 of Story on Agency was written. That section reads as follows: "But although it is thus true that persons contracting as agents are ordinarily held personally responsible, where there is no other responsible principal to whom resort can be had, yet the doctrine is not without some qualifications and exceptions, as, indeed, the words 'ordinarily held' would lead one naturally to infer. For, independent of the cases already suggested, where the contract is or may be treated as a nullity, on ac- 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

count of its inherent infirmity or defective mode of execution, other cases may exist, in which it is well known to both of the contracting parties that there exists no authority in the agent to bind other persons for whom he is acting, or that there is no other responsible principal; and yet the other contracting party may be content to deal with the agent, not upon his personal credit or personal responsibility, but in the perfect faith and confidence that such contracting party will be repaid and indemnified by the persons who feel the same interest in the subject-matter of the contract, even though there may be no legal obligation in the case. Thus, for example, if private persons should subscribe, a sum towards some charitable object, and should request an agent to employ tradesmen and others to supply materials to carry it into effect, and it should be distinctly made known by the agent that the tradesmen and others were not to look to him, or to the subscribers personally, for payment, but that they must solely depend upon the success of the charitable subscription and the state of the funds, and the supplies should be furnished with this clear understanding, there could be no doubt that neither the subscribers (at least, beyond their subscriptions) nor the agent would be personally responsible. Such occurrences often take place in cases of voluntary charitable societies, and especially in cases of such charities, conducted by females, some of whom are married and some unmarried, where the tradesmen who furnish supplies are understood to trust entirely to the state of the funds, and to rely for reimbursement solely upon the funds, which may, from time to time, be obtained from charitable and beneficent persons. For it has been well remarked that few persons would be willing to become members of committees of Bible societies, and other voluntary religious and eleemosynary institutions, if they were held to be personally bound . . . for . . . articles furnished in furtherance of such meritorious objects. . . . Similar transactions may take place in relation to agents, acting for the public at large, or for particular public bodies, in cases avowedly beyond the scope of their authority, and yet for the benefit of the public at large, or for particular public bodies, where the other contracting party may rely solely upon the public liberality and sense of justice to award him a suitable compensation, without in any manner giving credit to the agents or looking to them for compensation."

And the same learned author, after discussing fully the liabilities of agents to third persons, said: "The truth, however, is that the same general principle prevails in all these cases, notwithstanding their apparent diversity of form and decision. They are all answered by the same general inquiry. To whom is the credit knowingly given, according to the understanding of both parties? This inquiry is sometimes a matter of fact, as where the contract is verbal and unwritten, and sometimes a matter of law, as where it depends upon the true construction of the terms of a particular written instrument. The law in all these cases pronounces the same decision that he to whom the credit is knowingly and exclusively given is the proper person who incurs liability, whether he be the principal or the agent." Story, Agency, § 288.

Under this test we think appellees are not liable. There is nothing in the proof, as we understand it, which would have given appellants any reasonable right to expect appellees to assume any personal liability to them, or to anyone else. Ignoring the fact that the Confederate Veteran Reunion Association was incorporated and took charge of all the funds, the appellees were acting in a capacity known to all persons who dealt with them, and were chargeable with no higher duty to any creditor than to see that the funds were honestly accounted for and equitably disbursed. This they have done, and the judgment of the court below in their favor will be affirmed.

ERROR to the District Court for the City and County of Denver for review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action to recover under a subrogation clause in a contract of insurance money which plaintiff had paid to defendant on account of a loss alleged to have been covered by the policy. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Garwood & Garwood and Jacob V. Schaezel for plaintiff in error.

Mr. William J. Miles for defendant in error.

Bailey, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff below, an insurance company, brought suit against the defendant in the district court, alleging, in substance, that on or about June 4, 1909, it delivered to the defendant, for certain considerations therein mentioned, an insurance policy covering loss from breakage of certain glass in a building owned by him, situate at number 1421 Arapahoe street, Denver; that aside from $9 paid as premium thereon, there was a further consideration contained therein of subrogation on demand of all rights and equities of the assured against any party or parties causing or liable for any damage or loss covered by the policy; that thereafter, while the policy was in full force and effect, a third party made an excavation on a lot immediately adjoining defendant's lot and building, causing his building to collapse, thereby breaking and destroying, among other things, the glass insured by the policy; that defendant made claim against the wrongdoer, in pursuance of which it paid him $1,000, which he accepted in full satisfaction of all damage to his property, and made and delivered to the wrongdoer a complete release in writing; that plaintiff made good the loss and damage by replacing the glass destroyed, according to the term of its contract, at a cost to itself of $143.15; that it made demand of defendant for that much of the money so received from the wrongdoer, which he refused to pay, wherefore it prays judgment for that amount, with interest. A demurrer was interposed and overruled. Defendant answering admitted the contract and settlement as alleged, but set up as new matter that the actual damage to his property was in excess of $5,000, and that the $1,000 was accepted from the wrongdoer to avoid litigation, and did not include the glass covered by the policy; that plaintiff, fully advised of the settlement and release between himself and the wrongdoer, voluntarily replaced the glass destroyed; that plaintiff did not make demand for a subrogation until about eighteen months after the damage occurred, having knowledge of the antecedent settlement, whereupon a subrogation receipt was assigned and delivered to it. On motion, judgment was entered on the pleadings, against defendant in the sum of $153.25. The only evidence submitted was proof of corporate capacity, to which no objection was made. A motion for new trial was overruled. Defendant brings the cause here on error.

Did the court below commit error in granting the motion for judgment on the pleadings? The answer avers that the plaintiff company, in replacing the glass, did so with full knowledge of the antecedent settlement between defendant and his tortfeasor. This averment was not denied. The law applicable to these facts is clear. The company's capacity under its contract was simply to indemnify for loss covered by it. As a general rule, recovery by the insured from the third party releases the insurer from liability. 19 Cyc. 883-894. In Dilling v. Draemel, 16 Daly, 104, 9 N. Y. Supp. 497, involving a similar state of facts, this was said:

"It is well settled that, if a loss under a policy of insurance is occasioned by the wrongful act of a third party, the insurer occupies the position of a mere surety, and the wrongdoer that of a principal debtor; and all the incidents of suretyship attach to the position of the underwriter in such a case, including the right of subrogation. . . . The same principle is applicable to a contract of insurance if the surety destroys the remedy of subrogation, and relieves the assurer to the full extent to which the wrongdoer could have been made liable for the loss."

And Packham v. German F. Ins. Co. 91 Md. 515, 50 L.R.A. 828, 80 Am. St. Rep. 461, 46 Atl. 1066, approving Dilling v. Draemel, supra, held that there could be no recovery on an insurance policy where the assured had been indemnified by the person causing the injury, since by settling with the tortfeasor the insurer's right of subrogation was destroyed.

"The liability of the wrongdoer is, in legal effect, first and principal, and that of the insurer secondary, not in order of time, but in order of ultimate liability." May, Ins. § 454.

Under the authorities, and in the light of reason, an insurer who undertakes to indemnify the assured, with full knowledge of an antecedent settlement between him and the party causing the injury, does so at its peril, is a mere volunteer, and cannot recover of the insured under the subrogation clause of the contract, because the right to subrogation, under such circumstances, has been destroyed.

The complaint stated a cause of action, but a good defense was tendered when the answer alleged knowledge before indemnifying defendant, on the part of plaintiff, of the former's settlement with the wrongdoer, and since there was no issue on this alleged fact, the court erred in rendering judgment for plaintiff on the pleadings. It must be reversed and the cause remanded, with leave to plaintiff to reply to the answer, if he shall be so advised.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded.

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS.

ALEXANDER CRISTILLY, Admr., Appt.,
v.

CHARLES H. WARNER.

(87 Conn. 461, 88 Atl. 711.)

Conflict of laws — enforcement of foreign statute — penalty for death.

1. The courts of one state in which the penalization of negligence resulting in death is against public policy will not enforce a statute of another state giving a cause of action in tort for negligently killing a person the damages in which are to be assessed according to the degree of culpability, which statute is construed in the state of its origin as penal in its nature.

Same — limitation period — wrongful death.

2. The limitation period provided by a statute giving a right of action for negligent death governs actions brought in other states.

(October 30, 1913.)

Note. — For jurisdiction of action for death under statute of another state as affected by penal remedial character of the statute, or differences between the lex loci delicti and lex fori as to the character of damages, see notes to Boston & M. R. Co. v. Hurd, 56 L.R.A. 193, 205, 206, 209, 210, and Rochester v. Wells, F. & Co. Exp. 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1095, and see also later case, Strait v. Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. 49 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1068. The criterion of penal statutes within the rule that such statutes will not be enforced outside of the jurisdiction in which they are enacted is also discussed in Great Western Machinery Co. v. Smith, 41 L.R.A. (N.S.) 379, and note thereto; the specific subject there involved being the extraterritorial enforcement of the statutory liabilities of directors of corporations.

The law governing limitation where an action is brought in one state upon a cause of action by a statute of another is treated in the note to Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Burkhart, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) 687.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for New Haven County sustaining a demurrer to the complaint in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Francis P. Guilfoile and Clayton L. Klein, for appellant:

Whoeler, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complaint states that the defendant was operating his automobile in a negligent manner upon a street in a thickly settled part of Springfield, Massachusetts, at an unreasonable speed, and contrary to the ordinances of said city and the laws of the commonwealth; that without warning, although notified of the danger to the plaintiff's intestate,—a five-year old child,—and without reducing the speed of his automobile, or attempting to avoid a collision with the child, because of his reckless and negligent operation, he ran his automobile upon the child, who in the exercise of due care was then crossing the street, and caused her the injuries from which she shortly died. The complaint further states that at the time of the collision the law of Massachusetts was, and still is: "If a person or corporation by his or its negligence, or by the negligence of his or its agents or servants while engaged in his or its business, causes the death of a person who is in the exercise of due care and not in his or its employment or service, he or it shall be liable in damages in the sum of not less than $500 nor more than $10,000, to be assessed with reference to the degree of his or its culpability or of that of his or its agents or servants, to be recovered in an action of tort, commenced within two years after the injury which caused the death, by the executor or administrator of the deceased, one half thereof to the use of the widow, and one half to the use of the children of the deceased; or, if there are no children, the whole to the use of the widow; or, if there is no widow, the whole to the use of the next of kin." Section 2, chapter 171, Revised Laws of Massachusetts, as amended by chapter 375, Acts and Resolves Mass., 1907. The action is thus based upon this statute. The demurrer to the complaint rests upon three grounds: (1) That the statute is a penal one; (2) that it is contrary to the public policy of Connecticut; and (3) that the action was not brought by an administrator duly qualified in Connecticut within one year from the date of accident. The trial court sustained the demurrer upon ground 1.

It is a general principle of our law that the plaintiff has the right to enforce in our courts any legal right of action which he may have, whether it arise under our own law or of that of another jurisdiction. Vanbuskirk v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 14 Conn. 583.

There are certain recognized exceptions to this general rule. We do not enforce foreign statutes which are penal, or rights arising thereunder.

Nor do we enforce the law of another jurisdiction, nor rights arising thereunder, which we conceive "to be injurious to our public rights," or to the "interests of our citizens," nor those which "offend our morals or contravene our [public] policy or violate our positive laws." Vanbuskirk v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 14 Conn. 583, 592.

In construing a foreign statute we accept the construction of the statute adopted by the highest tribunal of the jurisdiction of the state. Crum v. Bliss, 47 Conn. 592, 599.

No action lay under the common law of Massachusetts to recover damages for death through negligence. Carey v. Berkshire R. Co. 1 Cush. 475, 48 Am. Dec. 616. By statute (Stat. 1840, chap. 80) a remedy was provided against a carrier of passengers, for the death of a passenger through its negligence, by indictment and fine within certain limits, "to be greater or smaller according to the degree of culpability attached to the defendant, and not to the loss suffered. The fine was distributed to the widow and heirs. This statute has always been held in Massachusetts a penal one.

It was pointed out in Carey v. Berkshire R. Co. that this statute and the English statute, Lord Campbell's act, were framed on different principles, the latter upon the principle of damages proportioned to the injury, the former upon the principle of punishment. "The penalty, when thus recovered, is conferred on the widow and heirs, not as damages for their loss, but as a gratuity from the commonwealth." Com. v. Boston & L. R. Corp. 134 Mass. 211, 213.

Later on an action of tort for a death was given against a railroad (Stat. 1881, chap. 199) as an additional remedy to that by indictment, and the act provided that the damages should be "assessed with reference to the degree of culpability of said corporation or of its servants or agents." The court held this remedy was penal. Littlejohn v. Fitchburg R. Co. 148 Mass. 478, 482, 2 L.R.A. 502, 20 N. E. 103. "Originally," the court said, "the remedy was by indictment. Afterwards it was extended to an action of tort. . . . But only one of the remedies can be pursued by the executor or administrator. . . . It is in substance a penalty given to the widow and children and next of kin, instead of to the commonwealth, and as such the intestate could not release the defendant from liability for it." Doyle v. Fitchburg R. Co. 162 Mass. 66, 71, 25 L.R.A. 157, 44 Am. St. Rep. 335, 37 N. E. 770, 771.

The remedy of tort was extended to railways. And thereafter the court said: "The conclusion which has been reached as to 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the character of these two acts (Stat. 1881, chap. 199, and Stat. 1886, chap. 140) could not have been avoided. It had to be held that these acts gave a civil remedy for the recovery of a penalty imposed by way of punishment. . . . It was provided that the amount to be recovered in the action of tort was 'to be assessed with reference to the degree of culpability of said corporation or of its servants or agents.' That fixed the character of the action of tort under these two acts. . . . By that provision the effect of these two acts was to give a civil remedy for the recovery of a penalty imposed by way of punishment." Hudson v. Lynn & B. R. Co. 185 Mass. 510, 517, 71 N. E. 66, 67, 16 Am. Neg. Rep. 366.

This form of remedy was extended to other defendants, until the general statute, providing an action against any person or corporation, appeared in its present form, in chapter 375, Acts and Resolves 1907. Under the remedy by indictment for a negligent death, or that in tort, the fine was imposed and the damages assessed on the same basis, according to the degree of culpability, and not according to the loss. Of this statute (chapter 375, Acts and Resolves 1907) the supreme court of Massachusetts thus expressed itself: "The statute may be designated as remedial for the reason that a remedy is provided where before its enactment none existed. But the damages assessed are distinctly grounded upon the defendant's culpable misconduct, and are diminished or enhanced according to the degree of his delinquency." Brown v. Thayer, 212 Mass. 392, 399, 99 N. E. 237. This is the latest utterance of that court upon this subject, and we think, in the light of the uniform construction given this language when found in the various statutes affording the remedy by indictment and in tort, that it should be regarded as final.

The expressions found in Brooks v. Fitchburg & L. Street R. Co. 200 Mass. 8, 86 N. E. 289, and Grella v. Lewis Wharf Co. 211 Mass. 54, 97 N. E. 745, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 1136, that the statute is a remedial one, were not inaccurate, as applied to the situation discussed, although without explanation apt to prove somewhat misleading. The statute is in a sense a remedial one; for it has, step by step, in its progress of amendment, furnished a remedy where none existed before. Other tribunals have reached a similar view of similar statutes and of the law of Massachusetts. Adams v. Fitchburg R. Co. 67 Vt. 76, 48 Am. St. Rep. 800, 30 Atl. 687; O'Reilly v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 16 R. I. 388, 5 L.R.A. 364, 6 L.R.A. 719, 17 Atl. 171, 906, 19 Atl. 244.

We have never allowed a recovery in a case of a negligent death upon any theory save that of just compensation. We have never penalized for such a wrong. To permit this to be done would be against our public policy, and comity does not require that we enforce the statute of a foreign jurisdiction which is so manifestly contrary to the public policy of our law. Vanbuskirk v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. supra. This rule is of universal recognition. Higgins v. Central New England & W. R. Co. 155 Mass. 176, 31 Am. St. Rep. 544, 29 N. E. 534; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Cox, 145 U. S. 593, 36 L. ed. 829, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 905.

The action was begun by the administrator appointed in Massachusetts shortly after the accident. Subsequently, without objection, the administrator appointed in Connecticut became a party, within two years, but over one year, subsequent to the accident.

One cause of demurrer is that the action was not brought within one year, the period of limitation within which, under chapter 193, Pub. Acts 1903, actions for just damages for injuries resulting in death must be brought. The present action is not of the character of the actions provided for by our statute of limitations, and it has no relation to an action to recover a penalty. Moreover, the Massachusetts statute limits the recovery of the penalty to two years, and actions thereunder are governed by its limitation.

There is no error.

In this opinion the other judges concur, except Beach, J., who dissents.

Beach, J., dissenting:

I dissent from the conclusion that the Massachusetts statute is a penal statute in the international sense, and from the conclusion that its enforcement would contravene the public policy of the state of Connecticut.

Upon the question of what laws are penal in an international sense so that they will not be enforced by a foreign court, the decisions are in hopeless conflict; but, looking to the reason of the rule, I think that the English, Privy Council and the Supreme Court of the United States are right in holding that it should extend no further than to the criminal law; that is, to public wrongs as distinguished from private rights. Huntington v. Attrill, 8 Times L. R. 341, [1893] A. C. 150; Huntington v. Attrill, 146 U. S. 657, 36 L. ed. 1123, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 224. The rule appears to me to be properly stated as follows: "The test is not by what name the statute is called by the legislature or the courts of the state in which it was passed, but whether it appears to the tribunal which is called upon to enforce it to be, in its essential character and effect, a punishment of an offense against the public, or a grant of a civil right to a private person." Huntington v. Attrill, 146 U. S. 683, 36 L. ed. 1133, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 233. "In its ordinary acceptation, the word 'penal' might embrace penalties for infractions of general law, which did not constitute offenses against the state; it might, for many legal purposes, be applied with perfect propriety to penalties created by contract; and it, therefore, when taken by itself, failed to mark that distinction between civil rights and criminal wrongs, which was the very essence of the international rule." Huntington v. Attrill, 146 U. S. 681, 36 L. ed. 1132, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 233, citing Lord Watson's opinion in the English case.

There are good reasons why the courts of one state cannot redress the public wrongs of another; and one of them is found in the obvious futility of one sovereign attempting to punish an offense which another sovereign has the right to pardon at will, either before or after sentence. But there seems to be no logical reason for refusing to enforce a foreign-created private right of action, which is transitory in its nature, simply because the defendant's conduct is, by the foreign law, independently punishable as a public wrong, or because the civil remedy in damages afforded by the foreign statute is more or less punitive in intention or effect, on account of the aggravated character of the wrong.

As this court said, in Plumb v. Griffin, 74 Conn. 133, 50 Atl. 2: "Penal statutes, strictly and properly, are those imposing punishment for an offense against the state; and the expression, 'penal statutes,' does not ordinarily include statutes which give a private action against a wrongdoer."

We have many such statutes. For example, General Statutes, § 1101, gives treble damages for theft; § 1102, double damages for forgery; § 1103, treble damages for removal of bridge; § 1104, treble damages for injury to milestone; § 1105, treble damages for vexatious suit; § 1097, treble damages for wrongfully cutting down large, and $1 each for small, trees, but only actual damages if the trespass was through mistake; and chapter 216 of the Public Acts of 1905, as amended by chapter 268 of the Public Acts of 1909, authorizes the court to double or treble the actual damages, according to the circumstances of the case, in suits for injuries caused by neglect to conform to the law of the road. In all these cases the excess over actual damages is as-assessed because of the defendant's criminal, malicious, or reckless conduct; and, in the case of the last two statutes referred to, the amount of the damages is assessed with reference to the degree of the defendant's culpability.

Yet none of these statutes are held to be penal. In Plumb v. Griffin, supra, § 1097 (then § 1345 of Revisal 1888) was held not to be a "penal statute" within the meaning of our statutes of limitations; and in the course of that opinion it was said: ". . . In the same chapter of the statutes in which is this section—§ 1345—there is another, which provides that 'every person who steals any property of another, or knowingly receives and conceals stolen property, shall pay the owner treble its value.' This has never been regarded as a penal statute. . . . Another section—§ 1350—provides that every person who shall make and utter any forged or counterfeit document shall pay to the party injured double damages. This statute has been held by this court, in Ross v. Bruce, 1 Day, 100, not to be a penal statute, so that an action upon it would be barred by the lapse of one year." And in Lamphear v. Buckingham, 33 Conn. 237, 246, we held that our statute of 1866 (Gen. Stat. 1866, title 7, chap. 7), providing for a minimum recovery of $1,000 in case the life of any passenger, in the exercise of due care, should be lost by the negligence of a railroad company, was not a penal statute, saying: "Moreover, we think the defendants' mistake in assuming the statute to be a penal one. It does not provide a penalty for the breach of a positive law or for a public wrong. It recognizes the fact that it is or may be a serious injury to the family and heirs of a person to have him or her removed by sudden and premature death, and the peculiar damage of such removal from a negligent management of railroads, and provides for compensation to the family or heirs in case of such death, and lacks some of the essential characteristics of a penal statute."

Our own definition of a "penal statute," in the strict and proper sense of that phrase, is therefore in accord with Huntington v. Attrill, supra, and I do not understand that the opinion of the court expresses any different view. It reaches the conclusion that the Massachusetts courts have characterized the statute as a penal statute, and then appears to hold that we are bound by that characterization. I agree that we must ordinarily accept the construction which the courts of another state have put upon its statutes. But the question here is not simply what the language of the statute means, but whether 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) it is so far penal that our courts cannot properly enforce it; and it seems clear that upon a question of the extent of our own jurisdiction, we ought not to surrender our own conceptions of what is a penal statute, and be controlled by the opinion of a foreign court. "The court appealed to must determine for itself, in the first place, the substance of the right sought to be enforced, and, in the second place, whether its enforcement would, either directly or indirectly, involve the execution of the penal law of another state. Were any other principle to guide its decision, a court might find itself in the position of giving effect in one case and denying effect in another to suits of the same character, in consequence of the causes of action having arisen in different countries, or in the predicament of being constrained to give effect to laws which were, in its own judgment, strictly penal." Huntington v. Attrill, 146 U. S. 682, 36 L. ed. 1133, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 233.

Moreover, the Massachusetts decisions hold, and the opinion of the court agrees, that the statute is in a sense a remedial one; and so it seems that the real objection is not that the statute is strictly and properly a penal statute, under the decisions in either jurisdiction, but that its enforcement would contravene the settled public policy of the state of Connecticut, either because it imposes a minimum recovery of $500, or because the excess damages, if any, are to be assessed with reference to the degree of the defendant's culpability. I do not think the objection is sound in either branch of it.

We do assess damages in some statutory cases with reference to the degree of the defendant's culpability, as already pointed out. And in actions of tort generally we do assess smart money in addition to actual loss, or legal damages with reference to the degree of the defendant's culpability, not exceeding, however, the probable estimated cost of the trial. "In actions of tort, founded on the misconduct or culpable negligence of the defendant, it is usual and entirely proper for the judge to say to the jury that they are not necessarily confined in assessing damages to the actual loss of property to the plaintiff, but may allow smart money, measured by the circumstances of aggravation, and may, from their general knowledge of the course of the courts, if the case warrants it in their judgment, take into account the expenses of the trial beyond the taxable costs." Mason v. Hawes, 52 Conn. 12, 14, 52 Am. Rep. 552.

Damages assessed because of and with reference to the degree of the defendant's culpability may be, and generally are, compensatory in their nature, although they embrace injuries or expenses not included in strict legal damages, and although (as in the case of statutes imposing a minimum recovery for death resulting from negligence) they include damages only presumptively suffered. Clearly it is not against any general policy of this state to permit the recovery of such damages within the limitations of our own rule on the subject.

Turning to the specific case of death caused by negligence, it is by no means certain that an administrator may not, in some cases, be entitled, within the limitations of our rule, to recover damages assessed with reference to the degree of the defendant's culpability. The damages in such cases are "on the same grounds, and measured by the same rule, as if the action had been brought by her intestate in his lifetime." Wilmot v. McPadden, 79 Conn. 367, 378, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1101, 65 Atl. 157, 161. Take the case of Kling v. Torello, — Conn. —, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) 930, 87 Atl. 987, where the plaintiff, being mortally injured by an atrocious assault, brought suit in his lifetime, and after his death an administrator entered to prosecute. Or suppose one, mortally injured through the defendant's reckless disregard of the law of the road, should sue in his lifetime, under chapter 216 of the Public Acts of 1905, and the administrator, after his death, enter to prosecute. At least, the law is not so clear as to justify the declaration of a public policy forbidding such recoveries. Assuming that the damages, in excess of the minimum provided for by the statute, are strictly exemplary because assessed with reference to the degree of the defendant's negligence, I am unable to agree that there is any public policy of this state which should prevent the plaintiff from recovering such damages in this action within the limitation of our rule.

As to the minimum recovery of $500 imposed by the statute, we have had, in the past, statutes imposing a minimum recovery for death caused by negligence, although we have none to-day. Such recoveries are regarded as roughly compensatory, though in any given case they may not be so. Lamphear v. Buckingham, 33 Conn. 237. So the Massachusetts court has said of the statute in question that a leading object is "to secure some pecuniary provision for those who may be dependent upon the deceased." Com. v. Boston & A. R. Co. 121 Mass. 36, 37. I think these two decisions settle the point that the minimum recovery of $500 imposed by this statute is not penal, and is compensatory, and that the recovery of the minimum sum of $500 in this case, together with such additional damages, if any, as the jury might assess with reference to the degree of the defendant's culpability, not exceeding the probable cost of the litigation, would not violate any public policy or legal tradition of the state of Connecticut.

Upon the general question whether we will enforce rights arising under foreign statutes of this kind, I think we are controlled in principle by the decision in Huntington v. Attrill, supra, which decides that after the original liability under such a statute has passed into judgment in one state, the courts of another state are bound, by the Constitution and laws of the United States, to give full faith and credit to that judgment (so far as any objection founded on the penal nature of the action is concerned), unless the judgment is in its essential character and effect a punishment of an offense against the public as distinguished from a judgment founded on a private civil right. In accordance with that decision we should be bound to give effect to a Massachusetts judgment founded on this statute; and, as it is clear upon principle and authority that "the essential nature and real foundation" of the action is the same, whether reduced to judgment or not (Wisconsin v. Pelican Ins. Co. 127 U. S. 265, 32 L. ed. 239, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1370), I think that, being bound to accept the principle in part, we ought to accept it as far as it is applicable.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

ABRAHAM KUH et al., Plffs. in Err.,
v.

EUGENE O'REILLY, JR., et al.

(261 Ill. 437, 104 N. E. 5.)

Party wall — right to maintain openings.

1. An agreement for a party wall to be erected between two adjoining lots, to extend throughout the whole distance of the dividing lines, requires a solid wall throughout the entire length and height.

Same — right of one paying for construction.

2. That one of the parties to a party-wall agreement constructs the wall at his own expense, to be reimbursed when the other party makes use of it, does not entitle him to maintain openings in the wall until the other party uses it.

The question whether closing or opening windows or other apertures in a party wall amounts to an eviction of a tenant is treated in the note to Holden v. Tidwell, 49 L.R.A. (N.S.) 369.

Interest — on money due under party-wall agreement.

3. That a party to a party-wall agreement contends in good faith his obligation to contribute to the cost of the wall upon making use of it, because the other party has wrongfully made openings in the wall, does not relieve him from the duty to pay interest from the time he made use of the wall, where the openings did not materially interfere with his use of the wall.

Party wall — compelling restoration.

4. Successors in title to one of the parties to a party-wall agreement may compel a restoration of the wall to a solid condition by the other party to the agreement who has made openings therein for windows and steam-pipe exhausts, although the cost of the wall was borne by the latter and the former is not ready to use the portions of the wall where the openings exist.

ERROR to the Appellate Court, First District, to review a judgment reversing in part a decree of the Superior Court for Cook County in favor of complainants in a suit to enforce the provisions of a certain party-wall contract. Reversed in part.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Lessing Rosenthal and Leo F. Wormser, with Messrs. Rosenthal & Hamill, for plaintiffs in error:

Even if "party wall" means solid wall, yet the provision that it "shall be and remain a party wall" applies only after it has become a party wall by payment from the O'Reillys.

Mr. M. J. Dunne, for defendants in error:

A party wall means a solid wall of brick or stone, without windows or other openings, and neither party has the right to make openings or place windows in the wall.

A party wall must be built, maintained, and used according to the terms and meaning of the agreement of the parties, and if either party violate such agreement in regard to the erection, maintenance, or use of such wall, he is a wrongdoer and trespasser, and creates a nuisance.

F. v. Bond*, 147 Ind. 437, 45 N. E. 338, 46 N. E. 825; St. John v. Sweeney, 59 How. Pr. 175.

The wall was not built, used, and maintained in accordance with the agreement entered by the owners of the adjoining lands, but was used in a way that makes complainants trespassers and wrongdoers, and the wall a private nuisance.

Equity will grant relief by injunction to prevent and restrain such a violation of a party-wall agreement, and it is not necessary to show any injury to defendants in error or their tenants, nor any damaging effect on the value of their property.

Although defendants do not use, and may not intend at present to use, that portion of the wall in which complainants made and maintain openings, it does not excuse them for their wrongdoing, even though defendants have not paid any part of the cost of the wall.

As the complainants were to build and did build this party wall, they should have built, maintained, and used it according to the terms of the agreement, before the de-defendants were obliged to perform their part of the contract.

As this wall was not built according to the contract, and is not maintained as a party wall, defendants were not obliged to pay any part of the cost or value of the wall while it was in that condition, but they had a right to use the wall for their own purposes.

Farmer, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case comes to this court by writ of certiorari to review a judgment of the appellate court for the first district, reversing, in part, a decree of the superior court of Cook county, and remanding the cause to that court, with directions.

Plaintiffs in error (hereafter called complainants) filed their bill in chancery in the superior court of Cook county, to enforce the provisions of a certain party-wall contract. At the time of making said party-wall contract, complainants and Eugene O'Reilly owned adjoining parcels of land in the city of Chicago. Defendants in error (hereafter called defendants) have succeeded to the title of Eugene O'Reilly to the lot or parcel of land owned by him at the time said contract was made. Defendants' land was at the northwest corner of the intersection of Van Buren and Franklin streets, and faced 100 feet on Van Buren and 50 feet on Franklin streets. Complainants owned the land adjoining defendants' lot on the north and west. On March 3, 1892, the then owners of the lots entered into a written agreement, the material parts of which are as follows:

"First. That the walls of said building facing the premises of said second party on the north and west ends of said east one hundred (100) feet of said lot one (1) shall be and remain a party wall, and shall be built upon the dividing line between the said premises of the said parties, and shall be of brick, with stone and metal and concrete foundations, . . . and said wall shall stand equally upon their respective parcels of land, . . . and said wall shall extend throughout the whole distance of said dividing lines.

"Second. Said second party may join to and use said wall, or any part thereof, at any time after the same shall have been built, by first causing said wall to be of proper strength and thickness to sustain the weight which he intends that the same shall bear, and further by complying with the other provisions and covenants herein contained."

"Fourth. In case said party wall, original, extended, or restored, shall be totally or partially destroyed, or should it be necessary to repair the same or any portion thereof, either party hereto may repair or rebuild the same, and the expense of rebuilding or repairing shall be borne equally by the parties hereto, their heirs or assigns, as to so much of said wall as they may be using in common. . . ."

"Sixth. Whenever said second party intends to join to and use said wall, original or restored, as hereinbefore provided, or whenever thereafter either of the said parties shall use any addition to said wall built by the other party, the one so using shall first pay to the other party, or those claiming under him or them, owners for the time being of the land of the party who built such wall or addition, one half of the value, at that time, of so much of said wall or of such addition, including the foundations under the same, as he or they may use, and in computing the value of said wall or any addition thereto, the service of architects, and labor expended and performed in respect thereof, shall be taken account of and considered."

Within a year after the making of said contract, complainants erected on their south and east lines, dividing their and defendant's property, a wall seven stories high, which was part of a seven-story building erected upon complainants' lot. The wall erected on said division lines was a substantial, solid wall throughout its length and height, and was constructed according to the terms of the agreement. In 1901 complainants, over the protest and objections of defendants, cut six large openings through the wall, placed large windows therein, and attached to the side of the wall, over defendants' premises, hinges upon which they placed iron window shutters which extended and swung over defendants' premises. Complainants also made an opening in the wall, and placed therein a large steam exhaust pipe, which projected $1\frac{1}{2}$ or 2 feet over defendants' premises, from which steam and vapor were expelled. Complainants also placed anchor rods through said wall, with heads about 16 inches in diameter and extending some 4 inches over the premises of defendants. Defendants afterwards, being desirous of using a part of the party wall as a part of a building they proposed to construct upon their lot, notified complainants to remove the anchor rods, steam pipe, window shutters, and hinges, and to close the window openings and reconstruct the wall as it was originally constructed. Defendants also notified the complainants of their intention to erect a building on their lot, and that, unless complainants restored the wall to its original condition, defendants would use part of it as a part of their structure, without paying one half the value of the part so used. Complainants did not comply with this demand of defendants, and shortly thereafter defendants began the construction of a four-story building, and, in so doing, used so much of the party wall as was necessary, but refused to pay complainants anything for the part so used, and thereupon complainants brought this suit.

The bill, after setting out the ownership of the premises, the party-wall agreement, and the construction of the wall by complainants, alleged that defendants were violating the agreement by using a part of the wall without paying for it. The bill prayed that the defendants be decreed to pay one half the value of the part of the wall used and proposed to be used by them; that the amount, when ascertained, be decreed to be a lien upon defendants' premises; and that defendants be enjoined from using the wall without paying one half the value of the part used by them. Defendants answered the bill, admitting the agreement, but alleging the wall was not a solid wall, as required by the agreement, but contained a number of windows and openings over defendants' premises, which prevented the wall from being a party wall, and further set up the placing of the anchor rods through the wall with heads projecting 4 inches over the premises of defendants, also that a steam exhaust pipe projected about 2 feet over the said premises, from which were emitted steam and vapor, making loud and disagreeable noises. The answer further averred that, by reason of the openings in the wall, defendants' premises were exposed to great danger of fire from complainants' building; that said openings prevented said wall from being a party wall; that complainants were trespassers, and had no right to contribution for any part of the value of the said wall; that papers and rubbish were thrown out from complainants' building over and upon the roof of defendants' building, and that defendants were entitled to compensation for damages by reason of the matters set up in the answer. Defendants also filed a cross bill, praying that complainants in the original bill be enjoined from interfering with the use of the wall by defendants, and that complainants be ordered and decreed to make the wall solid by closing all openings therein adjoining and overlooking defendants' premises, and that they be ordered to remove the projections that encroached upon defendants' premises. Complainants answered the cross bill, and the cause was heard before the chancellor. The decree found that the wall stood equally upon the land belonging to complainants and defendants; that several years after it was built complainants cut six openings through the wall for windows, without the consent and against the objections of defendants; that said windows were more than 15 feet above that part of the wall used by defendants, and did not interfere with the construction of their building. The decree found that the window sills, iron window shutters, steam pipe, iron bolts and heads, projecting from the wall over and upon the premises of defendants, constituted trespasses that should be removed by complainants, but that defendants were not entitled to any other relief under their cross bill. The decree ordered defendants to pay complainants $5,034.48, which the chancellor found to be the value of one half of that part of the wall used by defendants, together with $2,208.21 interest, that being 5 per cent per annum on the amount found due complainants from the 20th day of June, 1901, within twenty days, and that, in default of the payment, the premises of defendants be sold to satisfy said sum. Defendants prosecuted an appeal to the appellate court, and that court held that the superior court erred in refusing to grant the prayer of the cross bill that complainants be required to fill the openings in the wall where the windows were placed, and restore the wall to its original condition by making it a solid wall throughout its entire length and height, and in allowing interest upon the amount fixed as the value of that part of the wall used by defendants. That part of the decree of the superior court finding the value of that part of the wall used by defendants to be $5,034.48, and that defendants were liable to complainants in that sum, was affirmed. The decree was therefore reversed in part and remanded, with directions to the superior court to grant the prayer of the cross bill that the window openings be filled and the wall restored to its original condition, and, upon it being made satisfactorily to appear that that had been done, the defendants be decreed to pay complainants $5,034.48, and that the same be made a lien upon defendants' premises.

There is no substantial controversy about the facts. The chancellor found that the wall was originally built in substantial conformity to the written agreement, and that finding was approved by the appellate court. As originally constructed the wall was a solid wall throughout its length and height, and stood one half on complainants' and one half on defendants' premises. It was maintained in that condition seven or eight years before the window openings were made in it and the projections placed on the wall. Previous to those changes defendants had not not used any part of the wall by the erection of a building on their premises. Upon learning that complainants were making openings in the wall, defendants notified them to desist, and demanded that they restore the wall to its original condition, but complainants continued until they had completed the openings and placed windows therein and hung shutters on the outside of the wall. Afterward they made another opening, from which a steam exhaust pipe projected. Subsequently defendants notified complainants of their intention to erect a building and use a part of the party wall in doing so, and that, because of the violation of the party-wall agreement, and the invasion of defendants' rights, defendants had sustained damages, and that, by refusing to restore the wall to its original condition, complainants had forfeited their right to contribution from defendants for any part of the wall. Thereafter defendants erected a building four stories high, using the party wall to that extent in doing so. The windows made by complainants in the wall were in the sixth and seventh stories, and were therefore above the roof of defendants' building.

Complainants contend that the contract does not expressly require the wall to be a solid wall throughout its entire length and height, and that no such intention of the parties can be fairly implied from the terms of the agreement. The first clause of the agreement provides that the wall shall be built on the dividing line between said premises, and "shall be and remain a party wall," and "shall extend throughout the whole distance of said dividing lines." The second clause authorizes defendants to join to and use the wall, or any part of it, by complying with the provisions of the agreement. The sixth clause authorizes defendants to join to and use said wall upon first paying to complainants one half of the value, at that time, of so much of said wall as they may use. Considering the language of the agreement in connection with the purposes for which it was executed, it seems to us to indicate the wall was to be solid throughout its length and height. It is true it was built and the cost of it paid by complainants. At that time the owner of defendants' property was not intending to build upon it in the near future, but to secure to himself, or to those who succeeded him in title, the privilege of joining to the wall at any time thereafter when it should be decided to erect a building on his lot. He gave complainants permission to place one half the wall on his property. The wall was built for the purpose of being used as a party wall between the premises of the respective parties, and was "to be and remain a party wall." Complainants insist that the phrase quoted does not mean the wall shall be and remain a party wall throughout its entire height, but means only such part of it as the parties may be using in common. The agreement gave the owner of defendants' premises the right to use the entire wall by joining to it if he so desired. There was nothing in the instrument to indicate that the owner of defendants' property contemplated or intended using only a part of the wall when he should decide to erect a building on his property. The agreement secured to him the right to use it all by joining a building to it, and the agreement was that the entire wall shall be and remain a party wall, and not that such portion of it shall be a party wall as defendants might elect to use. In the absence of any provision in the agreement that complainants should have the right to construct and maintain windows in the wall until such time as defendants desire to use it, we think no such construction can be placed upon the instrument. The agreement required that the wall be and remain a party wall, and, in the absence of some provision to the contrary, its terms will not admit of the construction that it was not intended it should be a solid wall throughout. It seems clear the parties themselves so understood the agreement when the wall was built, for it was built as a solid wall according to plans and specifications, and was so maintained for several years.

It is further contended that, as complainants built and paid for the wall, they were the sole owners of it until such time as defendants made payment for it in accordance with the agreement, and until that time it was not strictly a party wall, and complainants were not required to treat it as such. It was held in Mickel v. York, 175 Ill. 62, 51 N. E. 848, that when a party wall is constructed by one lot owner between adjacent lots, resting partly on each, under an agreement with the other to pay one half the value of it when he elects to use it, the builder is the absolute owner of the wall, with the right to have one half of it stand upon the land of the other. If the adjoining owner elects to pay one half the value of the wall and use it, he becomes the owner of the half standing on his land, with an easement in the half standing on the lot of the one who built the wall. Beidler v. King, 209 Ill. 302, 101 Am. St. Rep. 246, 70 N. E. 763, states the same rule, and cites and quotes from Mickel v. York, supra. But does it follow that because of such ownership complainants had the right to make such openings in the wall as they pleased until payment was made by defendants? We think the answer must be in the negative; for, as we understand and construe the agreement, complainants were obligated to build and maintain a solid wall. The right to violate the agreement did not attend such ownership of the wall. It is necessary, therefore, in the decision of this case to determine how, if at all, the unauthorized acts of complainants in making the windows in the wall and in placing projections over and upon defendants' lot affected the rights of the parties, and also whether the defendants are entitled to the relief prayed in their cross bill or any part thereof.

The appellate court affirmed that part of the decree of the superior court finding defendants liable to complainants for one half the value of that part of the party wall used by defendants, but held they were not liable for interest on the amount found due. The appellate court also held that defendants were entitled to the relief prayed under their cross bill. No cross errors have been assigned by defendants, and, while they assert in their brief that they were wrongfully adjudged liable for the value of one half of the wall used, under the state of the record before us they are to be deemed as admitting the correctness of the judgments of the superior court and appellate court that when they joined to and used the wall they became liable to complainants in the sum of $5,034.48, under the agreement. They insist, however, that they are not liable for interest on that amount, and say they should not be penalized by being required to pay interest, because they in good faith defended against any liability on account of the use made by them of a portion of the party wall.

The three lowest windows in the party wall were in the second story above the roof of defendants' building, and the other three were one story higher. They were wrongfully placed and maintained there, as were also the projections, but they did not prevent or directly interfere with defendants using all that portion of the party wall they desired then to use. While complainants had no right to make the windows in the wall or to extend projections beyond it, their doing so did not authorize defendants to use the part of the wall where there were no windows or projections, without paying for it. In our judgment, they had a remedy against complainants for their wrongful acts, but such wrongful acts of complainants did not absolve defendants from the obligation to pay for the part of the wall they used. The liability of defendants was one arising upon a written contract, and became due when they proceeded to join their building to the party wall. Under the second section of our statute on interest, creditors are entitled to interest at 5 per cent upon money after it becomes due under any instrument of writing. The money became due under an instrument of writing, and complainants were entitled to interest, unless it is shown they have done some act which upon equitable considerations should be held a bar to or forfeiture of the right to interest. We are of the opinion that no such considerations arise in this case. The wall was built in substantial compliance with the agreement, and all that part of the wall in use by defendants is in the same condition as when originally constructed. Defendants, as hereafter stated, have a right to require the portion of the wall where the changes have been made to be restored to its original condition, but as the changes made in part of the wall not used by defendants do not materially interfere with the use of the part they have elected to use, it appears to us that, disregarding the statute to which we have referred, it would be contrary to the rules of equity to say they could refuse payment, and not become liable for interest. In Keady v. White, 168 Ill. 76, 48 N. E. 314, it was said: "Interest, in equity, is allowed because of its equitable considerations, and it gives or withholds interest as, under all the circumstances of the case, it deems equitable and just." Warner v. Rogers, 23 Minn. 34, is in its essential features much like this case, and it was held using the wall rendered the party so using it liable from the time of joining to it. It would probably not be contended that, if no changes had been made in any part of the wall, defendants could have used it and not become liable for interest if they refused to make the payment required by the party-wall agreement. The evidence affords no basis for recoupment on account of damages sustained by defendants, and we think they must be held liable for interest. Phillips v. South Park, 119 Ill. 626, 10 N. E. 230; Keeler v. Herr, 157 Ill. 57, 41 N. E. 750.

We are of opinion the appellate court correctly held defendants were entitled, under the cross bill, to a decree requiring the removal of the projections, the closing of the openings in the wall, and its restoration to its original condition as a solid wall throughout its length and height. While the wall was constructed by complainants, and defendants were not required by the agreement to pay any part of the cost until they desired to use it, as we have before stated, it was built for a party wall, and under the agreement was required to be maintained as a solid wall. The owner of defendants' premises gave one half of the land upon which the wall was built for the privilege of joining to it when he should desire to do so, by paying one half the value of the wall used. He and defendants, as his successors in title, have a right to require performance of and compliance with that agreement.

That defendants have the right to require the restoration of the wall to its original condition is supported by the case of Springer v. Darlington, 207 Ill. 238, 69 N. E. 946. In that case a party wall had been destroyed by fire, and was rebuilt by Springer with a large number of openings in it. Darlington, who was not using the newly built wall, filed a bill praying that the openings in the wall be declared a nuisance, and that Springer be enjoined from maintaining them. The agreement under which the original party wall was built, so far as requiring it to be a solid wall is concerned, is similar to the agreement in this case. The trial court held that the wall had been rebuilt by Springer under the party-wall agreement; that it should have been a solid wall; that the openings in the wall and the projecting window caps and sills were a continuing nuisance to Darlington, and that he had a right to close the openings, remove the projections, and make the wall a solid party wall. That decree was in all respects affirmed by this court. In the opinion the court said it was no answer to the claim of Darlington for the relief prayed to say he was not entitled to it until he had paid one half the expense of constructing the wall, for that would be to require him to pay for a structure that was not erected in compliance with the agreement; that it was unimportant what kind of a structure Darlington might want to build on his lot; that he was entitled to have a compliance with the terms of the contract, and Springer could not say he would not comply with it because Darlington did not intend to use his property in a certain way. The court further said Darlington was entitled to have the aid of a court of equity to place the wall in the condition the contract required it should be, and that no other remedy was adequate.

Complainants attempt to distinguish the Springer Case from this, because there the original party wall was paid for by the adjoining owners, and in rebuilding it Springer used a part of the old foundation. We do not think that furnishes any reasonable basis for distinction. The general principles announced in that case upon the question under discussion we believe to be sound, and, in the absence of any authority upon the question, we would be disposed to hold that defendants have the right to have the wall restored to its original condition. Upon that question the judgment of the appellate court was right.

The judgment of the Appellate Court is therefore affirmed in all respects except as to the allowance of interest on the $5,034.48 found due from defendants, and that part of the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded to the Superior Court, with directions to enter a decree in accordance with the views herein expressed.

Reversed in part and remanded, with directions.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

FIRST UNITARIAN SOCIETY OF IOWA CITY, Appt.,

v.

CITIZENS' SAVINGS & TRUST COMPANY, IOWA CITY.

(— Iowa, —, 142 N. W. 87.)

Covenant — against encumbrances — sewer easement.

An easement for a public sewer laid 5 feet beneath the surface of a city lot is not within a covenant against encumbrances in a deed of the property.

(June 7, 1913.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff for a judgment of the District Court for Johnson County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for breach of covenant in a warranty deed. Affirmed.

Statement by Evans, J.:

This is an action for damages for breach of covenant in warranty deed. The case was tried to the court without a jury upon an agreed statement of facts. There was a judgment for the defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

Messrs. Henry Negus and Henry H. Griffiths, for appellant:

An easement is presumed in law to be an encumbrance, and the burden is upon the grantor to establish that it is a benefit.

Harrison v. Des Moines & Ft. D. R. Co. 91 Iowa, 114, 58 N. W. 1081.

Knowledge of encumbrances by the grantee is immaterial.

Bennett v. Booth, 70 W. Va. 264, 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) 618, 73 S. E. 909, seems to be the only case, in addition to FIRST UNITARIAN SOC. v. CITIZENS' SAV. & T. Co. which has passed upon the question whether or not the existence of a water right on land at the time of its conveyance constitutes a breach of the covenant in a deed of the land, since the compilation of the note to Schurger v. Moorman, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 313, wherein the earlier cases upon the question are treated. In Bennett v. Booth, supra, it was held that a covenant of general warranty of title was not broken by the existence of a visible easement, consisting of a right to maintain a mill pond, upon the land conveyed. This was upon the ground that when an easement is so open and apparent that the contracting parties must have known of it, they are presumed to have contracted with reference to the condition in which the land then was, and that it cannot be supposed that the purchaser agreed to pay any more for the land than he considered it worth with the burden on it.

The conclusion reached in the FIRST UNITARIAN SOC. CASE, to the effect that an easement for a public sewer laid 5 or 6 feet beneath the surface of a city lot is not within a covenant against encumbrances in a deed of the lot, while in keeping with the Iowa rule as to public highways, cannot be reconciled with the great weight of authority upon the question. The majority of the court seemingly proceeded upon the ground that since the drain was a public necessity it must be a benefit to the property, and that therefore the owner was subject to some incidental servitude; but this in itself seems inconsistent with the fact that the property by statute could not have been taken for the purpose without condemnation and payment of damages.

The notes upon the question whether or not the existence of a public highway, a private way, or a railroad right of way across land at the time of conveyance, constitutes a breach of the various covenants in a deed of real estate, which notes are referred to in the earlier note upon the present question, are supplemented by the note to Sandum v. Johnson, 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 619.

Stuhr v. Butterfield, 151 Iowa, 736, 36 L.R.A. (N.S.) 321, 130 N. W. 897.

Evans, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff holds its cause of action by assignment. Its assignor was the grantee in a warranty deed executed to it by the defendant on December 14, 1907, and which conveyed to it a certain lot 4 in Iowa City. The deed contains covenants of warranty which will be hereinafter set out. It was averred that the covenants were breached by the existence of a public sewer traversing said lot to a depth of 6 feet beneath the surface, which sewer had been used and maintained by the public for more than 40 years and was still so used and maintained. It was averred that the plaintiff's assignor was damaged thereby to the sum of $1,500. The answer admitted the assignment of the cause of action and the existence of the warranty deed and the existence of the public sewer, and denied all other allegations, and especially denied that the existence of said sewer damaged plaintiff's assignor or was in any way detrimental to the value of the lot. In the court below, the parties submitted the case to the court without a jury upon the following agreed statement of facts: "It is agreed as follows: That the defendant was the owner of lot 4 in block 44 of Iowa City, Iowa, and that on the 14th day of December, 1907, by its authorized officers it conveyed said above-described property by a warranty deed to the plaintiff. * The said covenants of warranty being as follows:

"And we do hereby covenant with the Iowa Association of Unitarian and other independent churches that we are lawfully seised of said premises, that they are free from encumbrances, that we have good right and lawful authority to sell and convey the same, and we do hereby covenant to warrant and defend the said premises against the lawful claims of all persons whomsoever, and the grantors aforesaid hereby relinquish all contingent right, including rights of dower, which they have in and to said last-described premises. That at the time of executing said deed and of the conveyance of the said property, there extended across said lot a certain public sewer, which sewer entered the lot about 16 feet west of the northeast corner thereof and extended diagonally southeast, passed out of said lot at a point about 64 feet south of said northeast corner. That said sewer had been in existence for many years and was a public sewer of such a character that the public had rights therein, and the same could not be removed. That the top of said sewer is from 5 feet to 5 feet 6 inches below the surface of the ground, and said sewer is about 3 feet wide and 4 feet deep on the inside and 5 feet and 6 inches wide on top. It is agreed that the court shall determine from the said above facts whether the defendant is liable to the plaintiff for breach of warranty.

First Unitarian Society of Iowa City. Citizens' Savings & Trust. Co."

We think appellant's discussion in the briefs goes quite beyond the facts appearing of record.

Our consideration and discussion of the question presented must necessarily be circumscribed by the agreed statement of facts. The encumbrance charged in this case is the public easement incident to the use and maintenance of the public sewer.

An easement may or may not be an encumbrance. An "encumbrance" has been defined as "a burden upon land depreciative of its value; such as a lien, easement, or servitude which though adverse to the interest of the landowner does not conflict with his conveyance of the land in fee." 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 361. In Barlow v. McKinley, 24 Iowa, 69, it was defined as "right in a third person in the land in question, to the diminution of the value of the land, though consistent with the passing of the fee by the deed of conveyance." The trial court found that the easement in question was not an encumbrance within the meaning of the law. This holding was concededly based upon our previous cases. Harrison v. Des Moines & Ft. D. R. Co. 91 Iowa, 114, 58 N. W. 1081; Stuhr v. Butterfield, 151 Iowa, 736, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 321, 130 N. W. 897.

The real question before us is therefore whether, under the stipulated facts, the doctrine of the cited cases warranted the judgment of the lower court in favor of the defendant. Some of the authorities classify encumbrance as falling naturally into two general classes: (1) Such as affect or relate to the title or to the record thereof; (2) such as affect or relate to the actual physical conditions upon the realty. The first class is illustrated by lien of taxes, judgments, or mortgages. As to such it is uniformly held that they are included in the covenant against encumbrances regardless of knowledge of the grantee. Those relating to physical conditions of the realty may come under a somewhat different rule. Whenever the actual physical conditions are apparent and are in their nature permanent and irremediable, they are sometimes held to have been within the contemplation of the parties in fixing the price, and are deemed not to be included in a general covenant against encumbrances. The distinction in the two classes of encumbrances is recognized by many courts. In Memmert v. McKeen, 112 Pa. 315, 4 Atl. 542, this distinction is discussed as follows: "Where encumbrances of the former class exist, the covenant referred to, under all the authorities, is broken the instant it is made, and it is of no importance that the grantee had notice of them when he took the title. Cathcart v. Bowman, 5 Pa. 317; Funk v. Voneida, 11 Serg. & R. 109, 14 Am. Dec. 617. Such encumbrances are usually of a temporary character and capable of removal; the very object of the covenant is to protect the vendee against them. Hence knowledge, actual or constructive, of their existence, is no answer to an action for a breach of such covenant. Where, however, there is a servitude imposed upon the land which is visible to the eye, and which affects not title, but the physical condition of the property, a different rule prevails. Thus it was held in Patterson v. Arthurs, 9 Watts, 152, that, where the owner had covenanted to convey certain lots free from all encumbrances, a public road, which occupied a portion of such lots, was not an encumbrance within the meaning of the covenant. This is not because of any right acquired by the public, but by reason of the fact that the road, although admittedly an encumbrance, and possibly an injury to the property, was there when the purchaser bought, and he is presumed to have had knowledge of it. In such and similar cases there is the further presumption that, if the encumbrance is really an injury, such injury was in the contemplation of the parties, and that the price was regulated accordingly." To the same effect, see Desvergers v. Willis, 56 Ga. 515, 21 Am. Rep. 289; Whitbeck v. Cook, 15 Johns. 483, 8 Am. Dec. 272; Clark v. Mossman, 58 Neb. 87, 78 N. W. 399; Weller v. Fidelity Trust & Safety Vault Co. 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1136, 64 S. W. 843; Kutz v. McCune, 22 Wis. 628, 99 Am. Dec. 85; Scribner v. Holmes, 16 Ind. 142; Wilson v. Cochran, 46 Pa. 229; Huyck v. Andrews, 113 N. Y. 81, 3 L.R.A. 789, 10 Am. St. Rep. 432, 20 N. E. 581; Omaha Southern R. Co. v. Beeson, 38 Neb. 361, 54 N. W. 557; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Shepherd, 39 Neb. 525, 58 N. W. 189.

To the foregoing must be added the further proposition that, where public improvements are adopted for the betterment of real estate within a district, such new physical conditions as are necessary and usually incident to such improvement are deemed ordinarily within the contemplation of purchaser and seller, and are not deemed a breach of covenant against encumbrances. Such doctrine has been expressly applied by this court to highways and drainage ditches. Harrison v. Des Moines & Ft. D. R. Co. and Stuhr v. Butterfield, supra.

All public improvement involves a certain community of interest in all real estate within its district. Such improvement is not available to one piece of property alone, and yet it is essential to its appropriate use and enjoyment. From its very nature it cannot benefit one without benefiting many; and, as an incident to the mutual benefit, it lays also a mutual servitude upon all. The highways carved out of a farm bring such farm into connection with the entire highway system of the state. The drainage ditch cut through a farm confers upon such farm the benefit of a complete drainage system, furnishing to it an outlet below for its own surface waters and subjecting it to incident servitude from above.

Is a public sewer such an improvement and betterment to real estate that it comes fairly within the operation of the doctrine announced? City property has need of sewer facilities. Abutting property is taxed therefor as for benefits received. These facilities can be acquired only by inclusion in a sewer system. To become a part of such system is to receive its benefits and to be subject likewise to some degree of servitude. Can such incident servitude be deemed a breach of covenant against encumbrances?

It is argued by appellant that the doctrine of our cases above cited does not apply, because the sewer was underground, and not apparent to observation. This distinction might meet the argument of some of the cases. The doctrine of our own cases, however, has not been made to rest upon the fact that the encumbrance was apparent or known. This court had previously held, in Barlow v. McKinley, 24 Iowa, 69, that a railroad right of way operated as a breach of covenant though its existence was apparent and known. The Harrison Case was put upon the broad and practical ground that public improvement and betterment which so benefits abutting property as to render it liable to assessment for the improvement ought not to be deemed ordinarily as depreciating its value. It recognized the fact that such betterment imposed, nevertheless, upon the benefited property a certain mutual servitude, and to that extent created an easement in a legal sense against all property within the benefited district. The holding was that such easement, however, was not ordinarily an encumbrance, because in its entirety it was beneficial, and not detrimental to the value. The following excerpts are from the opinion in that case: "It will be observed that we are to meet a delicate question, and also one of great and very general importance to all parts of the state, from the fact that conveyances of land are generally with covenants against encumbrances, and very few of the number, which is immense, contain exceptions as to public highways. If the rule is to obtain in this state that such highways are encumbrances against covenants of warranty, the effect will be to create almost numberless liabilities where none were thought to exist; for, with a few exceptions, if any, conveyances have been made without an apprehension of such a rule, by either of the parties; and, as 61 L.R.A. (N.S.)

has been said in other states that have denied the rule, it 'would produce a crop of litigation . . . that would be almost interminable.' Such consideration should not influence us to override an established rule of law, and to deny to any party a vested right; but they are important where a rule of law for the state is to be settled upon authority, and is so doubtful that parties acquiring rights may have done so under mistaken apprehensions of what the rule should be. It is conceded that the authorities are not uniform on the question. In Prichard v. Atkinson, 3 N. H. 335; Kellogg v. Ingersoll, 2 Mass. 97; Haynes v. Young, 36 Me. 557; and Burk v. Hill, 48 Ind. 52, 17 Am. Rep. 731, it is held that such highways are encumbrances and a breach of such covenants. In Desvergers v. Willis, 56 Ga. 515, 21 Am. Rep. 289; Whitbeck v. Cook, 15 Johns. 483, 8 Am. Dec. 272; Patterson v. Arthurs, 9 Watts, 152; and Memmert v. McKeen, 112 Pa. 315, 4 Atl. 542,—the opposite rule is held. Both lines of authorities have support from ruling on kindred questions, and nothing less can be said, on authority, than that the question is one of grave doubt. It should be said that some of the authorities cited against the rule that such an encumbrance constitutes a breach base the conclusion on a broader doctrine than that of the rule applying simply to public highways, and hold that it applies to other easements, where they are open, notorious, and are, or may be presumed to have been, known to the vendee when the purchase was made; as in the case of a right of way for a railroad, when the road was in operation, and the easement created by it known to the grantee. In view of the rule adopted in this state—that knowledge of the easement will not exclude it from the operations of the warranty—if we are to make a public highway an exception to the rule, it must be on other grounds, or at least the conclusion should be aided by other reasons. . . . In general, easements are of such nature that they become encumbrances, in the sense that they are a burden or detriment to the servient estate; because there is nothing in their nature from which the law will presume that they were created in the interest, or for the betterment, of the estate. It is in this view that it has sometimes been said that all easements are encumbrances, and this, as we think, has led, in some cases, to the statement of a broader rule than either public or private interests demand. No easement should be regarded as an encumbrance to an estate, which is essential to its enjoyment, and by which its value is presumably enhanced. Nothing in the record indicates that the highways in question do not bear the relation to the land conveyed to the plaintiff that public highways generally do to agricultural lands; and we have no hesitancy in saying that public highways are not depreciative, but, on the contrary, they are highly appreciative, of the value of the lands on which they constitute an easement, and are a means without which such lands are not available for use, nor sought after in the markets. . . . By this system of highways the landed estates become mutually servient, and in such a way that the easements are mutually advantageous and the respective land values enhanced thereby. Such an easement is not an encumbrance. . . . We may say that we make the distinction on the line of what the law will presume to be an encumbrance, in the sense that it is a damage to the estate made servient to the easement. Other easements to which our attention has been called, or which we have been able to consider, are not such that the law will presume them as attaching to an estate, at the instance of the owner, and for its advantage. The consequences of a rule that would hold to a technical liability at law in such cases, and remand parties to proceedings in equity to reform the thousands of conveyances that would fall within its operation, can be better imagined than expressed; and we feel that the announcement of a rule of law decisive of the rights of parties, without such litigation, is correct in principle and in accord with public and private interests."

In the Stuhr Case, supra, the same doctrine of mutuality of benefit and burden was applied to a drainage ditch. The ditch in question had not been cut nor the land appropriated in a physical sense at the time of the execution of the warranty sued on in that case. The doctrine of the Harrison Case is there fully discussed and reaffirmed, and we need not repeat the discussion. It will be noted, also, that the discussion in the Stuhr Case is made to apply not only to open ditches, but also to cover the tile drains. Nothing less would be consistent.

In a practical sense, it is hardly conceivable that a purchaser of real estate underlaid with covered tile drains could deem himself damaged thereby as for breach of covenant against encumbrances. Such tile drains are usually laid at great expense and to the great improvement of the property. Necessarily such benefit has its incident servitude and perhaps inconvenience. The landowner must necessarily adapt his use of the land to the use and location of the tile drains. He cannot sink a well or dig a post hole over such drain. If he put a structure upon such ground, he must protect his tile against undue weight. And if he excavate a basement he must take account of, and make provision for, his tile drain. This is a burden incident to benefit. Is this argument fairly applicable to a public sewer? It is urged that a public sewer is not a benefit to the particular land through which it passes. But it is a matter of common knowledge that proximity to a sewer is one of the first requisites of city property and one of the first conditions to city value. It is true, as argued by appellant, that public sewers are usually laid in streets and alleys. It is also true that it is sometimes a practical necessity to lay them along the course of ravines, because of the topography of the ground, and because their expense might otherwise be prohibitive. The very selection of the cheaper course is in itself in the interest of the property owner, who has need of sewer connection and must needs pay for the improvement. It is further argued that the sewer should be deemed an encumbrance because of the statutory provisions for the condemnation of land for such purposes and for the assessment of damages therefor. But similar statutory provisions are made for condemnation of land for public highways and for public ditches and tile drains. In all such cases the constitutional prohibition against the consideration of benefits applicable, as well as the prohibition against the taking of private property without compensation. Turning to the stipulation of facts before us, we discover nothing therein to take the case out of the operation of the doctrine of the cases here considered. No facts of a special nature are made to appear. Nor does it appear that the plaintiff suffered any damage in fact, unless damage is to be presumed from the mere existence of the sewer. No question of deceit or false representation or mutual mistake is involved. We have before us the only cold question whether the mere existence of a sewer 5 or 6 feet under ground constitutes a breach of covenant against encumbrance.

We think the holding of the trial court is in accordance with our previous cases here considered, and its judgment is therefore affirmed.

Deemer, J., dissenting:

In view of the importance of the legal principle involved, it is unfortunate that the case has been submitted in the manner it has, for I fear that this has unconsciously lead to an announcement of legal doctrines which might not otherwise have been pronounced,—doctrines which I think are a wide departure from previous cases, and from well-settled rules and principles of law formerly-embedded not only in the jurisprudence of this country, but of England as well. I am led to believe that the case was submitted to the district court simply to secure an opinion as to whether or not a public or private sewer, running across private property, is or may be an encumbrance which will constitute a breach of warranty against encumbrances, or for the quiet enjoyment of the property conveyed. The covenant in plaintiff's deed is as broad as it could be made, and the deed contains no reservations or exceptions. It will be observed that, after giving the description of the sewer which crosses the lot, it is expressly provided in the stipulation of facts that the question to be decided was whether or not defendant is liable to the plaintiff for breach of covenant or warranty.

Mark, the court was not to determine the amount of the damages, but whether or not there was any liability to the plaintiff for breach of warranty. If we find that the district court erroneously decided this question, then, in my opinion, we should reverse the case and remand it for a determination as to the amount of damages, and not assume as a matter of law, as the majority do, that no damages could arise to plaintiff by reason of the presence of the sewer which would be sufficient to sustain an action for breach of covenant.

The rule that we do not reverse for failure to award nominal damages is not applicable to the case; for the parties did not submit the question as to the amount of damages at all, and nothing is said in the stipulation regarding that matter. Plaintiff did not attempt to state the amount of damages claimed to have been suffered by it, and defendant did not claim that the sewer was a benefit to the property, save as any sewer may be so considered.

The nature of the sewer is not shown, save that it is a public one, of large size, set 5 feet to 5 feet and 6 inches in the ground, 5 feet and 6 inches wide on top, and 3 feet wide, and 4 feet deep, on the inside. It is evidently not the ordinary round sewer; and, whether a sanitary or storm sewer, or one to carry off the water from the streets and buildings, does not appear, save by the merest inference. . . . It was not built in the street, as most sewers are, and was evidently an outlet, over the land in question, for some kind of a system of drainage or sewerage, procured either by purchase or condemnation under § 795 of the Code or some similar section of previous Codes. No one would contend that private property could be entered and taken, even for public use, without compensation to the owner.

Ordinarily sewers are laid in the city streets, and, as no additional servitude is created thereby, adjoining or abutting property owners may not complain of them. In deed, in such cases they are thought to be a benefit to the property, and assessments may be made to meet the cost thereof. But, in finding an outlet over private property, no such rule exists, no matter what the nature of the sewer. Indeed, the cost of making this outlet cannot be taxed against the property taken, but is added to the cost of the improvement and taxed up against property abutting on the streets in which the sewer is laid. Code, § 795.

The fair inference from the description of this sewer is that it is a storm sewer, although, to my mind, this makes no difference with the legal principle involved.

Again, it does not appear how the right to pass over the property was obtained, that is, whether through purchase or by condemnation; but, however acquired, it is conceded that the same is public in character, that the public have rights therein, and that the same could not be removed.

Conceding, then, that the city either owns the property upon which the sewer lies, or that it has a permanent easement over the lot for the sewer, it follows that the city authorities had the right, at any time, to go upon the lot to make repairs to the sewer, to clean it out, and to see that it was properly maintained. This right followed as of law, even though nothing but an easement was created over the lot. Such is the universal holding of the authorities: Prescott v. White, 21 Pick. 341, 32 Am. Dec. 266; Prescott v. Williams, 5 Met. 429, 39 Am. Dec. 688; Doane v. Badger, 12 Mass. 65; Morrison v. Marquardt, 24 Iowa, 68, 92 Am. Dec. 444.

That the right of the third person to pass upon or over land, to dig thereon, or to, in any manner, remove the soil, constitutes a breach of a covenant of warranty in a deed for quiet enjoyment, is, to my mind, too clear for argument, and it is so held in many cases. See McGowen v. Myers, 60 Iowa, 256, 14 N. W. 788; Mitchell v. Warner, 5 Conn. 497; Blake v. Everett, 1 Allen, 248; Wetherbee v. Bennett, 2 Allen, 428; Swift v. Crocker, 21 Pick. 241; Johnson v. Knapp, 146 Mass. 70, 15 N. E. 134; Cotting v. Com. 205 Mass. 523, 91 N. E. 900; Patterson v. Freihofers, 215 Pa. 47, 64 Atl. 326.

The majority give a definition of an encumbrance with which I do not disagree; but, after giving the definition they proceed to hold, as I understand it, that there is an easement, which ordinarily would be an encumbrance upon and over plaintiff's property; but that this easement is, as a matter of law, a benefit rather than an injury, and that, no matter what the testimony may show, as to actual damages, the law conclusively assumes that there were no damages to the property by reason of the presence of the sewer.

In this connection, I cannot do better than quote from a leading case, upon this subject. As applied to easements of the character mentioned in Wetherbee v. Bennett, 2 Allen, 429, the supreme court of Massachusetts said: "These exceptions cannot be sustained. The action is upon the breach of a covenant against encumbrances in a conveyance of land. The encumbrance was a right of way over the land, which subsisted at the time of the conveyance and for some time after. The defendant contended that the evidence showed that the plaintiff had never been disturbed in the enjoyment of his estate by any user of the way, and that the right of way had been extinguished without expense, and asked that the jury should be instructed to return a verdict for nominal damages only; but the judge declined to give these instructions. It does not follow from these facts that no actual damages had been sustained. While the right of way lasted, the plaintiff was precluded from using the part of the land covered by the way as fully as he otherwise might have done. He could not set a tree or a post or a building upon it, or inclose or cultivate it, or sell or lease it to any person to whom such an encumbrance would be objectionable. It was an apparently permanent subtraction from the substance of the estate."

In Butler v. Gale, 27 Vt. 739, Chief Justice Redfield said: "In this country, where our tenures are strictly allodial, we are very much accustomed to consider that, if another really possesses any rights in our land, it is so far forth an encumbrance upon our title. Whether it be small or large in amount, whether it be a mortgage or a right to flow a portion or all of the land, for a shorter or longer period during the year, or to draw water from a well or spring, or to water cattle at a brook, or to pass across the land on foot, or with teams, or to draw wood in winter only across the land, or to build and maintain a railway perpetually, or a highway, is certainly of no importance, in determining the mere technical question of encumbrance or no encumbrance. And it can make no difference whether this right is notorious or not. If the question of an encumbrance were to be determined by its notoriety, or, what is the same thing, by its being known to the purchaser, it must, to preserve consistency, be extended to all encumbrances. And, in that view, the grantee could not recover upon this covenant for paying a mortgage which he knew existed at the time of his purchase. But the contrary is perfectly well established. And in regard to these rights of way, if they existed only in a prior grant, and were not known to the grantee at the time of purchase, no one could claim that they did not constitute a breach of the covenant against encumbrances."

Indeed, according to all the cases at my command, the most that can be said is that, in cases of encumbrances by easements over land, the question is not one of law for the court, but of fact for a jury. They may be of considerable damage, or very inconsiderable in character, and the amount thereof is for a jury. See Opinion by Parsons, Chief Justice, in Kellogg v. Ingersoll, 2 Mass. 97. Also, Hubbard v. Norton, 10 Conn. 422; Gilbert v. Bulkley, 5 Conn. 262, 13 Am. Dec. 57; Morgan v. Smith, 11 Ill. 194; Richmond v. Ames, 164 Mass. 467, 41 N. E. 671; Mackey v. Harmon, 34 Minn. 168, 24 N. W. 702; Kellogg v. Malin, 62 Mo. 429.

It is hornbook law that an owner of real estate owns from the highest heavens to the center of the earth, and our fee-simple titles are allodial in character. That is to say, they are free and absolute and held of no superior. Suppose, now, that the owner of this lot wished to bore for coal or oil upon his lot, to dig a well over this sewer, or to erect a building or a church, and that he wished to excavate below the sewer for his foundation walls, or to make a basement; would anyone contend that his absolute right to do so would not be interfered with by the presence of this sewer? As the property was purchased by a church, it is evident that this sewer may be a decided disadvantage, rather than a benefit, to the owner of the land. Not only has another a right to enter upon his premises for repairing, cleaning, or maintaining the sewer, but plaintiff must not, in any way, interfere with or destroy that sewer on penalty of paying damages therefor, if not of being restrained by injunction from in any way interfering therewith.

These illustrations are not forced or strained, but, to my mind, perfectly legitimate in arriving at a proper solution of the case. Although the rule for this state is that knowledge on the part of the grantee of an encumbrance against the property does not deprive him of the right to recover for breach of covenant, the majority quote the Pennsylvania rule as if it had some applicability to the case. The so-called Pennsylvania rule has not only been distinctly repudiated by this court in many cases, but it has been departed from by the Pennsylvania court itself in recent cases. In Patterson v. Freihofer, 215 Pa. 47, 64 Atl. 326, decided in 1906, that court said: "When one protects himself against an encumbrance by a positive covenant that the property is to be conveyed to him clear of all such encumbrance, he is entitled to the benefit of his contract, whether he had knowledge of the existence of the encumbrance or not." This was said with reference to the use of cesspools and privy wells. Again, in Evans v. Taylor, 177 Pa. 286, 69 L.R.A. 790, 35 Atl. 635, the same court announced the same rule. There is no room for dispute as to what our own cases hold. I here cite them without quotation: Billingham v. Bryan, 10 Iowa, 317; Van Wagner v. Van Nostrand, 19 Iowa, 422; Barlow v. McKinley, 24 Iowa, 69; Gerald v. Elley, 45 Iowa, 322; McGowen v. Myers, 60 Iowa, 256, 14 N. W. 788; Specht v. Spangenberg, 70 Iowa, 488, 30 N. W. 875; Flynn v. White Breast Coal & Min. Co. 72 Iowa, 738, 32 N. W. 471; Yancey v. Tatlock, 93 Iowa, 386, 61 N. W. 997; Pierce v. Houghton, 122 Iowa, 477, 98 N. W. 306; Doyle v. Emerson, 145 Iowa, 358, 124 N. W. 176; Harwood v. Lee, 85 Iowa, 622, 52 N. W. 521; Kostendader v. Pierce, 37 Iowa, 645. There has been no departure from this rule, so many times maintained.

I cannot myself see any distinction between an encumbrance which is of record, of which all persons must take notice, and one which is visible to the naked eye, but which the parties may or may not have seen. Will the next step be to say that a covenant of warranty does not cover an encumbrance of record? Much confusion will be introduced by a rule which makes the right of action depend upon knowledge. One holding title against which there is an encumbrance may resort to any warranty in his claim of title made after the encumbrance arose. Now, suppose some remote grantor was chosen as a defendant, and he could show that, while plaintiff did not know of the encumbrance, his immediate grantee, or some more remote grantee, did; would this be a defense to suit? I have always understood that the reason why one is so tenacious in insisting upon a warranty deed is for the reason there may be, or he thinks there is, some encumbrance against the land, and often he takes it for the very reason that there is an apparent encumbrance. Is he to be defeated in his action of covenant because he knows of this encumbrance? I think not.

Moreover, this question of knowledge of a physical encumbrance defeating an action for breach of covenant has been distinctly negatived in many of our cases where the easement was known to both grantor and grantee. See Flynn v. White Breast Coal & Min. Co. 72 Iowa, 738, 32 N. W. 471; Bar- low v. McKinley, 24 Iowa, 69; McGowen v. Myers, 60 Iowa, 259, 14 N. W. 788; Van Wagner v. Van Nostrand, 19 Iowa, 422. In each of these cases there was an open and apparent easement on the land, and we expressly disapproved of the Pennsylvania and Wisconsin rule,—the rule adopted by the minority of the courts,—and expressly and definitely held that knowledge of such easements would not defeat the action. Courts and text writers generally disapprove of the rule announced by the majority upon this proposition. See Jones, Real Prop. §§ 861 et seq. 873, 882, 886, 910; Rawle, Covenants, §§ 79, 88, 191; Tiffany, Real Prop. § 397; Tiedeman, Real Prop. § 853; 2 Warvelle, Vend. & P. pp. 992-998 8 Am. & Eng. Eng. Law, 123-125; 11 Cyc. 1066. If our previous cases are to be overruled, we should do so squarely, and not leave the matter to mere inference.

Coming now to the question of sewers, drains, etc., the cases, without exception, so far as I have been able to discover, hold that they are encumbrances, and the English courts have recently established the same rule.

In Pemsel v. Tucker [1907] 2 Ch. 191, 97 L. T. N. S. 86, 71 J. P. 547, 76 L. J. Ch. N. S. 621, it was held that a public sewer, running under property sold, constituted a defect in the title as it was vested in the public authorities. In the instant case, it is conceded that the sewer in question is a public sewer, and it must have been acquired either by grant or condemnation.

In Cotting v. Com. 205 Mass. 523, 91 N. E. 900, the supreme court of Massachusetts held that a sewer constitutes an encumbrance on the land; and in Johnson v. Knapp, 146 Mass. 70, 15 N. E. 134, the same court held that a pipe to convey water across land is an encumbrance.

In Smith v. Sprague, 40 Vt. 43, the court of that state held that a private drain and the accompanying right to enter and clean the same constituted a breach of covenant against encumbrances. The principle, for which I contend, was laid down in an early case in Massachusetts. Kellogg v. Ingersoll, 2 Mass. 97, from which I quote the following words of Parsons, Ch. J.: "If the public town road, described by the plaintiff in his assignment, is no legal encumbrance of the land sold, the breach is not well assigned. But the court are well satisfied that the road, as there described, is an encumbrance of the land sold. It is legal obstruction to the purchaser to exercise that dominion over the land to which the lawful owner is entitled. An encumbrance of this nature may be a great damage to the purchaser, or the damage may be very inconsiderable, or merely nominal. The amount of damages is a proper subject of consideration for the jury who may assess them, but it cannot affect the question whether a public town road is, in legal contemplation, an encumbrance of the land over which it is laid."

In Huyck v. Andrews, 113 N. Y. 81, 3 L.R.A. 789, 10 Am. St. Rep. 432, 20 N. E. 581, the supreme court of New York said: "We think the safer rule is to hold that the covenants in a deed protect the grantee against every adverse right, interest, or dominion over the land, and that he may rely upon them for his security. If open, visible, and notorious easements are to be excepted from the operation of covenants, it should be the duty of the grantor to except them, and the burden should not be cast upon the grantee to show that he was not aware of them. The security of titles demands that a grant made without fraud or mutual mistake shall bind the grantor according to its written terms. It should not be incumbent upon the grantee to take special and particular covenants against visible and apparent defects in the title, or encumbrances upon the land, but it should be incumbent upon the grantor, if he does not intend to covenant against such defects and encumbrances, to except them from the operation of his covenants. The distinction which is attempted to be made between encumbrances which affect the title and those which affect merely the physical condition of the land conveyed is quite illusory and unsatisfactory. Easements not only affect the physical condition of the land, but they affect and impair the title. The owners of them have an interest in and dominion over the servient tenement which frequently may largely impair its usefulness and value."

In Prescott v. Trueman, 4 Mass. 629, 3 Am. Dec. 246, it is said: "On these principles we are of opinion that every right to, or interest in, the land granted, to the diminution of the value of the land, but consistent with the passing of the fee of it by the conveyance, must be deemed in law an encumbrance. We say consistent with the passing of the fee of the land by the conveyance, because, if nothing passed by the deed, the grantee cannot hold the estate under the grantor. Thus a right to an easement of any kind in the land is an encumbrance. So is a mortgage. So, also, is a claim of dower, which may partially defeat the plaintiff's title, by taking a freehold in one third out of it. And for the same reason, a paramount right, which may wholly defeat the plaintiff's title, is an encumbrance. It is a weight on his land, which must lessen the value of it."

In Demars v. Koehler, 62 N. J. L. 203, 72 Am. St. Rep. 642, 41 Atl. 720, the supreme court of New Jersey said: "Professor Greenleaf declares that a breach of the covenant against encumbrances is shown when the proofs establish that a 'third person has a right to or an interest in the land conveyed, to the diminution of the value of the land, though consistent with the passing of the fee by the deed of conveyance.' 2 Greenl. Ev. § 242. This definition of encumbrance is substantially that given by Chief Justice Parsons in Prescott v. Trueman, 4 Mass. 627, 3 Am. Dec. 246. It was approved in Mitchell v. Warner, 5 Conn. 497, and adopted by Chief Justice Green in Carter v. Denman, 23 N. J. L. 260-272. The diminution of value which is thus made a test of an encumbrance is not, however, to be understood as limited to cases where the thing granted is, by reason of some outstanding right or interest in a third person, of less pecuniary worth, but also extends to and embraces cases where the grantee, by reason of such an outstanding right or interest, does not acquire . . . the thing granted which the grant apparently gives, but is or may be deprived thereby of the whole or some part of its use or possession. The diminution of pecuniary value is important in the admeasurement of damages for the breach of this covenant, but does not form the test whether an outstanding right or interest is an encumbrance or not. If the thing granted be, or be liable to be, diminished by the existence of an outstanding right or interest, so that the grantee does not acquire the complete dominion which the grant purports to convey, then, although the diminution of pecuniary worth may not appear, and the damages may be only nominal, such right or interest in an encumbrance. . . . Knowledge of its existence cannot alter its character as encumbrance. The land granted is or may be thereby diminished so that the grantee does not acquire that use and possession which the deed purported to grant. Mr. Rawle, conceding that, if there be a real encumbrance, the purchaser's knowledge of its existence will furnish no defense to an action on this covenant, ingeniously suggests that such knowledge may have a material bearing in determining what was the subject-matter of the contract. Rawle, Covenants, 95, 96. With equal ingenuity the opinion below denies the right to recover upon this covenant, because such an encumbrance, known to the grantee, is not within its terms, and consequently no breach of the covenant. With great respect, I deem the reasoning specious and the conclusion insupportable; for knowledge of the existence of an encumbrance not only does not destroy its inherent character as encumbrance, but may and often does lead to the purchaser's requiring the grantor to protect him by covenants. Smith v. Lloyd, 29 Mich. 382. When a covenant is made against all encumbrances, without exception, knowledge of the existence of one encumbrance cannot take that encumbrance out of the general terms of the covenant, unless such was the intent of the parties. But knowledge alone does not prove such intent, for a contrary intent is consistent with it. Proof of knowledge, or other proof of the intent of the parties, that a particular encumbrance should be excepted from the general terms of the covenant, could only be admitted by a violation of the canon of evidence which forbids parol proof to vary the terms of a written contract. It results that a grantor who fails to except from his covenant against encumbrances one which is known to the grantee cannot defeat recovery upon that covenant by proof of such knowledge. The grantee is not compelled to require for his protection a special covenant against the known encumbrance, but may rely on the general and unrestricted covenant against all encumbrances. . . . The general rule is that the right of action on the covenant against encumbrances arises upon the existence of the encumbrance, irrespective of any knowledge on the part of the grantee, or of any eviction of him, or of any actual injury it has occasioned him, so that, if he has not paid off or bought in the encumbrance, he is entitled at least to nominal damages. 2 Greenl. Ev. § 242; 2 Washb. Real Prop. 707; Carter v. Denman, supra; Townsend v. Weld, 8 Mass. 146; Hovey v. Newton, 7 Pick. 29; Harlow v. Thomas, 15 Pick. 66; *Batchelder v. In De Rochemont v. Boston & M. R. Co. 64 N. H. 500, 15 Atl. 131, the supreme court of New Hampshire said: "A way, whether public or private, is an encumbrance upon land. Prichard v. Atkinson, 3 N. H. 335; Haynes v. Stevens, 11 N. H. 28. It is a legal obstruction to the exercise of that dominion over the land to which the lawful owner is entitled. Kellogg v. Ingersoll, 2 Mass. 101; Blake v. Everett, 1 Allen. 248; Wetherbee v. Bennett, 2 Allen, 428; Butler v. Gale, 27 Vt. 742; Hubbard v. Norton, 10 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Conn. 422. The plaintiffs, having conveyed to the railroad with covenants of warranty against encumbrances, are estopped to deny the truth of the covenants that the premises are free from any encumbrances except what are reserved in the deed, and consequently they are estopped to claim damages for the obstruction of a way which they have covenanted does not exist. Wark v. Willard, 13 N. H. 389, 395; Gotham v. Gotham, 55 N. H. 440; Fletcher v. Chamberlin, 61 N. H. 438, 447, 478."

In Edmunds's Appeal, 4 Sadler (Pa.) 485, 8 Atl. 31, the supreme court of Pennsylvania held a party wall an encumbrance, and the same rule obtains in many other states.

In Johnson v. Knapp, 146 Mass. 70, 15 N. E. 134, water pipes, running across a lot of land, were held to be encumbrances.

Stuhr v. Butterfield, 151 Iowa, 736, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 321, 130 N. W. 897, is not an authority against the propositions for which I contend. The drainage ditch which, in that case, was held not to be an encumbrance, was over land which was within a drainage district, and by reason of that fact it had already been adjudicated that the lands were benefited by the improvement. In the case at bar, there is no showing that the sewer in question was any part of any system of drainage, was ever included in any sewerage district, that it was a sanitary sewer, or that any part of the cost thereof had been taxed against abutting property. There never was any finding that the lot, which it crossed, was benefited thereby, and nothing in this record to show that plaintiff could, or would be permitted to, use it for any purpose whatever. It may have been a storm sewer, which plaintiff would not have been permitted to use for sanitary purposes, or it may have been a sanitary sewer, but, if the latter, it is not shown to be a part of any sewer system constructed by the city. Prima facie, such an easement, over plaintiff's lot, is an encumbrance, and this prima facie showing is not overcome by any testimony in the case. It is assumed, without proof, that it was a benefit to the property, upon the theory that it drained it out in some manner, without any showing that it needed any kind of drainage or that it was a sanitary sewer, with which plaintiff might make connection, should it see fit to do so. There is no proof that it is a sanitary sewer; and, if it was, there is no showing that plaintiff may not reach the sewer in the street in front of its lot, where such sewers are usually laid, with less trouble and expense than on its lot. The sewer could not have been laid across plaintiff's lot without compensation, and, if a private sewer, the land could not have been condemned for such an improvement. The sewer may manifestly interfere with building operations, for, if a heavy wall is to be constructed over it, the wall must have support, and this will cause extra expense; and, in the end, it may not be in such position that it can be used for drainage or sewerage purposes. When sewers are laid in the street, as they usually are, they do not interfere with building operations, and in no way interfere with the unrestricted dominion which the owner has over his property. That a sewer laid across a private lot does interfere with such dominion is too clear for argument; and we are not justified, I think, in assuming that this restriction, instead of being a damage, is a real benefit to the lot.

It should not be forgotten, in this connection, that the right to locate underground drains through the land of another, except when the public health requires it, is denied in previous cases decided by this court. Fleming v. Hull, 73 Iowa, 598, 35 N. W. 673; Patterson v. Baumer, 43 Iowa, 477. And this is true, notwithstanding such drain may be of benefit to the land in giving it drainage which it did not have before. Save as the law authorizes the establishment of drainage districts, one man has no right to force his neighbor to put in a drain or tile for the mutual advantage of both, or to go upon his neighbor's land, without his consent, to put in a tile line to connect with his own, in order that both pieces may be benefited.

On the question of benefits, I cannot refrain from referring to two of our cases, which seem to me to be analogous. In McGowen v. Myers, 60 Iowa, 256, 14 N. W. 788, the owner of a lot conveyed a part of it, reserving a stairway, which was to be built and used in common between the building erected on his part of the lot and the part conveyed, and for the mutual benefit of the owners of both lots. Afterwards defendant in the case became the owner of the adjoining building, and conveyed it, by deed of general warranty, to the plaintiff. Plaintiff brought action for breach of covenant, and it was held that the right to use the stairway in common was an easement and an encumbrance, and that defendant was liable on his covenants. The same rule was also announced in Myers v. Munson, 65 Iowa, 423, 21 N. W. 759. These cases are authority for several propositions in the case. The first is that parol evidence is not admissible to show that the parties did not regard the easement as an encumbrance; second, that knowledge of the physical easement on the part of the grantee was no defense; and, third, that even though the easement was for the joint benefit of grantor and grantee, still there was a breach of covenant for which damages might be recovered. All that could possibly be claimed in the instant case is that the easement might be for the joint benefit of the original parties or their grantees,—that is, that it was for the benefit of the city, as well as to the lot owner,—but, under the rule heretofore announced, and never since departed from, such benefit will not defeat an action for breach of covenant of warranty.

I cannot subscribe to the doctrine that knowledge on the part of the grantee of an encumbrance which relates to the physical condition of the realty conveyed deprives him of a right of action for breach of covenant of warranty. Such rule is contrary to the great weight of authority and in conflict with so many of our own cases that they should not be overruled by indirection. The text writers generally condemn the doctrine as wrong on principle and without general support. Again, the announcement of such doctrine will tend toward uncertainty and confusion. Suppose the grantee is a nonresident and has not seen the property, or, if a resident, has never been upon the property; or suppose that, as in this case, the sewer is 5 or 6 feet underground with nothing to indicate that a sewer runs across the lot, must the grantee dig down to see if the sewer runs across the lot, instead of out in the street, where he may well suppose it to be? What are the rules for such cases? And suppose a remote grantor is selected as a party defendant, and he can show that, although plaintiff, a remote grantee, did not know of the encumbrance, his defendant's immediate grantee did. Will this be a defense to the suit? Again, suppose a purchaser never learns of the sewer across his lot, and makes his connection with one in the street, and never gets any benefit from the one across his lot, must he bear the burden of the one across his lot?

Harrison v. Des Moines & Ft. D. R. Co. 91 Iowa, 114, 58 N. W. 1081, relied upon by the majority, is not in point. In that case it is said: "In view of the rule adopted in this state,—that knowledge of the easement will not exclude it from the operations of the warranty,—if we are to make a public highway an exception to the rule, it must be on other grounds, or at least the conclusion should be aided by other reasons. . . . An 'encumbrance' is defined to be 'a burden upon land depreciative of its value, such as a lien, easement, or servitude, which, though adverse to the interest of the landowner, does not conflict with his conveyance of the land in fee.' 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 361; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 242; Chapman v. Kimball, 7 Neb. 399; Carter v. Denman, 23 N. J. L. 260. In Prescott v. Trueman, 4 Mass. 627, 3 Am. Dec. 246, the foregoing definition is given in substance, and it is there said: 'It is a weight on land, which must lessen the value of it.' It will perhaps be well for us to treat these definitions as not casting the burden on a grantee to show affirmatively, in addition to the easement, that it is an encumbrance, in the sense of its being depreciative of the value of the land, and, instead, to give him the advantage of what the law will assume from the existence of an easement."

This case announces two propositions: First, that knowledge of the encumbrance is no defense; and, second, that it is not incumbent on the grantee to show affirmatively that, in addition to the easement, it is an encumbrance in the sense of being depreciative of the value of the land. Assuming these rules to be true, I find nothing in the statement of facts, on which the instant case was tried and determined, which shows or tends to show that the sewer was made to benefit the lot in question, or that it is in fact any benefit thereto. It is assumed that because it is called a public sewer it is some benefit to the property. But that fact depends not upon the name given the easement, but upon whether or not it was a benefit to the property across which it passed.

Ordinarily sewers are not so constructed, and, when they are, compensation must be made the owner. There must be some proof, as I think that this sewer was constructed pursuant to some plan to benefit the lot through which it passed, before any presumption will arise that it did so benefit the land. I can conceive how all property within a drainage district may be presumed to have been benefited, as in Stuhr v. Butterfield, 151 Iowa, 736, 36 L.R.A. (N.S.) 321, 130 N. W. 897. But I am not convinced that a public sewer, running across a private lot, not shown to have been a part of any sewer system, and not constructed to benefit the lot itself, is presumptively a benefit to the lot. A private drain running from my land, through the land of my neighbor, may benefit both; but I doubt if the law would compel my neighbor to let me run a tile across his land on the theory that it will be beneficial to him, when done. For a much stronger reason, one cannot construct a tile or sewer over the land of another which does not need such sewer or tile and is in no manner benefited thereby, even with express authority from the legislature.

The only excuse for this dissent is due to the thought that we are introducing new doctrines, which may arise to trouble us in the future; and I especially dissent from the propositions that knowledge of an encumbrance, whether it be physical or of record, is any defense to an action for breach of covenant; that a large public sewer, no matter whether storm or sanitary, running across a private lot, is presumptively beneficial; and from the thought that without any proof it will be presumed that such a sewer, although not shown to be a part of any system or necessary in any way to the enjoyment of the property through which it runs, is a benefit thereto rather than injury.

On the whole, I think the trial court was in error in dismissing the case, and I would reverse, with instructions to take testimony on the question of damages.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

JOHN J. McKEE, Appt.,
v.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH COMPANY.

(158 Ky. 143, 164 S. W. 348.)

Telegram — altered message — liability to sender.

One whose telegram directing purchase of commodities by a broker is changed by the telegraph company so as to require the purchase of a much larger amount than ordered is not bound to protect the broker in obeying the changed order, and if he does so with full knowledge of the facts, he cannot compel the telegraph company to reimburse him for the loss which he sustains thereby.

Note. — Right of sender or addressee to recover from telegraph company damages resulting from latter acting upon message changed during transmission.

I. Right of sender.

- a. Telegraph company as agent of sender, 440.
- b. Telegraph company as agent of party who selects it as means of communication, 441.
- c. Telegraph company as independent principal, 441.

II. Right of addressee.

- a. In general, 442.
- b. Telegraph company as agent of sender, 444.

The question under annotation presupposes that the damages sustained, at least

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Common Pleas Branch, Third Division, of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover a loss sustained by plaintiff in the purchase and sale of certain grain, alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Paul B. Collins and John T. Bashaw for appellant.

Mr. George H. Fearons, with Messrs. Richards & Harris, for appellee:

A telegraph company cannot be held answerable to the sender of a message erroneously transmitted by the company where the sender has not himself acted on the error, and in ignorance thereof.

Postal Teleg. Cable Co. v. Schaefer, 110 Ky. 907, 62 S. W. 1119; Fisher v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 119 Ky. 885, 84 S. W. 1179; Pepper v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 87 Tenn. 554, 4 L.R.A. 660, 10 Am. St. Rep. 699, 11 S. W. 783; Shingleur v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 72 Miss. 1030, 30 L.R.A. 444, 48 Am. St. Rep. 604, 18 So. 425; Harrison v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (Tex.) 10 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 600; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Peter & Neylon, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 160 S. W. 991.

by one of the parties, was the proximate result of an error in transmission for which the telegraph company was responsible; the point being whether the liability of the company is to the sender or the addressee, or possibly to both.

Although courts differ widely in the reasons assigned therefor, they seem to be in accord in holding that the telegraph company is liable to the sender either for breach of contract or for tort. They are not quite so harmonious with respect to the rights of the sendee, but they all agree that he has a right of action against the telegraph company in tort, at least.

I. Right of sender.

a. Telegraph company as agent of sender.

Several courts take the position that the telegraph company is the agent of the sender. Under this theory the sender is responsible in contract to the sendee, and the former, therefore, has a right of action against the telegraph company, not only for damages suffered directly by him, but also for those of the sendee. (As to the effect of this theory upon the right of the addressee to maintain the action, see infra, II. b.)

Upon this theory the telegraph company has been held liable to the sender for the damages sustained in consequence of the addressee acting upon the telegram as changed—

—where a telegram quoting a price was changed in transmission. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Shotter, 71 Ga. 760. The court says: "Whether the telegraphic operator be the agent of the sender of a despatch, so as to bind him, is a debatable question in the courts, the English authorities being to the effect that he is not; and the American mainly that he is. We agree with the American doctrine, at least to the extent that commercial transactions being now conducted to so great an extent through the telegraph, a merchant would lose business and credit if he did not settle in accordance with the offer actually made, though by mistake of the agency he used to convey it, and when he does so settle in good faith, and is induced to do so by the negligence of the telegraphic company, through its servants, that company should respond to him in damages, whether absolutely bound by his contract or not."

—where telegram quoting a price was changed in transmission. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Flint River Lumber Co. 114 Ga. 576, 88 Am. St. Rep. 36, 40 S. E. 815. The rule was followed on the grounds of long acquiescence, it being conceded that the underlying principle is subject to criticism.

—where a telegram directing a broker to purchase 100 shares was changed in transmission to 1,000 shares. Sherrerd v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 146 Wis. 197, 131 N. W. 341. The court said in effect that upon the purchase of the 1,000 shares they became the property of the sender without any further action on his part; and that no question of ratification could arise. In both the Georgia cases above cited the goods had been delivered by the sender before discovery of the error, although no point seems to have been made of the fact.

But, where a prospective purchaser of distillers' grits telegraphed a cereal company asking for a quotation on 5,000 sacks of that commodity, and the telegram containing the quotation of the cereal company was changed during transmission so as to offer it at a lower rate than that quoted, and the prospective purchaser answered that he would take 2,000 sacks at the price named in the telegram received, and the cereal company replied that it would furnish 2,000 sacks, but not at that rate, there was no completed contract, and the cereal company could not compel the telegraph company to reimburse it for the loss sustained in furnishing the grits at the lower price, with knowledge of the error, even upon the assumption that the telegraph company was the agent of the cereal company. Postal Teleg. Cable Co. v. Akron Cereal Co. 23 Ohio C. C. 516.

As shown infra, I. c, many, probably the majority, of the cases, affirmatively adopt a theory opposed to that now under discussion. The three cases next cited, denying the sender's right to recover, also reject this theory, but do not appear to affirmatively adopt any other.

One whose telegram quoting prices on

It was appellant's duty to reduce his damages as much as possible.

Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Matthews, 113 Ky. 188, 67 S. W. 849.

The measure of damages is the difference, if any, between the price appellant was forced by appellee's error to pay for the oats and their market price immediately after the mistake in transmission was discovered.

Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Fischer, 133 Ky. 768, 119 S. W. 189; Postal Teleg. Cable Co. v. Schaefer, 110 Ky. 907, 62 S. W. 1119.

Appellant should have acted promptly on his legal rights as soon as the mistake in transmission was discovered; and he alone is charged with the result of his failure so to act.

Marr v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 85 Tenn. 529, 3 S. W. 496; Rittenhouse v. Independent Line of Telegraph, 44 N. Y. 263, 4 Am. Rep. 673, 1 Daly, 474.

Settle, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant, John J. McKee, complaining that he was damaged by the failure of the appellee, Western Union Telegraph Company, to transmit and deliver, in the form and words in which it was received from oranges is changed by the telegraph company so as to offer them for a lower price than quoted is not bound to furnish oranges at the price stated therein to the sendee, who knows of the mistake in the telegram, and acts in bad faith in ordering in accordance therewith, and he cannot compel the telegraph company to reimburse him for the loss which he sustains thereby. German Fruit Co. v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 137 Cal. 598, 59 L.R.A. 575, 70 Pac. 658.

So, the sender of a telegram constitutes the telegraph company his agent for the transmission of the message just as it is sent, and no further, and one whose telegram offering shares of stock to a broker at a certain price is changed by the telegraph company so as to offer them for less is not bound to protect the broker in fulfilling contracts to sell such stock, made in pursuance of the terms of the erroneous telegram, and if he does so, he cannot compel the company to reimburse him. Pegram v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 100 N. C. 28, 6 Am. St. Rep. 557, 6 S. E. 770.

And it is held, in Harrison v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (Tex.) 10 A. & E. Corp. Cas. 600, that one whose telegram directing a broker to purchase cotton is changed in transmission so as to order the sale of such cotton is not bound to protect the broker in obeying the changed telegram, and, where he does so, he cannot compel the telegraph company to reimburse him for the loss which he sustains thereby.

For cases which apply this theory by holding that the addressee cannot recover from the telegraph company, see infra, II. b.

b. Telegraph company as agent of party who selects it as means of communication.

In Ayer v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 79 Me. 493, 1 Am. St. Rep. 353, 10 Atl. 495, it is held that, between the sender and addressee, the party who selects the telegraph as a means of communication is liable to the other for the loss resulting from errors in transmission, so that a dealer who selects the telegraph to communicate a quotation of prices on lumber, and whose telegram is changed so as to offer it for less, is bound to furnish it at the lower price, and may 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) recover from the telegraph company the damage resulting from so doing.

So, one whose telegram directing the purchase of shares of stock by his broker is changed by the telegraph company so as to permit the purchase at a higher price than that specified is bound by the terms of the telegram as delivered, and the right of action for damages resulting from such purchase accrues to him, and not to the sendee. Yunker v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 146 Iowa, 499, 125 N. W. 577. This is upon the theory that "the party who selects the telegraph as a means of communication must bear the loss caused by error in transmission."

Although in both the cases just cited the result was the same as if the theory first discussed had been adopted, since it was the sender who originally selected the telegraph as a means of communication, the theory upon which they were decided, viz., that the telegraph company is the agent of the party selecting it as a means of communication, would produce a different result as applied to a case where the addressee of the telegram in which the error occurred had expressly or by implication designated the telegraph as the means of communication between the parties.

c. Telegraph company as independent principal.

One of the best reasoned theories is that which considers the telegraph company an independent principal. Under this theory either the sender or addressee may recover directly from the company the damages accruing to him. Neither of them may, therefore, compel the company to reimburse him for voluntarily protecting the other. McKee v. Western U. Teleg. Co. falls within the last-named principle.

So, produce dealers whose telegram quoting prices on meat is changed in transmission so as to state a lower price than that quoted are not bound to furnish the meat at the lower price, inasmuch as the telegraph company is an independent contractor; but where the meat has been shipped before the discovery of the mistake, they may exercise reasonable skill and diligence in disposing of it, and recover their dam-him, a telegram addressed to Henning, Chambers, & Company, brokers, of Louisville, with the concurrence of appellee, submitted to the decision of the court below upon an agreed case, as allowed by § 637, Civil Code, the question whether it was liable for the damages claimed by appellant.

In addition to the agreed facts, the record consists of the petition and answer; the first alleging the delivery by appellant of the telegram to appellee's Lawrenceburg agent; that, as so delivered, it instructed Henning, Chambers, & Company, brokers, of Louisville, to purchase at the opening of the market the following day 5,000 bushels May oats for appellant, but that the telegram as delivered by appellee to Henning, Chambers, & Company, at Louisville contained a direction to them to buy for appellant 50,000 bushels of oats, instead of the 5,000 actually ordered by appellant; that the brokers, acting upon this mistaken order, made a purchase for appellant of 50,000 bushels of oats, which was 45,000 bushels more than he had ordered; that, upon being notified by a letter from the brokers of their purchase of the 50,000 bushels of oats, which gave appellant the first notice he received of the mistake that had been made by appellee's agents in transmitting and delivering his telegram, he notified appellee, through its Louisville agents, of the mistake that had been made, and demanded of it its correction, and that it take off his hands the excess of 45,000 bushels in the purchase of oats made by the brokers by reason of its age from the telegraph company. Pepper v. Western U. Tele. Co. 87 Tenn. 554, 4 L.R.A. 660, 10 Am. St. Rep. 699, 11 S. W. 783.

And where a telegram quoting prices on live stock is changed during transmission so as to offer it for a lower price, and it is shipped in pursuance of the contract, the shipper is bound only to take such steps to avoid loss as a reasonably prudent man would take to avoid loss from his own error, and the telegraph company is liable for the damages, in spite of the fact that it is not the agent of the sender, but merely an independent party. Strong v. Western U. Tele. Co. 18 Idaho, 389, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 409, 109 Pac. 910, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 55.

Brokers whose telegram ordering the sale of cotton at a certain price is changed so as to authorize a sale at a lower price cannot be required to deliver the cotton at the lower price, inasmuch as the telegraph company is an independent principal, and not the agent of the brokers, and where the latter do deliver the cotton at the lower price after learning of the mistake, they are without remedy against the telegraph company. Shingleur v. Western U. Tele. Co. 72 Miss. 1030, 30 L.R.A. 444, 48 Am. St. Rep. 604, 18 So. 425.

But where a telegram quoting prices on lumber is changed by the telegraph company so as to offer it at a lower price than that quoted, and the lumber is shipped and received before the mistake is discovered, the sender may recover his damage from the telegraph company. Fisher v. Western U. Tele. Co. 119 Ky. 885, 84 S. W. 1179.

In Eureka Cotton Mills v. Western U. Tele. Co. 88 S. C. 498, 70 S. E. 1040, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 1273, however, the court, while proceeding upon the theory that the telegraph company is an independent contractor and the agent of neither the sender nor sendee, yet held, where a telegram quoting prices on yarns was changed during transmission so as to offer the yarns at a lower price than that quoted, and the sender thereof voluntarily furnished them at the lower price, that he could compel the telegraph company to reimburse him for the loss which he sustained thereby, inasmuch as a failure to protect his correspondents would have resulted in loss of trade.

Thus, one whose telegram quoting prices on potatoes is changed by the telegraph company so as to offer them at a lower price is not bound to deliver them at the lower price, inasmuch as the telegraph company is not his agent; but where the potatoes are shipped before the mistake is discovered, the shipper may recover damages resulting from the disposal of the potatoes with ordinary care in the market to which they were shipped. Postal Tele. Cable Co. v. Schaefer, 110 Ky. 907, 62 S. W. 1119. While it does not appear clearly from the language of the court in this case that the telegraph company is considered an independent principal, McKee v. Western U. Tele. Co. states that such is the theory of the case.

II. Right of addressee.

Generally as to the right of addressee of a telegram to sue for delay in delivery, see note to Anniston Cordage Co. v. Western U. Tele. Co. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1116.

In many cases, the courts, without definitely referring the result to any of the theories previously discussed, have held that the addressee may recover from the telegraph company the damages sustained by him in consequence of acting in reliance upon a telegram changed during transmission. New York & W. Printing Tele. Co. v. Dryburg, 35 Pa. 298, 78 Am. Dec. 338, affirming 3 Phila. 408 (the court said that the company was liable regardless of whether it is the agent of both the sender and sendee, or merely the agent of the sendee); Wolf Co. v. Western U. Tele. Co. 24 Pa. Super. Ct. 129 (error reducing estimate of price of machine, in reliance upon which addressee made a contract to erect a light plant); Joshua L. Bailey & Co. v. Western U. Tele. Co. 227 Pa. 522, 43 L.R.A. (N.S.) 502, 76 Atl. 736, 19 Ann. Cas.

negligence in failing to transmit and deliver the telegram as received by it from appellant; that appellee refused to make any correction of the mistake, or to take the excess of oats off his hands; and that he thereupon ordered the brokers to sell to the best advantage the 45,000 bushels of oats not ordered by him, with which order they complied, but, in doing so, appellant sustained a loss of $205, for which judgment was prayed against appellee, with costs. The answer simply traversed the allegations of the petition.

The agreed facts are as follows:

"First. On September 5, 1911, John McKee delivered to the agent of the Western Union Telegraph Company at Lawrenceburg, Kentucky, a telegram addressed to Henning, Chambers, & Company, in Louisville, and paid the charges for transmitting and delivering same. Said telegram was in words and figures as follows:

"Lawrenceburg, Ky., Sept. 5, 1911.

"Henning, Chambers, & Company,

"116 S. Fifth St.,

"Louisville, Ky.

"Buy five thousand bushels May oats at the opening of the market to-morrow and report by letter and not by telegram.

"(Signed) Jno. McKee."

"Second. The said telegram when delivered to the addressee, Henning, Chambers, & Company, in Louisville, read: 'Buy fifty thousand bushels,' etc.; the difference be-

895 (an action by a commission merchant for loss sustained by being compelled to fill orders for dry goods under contracts made by him with his customers in reliance upon a telegram from the manufacturer in which the prices had been changed during transmission. The court said that "it is settled in this jurisdiction and by the great weight of authority in this country that a telegraph company is liable in tort to the addressee for injuries arising out of the negligent transmission of an intelligible message."); Wolfskehl v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 46 Hun, 542, 12 N. Y. S. R. 555 (telegram refusing to employ the addressee changed so as to apparently offer him employment. The court based its decision upon the ground that the service and the duty of a telegraph company are undertaken for both sender and sendee, and that "either party sustaining damages from the negligent performance of such duty should have remedy by action against the company for their recovery"); Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Lyon, 93 Miss. 590, 47 So. 344 (where the addressee received and paid for a quantity of apples without knowledge of an error in transmission of message quoting price).

In Ferrero v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 9 App. D. C. 455, 35 L.R.A. 548, in holding that, where a telegram quoting the price of potatoes was changed so that the potatoes were offered at a lower price than that quoted, the addressee could compel the telegraph company to reimburse him for the loss resulting from fulfilling sales made in reliance upon the telegram received, the court, without assigning any particular reason for its decision, said: "With apparent unanimity, the courts of our states have upheld the right of the receiver of a telegraphic message to maintain an action on the case, as for a tort committed, whenever he shall have sustained actual damage, without his own fault, by reason of the negligent alteration of the message in the process of its transmission. . . . As will be seen on examination of their decisions, the American courts have not all agreed upon a common reason for the rule 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) so generally adopted. The majority, apparently, have rested it upon the idea that the telegraphic agency is engaged in the exercise of a public franchise, having relation to the commerce of and between the states, and in consequence owes to the sender of the message a double duty,—one by reason of the contract, the other by virtue of the general obligation to perform the assumed undertaking; and to the person addressed a single duty, by virtue of the same general obligation. Others take the ground that the person addressed may be the beneficiary of the contract made upon its delivery to the transmitter, and that his right of action does not depend upon whether the sender had been constituted his agent for the purpose, but upon the question who was to be served in the transaction, and who has been damaged. Others, again, assign for reason that the act of the telegraph company, in altering the message, is the misrepresentation of a fact which, if reasonably resulting in injury to the receiver, entitles him to an action for his damages."

The sendee of a telegram, who has a cause of action against the telegraph company for an error in the transmission of the message, must seek his remedy in tort, and not in contract, where there is no contract relation between him and the telegraph company. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Dubois, 128 Ill. 248, 15 Am. St. Rep. 109, 21 N. E. 4. The court says: "Telegraph companies are the servants of the public, and bound to act whenever called upon, their charges being paid or tendered. They are, in that respect, like common carriers, the law imposing upon them a duty which they are bound to discharge. The extent of their liability is to transmit correctly the message as delivered. . . . Hence, when the receiver of a despatch suffers loss from the careless and negligent performance of its duty by such a company, he is entitled to recover damages for the tort, and the proper remedy is an action on the case."

In Rose v. United States Teleg. Co. 3 Abb. Pr. N. S. 408, 34 How. Pr. 308, a telegram authorizing the sale of a certain tween the telegram as received and as delivered being that the word 'five' before the word 'thousand,' as written in the telegram received by the company's agent at Lawrenceburg, was changed to read fifty.'

"Third. Said telegraphic order to buy oats was executed by plaintiff's brokers, the addressee, Henning, Chambers, & Company, in the terms in which said telegram was delivered to said addressee, to wit, 50,000 bushels, and not in the terms written by this plaintiff, to wit 5,000 bushels.

"Fourth. When notified by Henning, Chambers, & Company, of this purchase of 50,000 bushels of May oats, said McKee notified the defendant corporation and its manager at Louisville, Kentucky, and requested and demanded said corporation and its said manager to correct said mistake and wrong done him, which was refused.

"Fifth. Thereupon said McKee accepted said excess of 45,000 bushels of oats, and ordered his brokers, said Henning, Chambers, & Company, to sell to the best advan-number of barrels of oil by the sender's broker was changed by the telegraph company so as to authorize the sale of a much larger number of barrels. The action was brought by the broker to recover damages which he would sustain in fulfilling the contracts of sale made in reliance upon the number of barrels stated in the telegram. The court held that, inasmuch as the telegraph company was not the agent of the sendee, his action would have to be in tort for the actual damage sustained, and that, as the principal, and not the broker, was liable on the contracts of sale made by the latter, he was not damaged and had no cause of action at all.

It is held in Anniston Cordage Co. v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 161 Ala. 216, 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1116, 135 Am. St. Rep. 124, 49 So. 770, that where the telegraph company is not informed by the sender of a message that it is for the benefit of the sendee, and the wording of the message is not such as to charge the company with knowledge of that fact, the addressee cannot recover from the company in tort for a mistake in the transmission of the message. This is upon the theory that all actions by the sendee, whether in tort or contract, must be based upon the contract of transmission.

Where a telegram quoting the price of potatoes is changed in transmission so as to offer them for a lower price than that quoted, and the addressee, with knowledge of the mistake, accepts the potatoes at the price quoted, he has no right of action against the telegraph company for the loss thus sustained, whether it be considered the agent of the receiver or sender of the message. Joynes v. Postal Telegr. Cable Co. 37 Pa. Super. Ct. 63.

b. Telegraph company as agent of sender.

The theory discussed in I. a, that the telegraph company is the sender's agent, has been applied in some cases by holding that the addressee could not recover against the telegraph company.

Thus in Playford v. United Kingdom Electric Telegr. Co. L. R. 4 Q. B. 706, holding that the addressee [an ice dealer] of a telegram containing an offer for ice which was raised in transmission could not recover against the telegraph company although he delivered the ice without knowledge of the error, the court said: "The offer was sent by them [the purchasers] on their own behalf and in their own interest. In so doing they acted, it is true, on the invitation of the plaintiff, but not as his agents or as representing him; and the circumstance that there was an implied understanding between them that, in the event of his accepting their offer, he should reimburse them the expense of making it, in no way alters the relation between the two parties, which was that of seller and buyers, and not that of principal and agents. It follows that the plaintiff, who is a stranger to the contract with the company, cannot maintain an action against them for the breach of it."

So, the telegraph company is the agent of the sender, and the sendee must look to the latter for reparation for damages sustained as the result of the erroneous transmission of a telegram. Brooke v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 119 Ga. 694, 46 S. E. 826. This case, like some of the other Georgia cases, is based upon the establishment of the rule rather than the correctness thereof.

The preceding case was cited and followed in Richmond Hosiery Mills v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 123 Ga. 216, 51 S. E. 290, where it was held that, on the theory of the relationship of agency existing between the sender and the telegraph company, the sendee might hold the sender according to the terms of the telegram as received, and that the sendee's release of the sender from such contract did not give the sendee a right of action against the telegraph company for errors made in the transmission of a telegram.

However, it is held in Stewart, M. & Co. v. Postal Telegr. Cable Co. 131 Ga. 31, 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 692, 127 Am. St. Rep. 205, 61 S. E. 1045, that, although the sendee may hold the sender according to the terms of the communication received, he is not confined to that remedy, but may sue the telegraph company in tort. The court says that in so far as the preceding case of Brooke v. Western U. Telegr. Co. "denies the right of action ex delicto to an addressee of a telegram against a telegraph company for damages proximately caused by an error in transmission, it is disapproved."

tage the said 45,000 bushels of oats not originally ordered by him.

"Sixth. Said Henning, Chambers, & Company sold said 45,000 bushels of oats pursuant to said McKee's instructions, and to his loss in the sum of $205.

"Seventh. Said 45,000 bushels of oats were bought by said Henning, Chambers, & Co. at 49 cents on the morning of September 6th. Between the time of purchase and the time of sale the highest price quoted on the Chicago market for such oats was 49½ cents a bushel; and there was no time at which the same could have been sold at a price which would have realized a sum equal to their purchase price, plus the commission of said Henning, Chambers, & Company, on the purchase thereof.

"The plaintiff, McKee, contends that the Western Union Telegraph Company is liable to him for the loss sustained by him in the purchase and sale of the said 45,000 bushels of May oats. The defendant, Western Union Telegraph Company, contends that there was never a meeting of minds between said McKee and said brokers, Henning, Chambers, & Company, that said McKee was not bound to accept more than the 5,000 bushels of oats actually ordered by him; that his acceptance of the 45,000 bushels not ordered by him was a voluntary act on his part, and for any loss resulting to him because of said acceptance and sale the said telegraph company disclaims all responsibility."

A trial by jury was waived, and following the submission of the case to the court, judgment was entered dismissing the petition at appellant's cost; and, from that judgment, he has appealed.

It is conceded by the parties that the appellee, Western Union Telegraph Company, is neither the agent nor servant of the sender or addressee of a telegram transmitted by it, but that its relation to both is that of an independent contractor or public carrier. Upon looking, however, to the authorities upon this subject, we find them far from harmonious. Some of them hold that the telegraph company is the agent of the sender alone, and that he is bound by the message as delivered by the company; others, that the telegraph company is the agent of both the sender and addressee, and therefore liable to both in contract; yet others, that the telegraph company is the agent of neither the sender nor addressee, but an independent principal, and liable to either for the proximate result of its negligence. The latter doctrine obtains in England, in many of the states of this country, and was approved by this court in Postal Telegr. Cable Co. v. Schaefer, 110 Ky. 907, 62 S. W. 1119, in the opinion of 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

which it is said: "It is the contention of appellees that appellant was their agent in sending the telegram to Bernstein & Company and that the delivery of the erroneous message created and gave rise to a valid and enforceable contract on their part to deliver the potatoes to the sendee at the price named, and this view seems to have been taken by the Ohio magistrate, who presided in the trial of the suit instituted by Bernstein & Company against plaintiff; but, in our opinion, this view of the law is an erroneous one, and is in conflict with the great weight of authority both in England and in this country. Gray, in his treatise on Communications by Telegraph (page 189) says: 'A telegraph company may perhaps be called a "special agent," since it is employed to do a particular act, namely, to communicate a certain message. If so, the employer is responsible on the message as delivered only where that message is the one which he authorized the company to communicate, as distinguished from a certain message.' And he refers to Story on Agency, 8th ed. §§ 126-133. The same author also says: 'A person who employs a telegraph company authorizes it and holds it out as authorized, only to communicate a certain message; and, while he is responsible upon the message if the company duly delivers it, he is not responsible upon any other message which the company may deliver in its stead.' This exact question was fully considered in the case of Pepper v. Western U. Teleg. Co. decided by the supreme court of Tennessee, and reported in 87 Tenn. 554, 4 L.R.A. 661, 10 Am. St. Rep. 699, 11 S. W. 783.

But, without further considering this aspect of the case, it seems to be well settled that while a telegraph company must answer to the sender of a telegram erroneously transmitted by the company, where the sender has himself acted in good faith on the error, to his injury, it is, on the other hand, equally well settled that no responsibility can be made to rest upon the telegraph company for the erroneous transmission of a telegram where the sender, after discovery of the error of the company, gratuitously assumes the responsibility for the addressee's action in obeying the instructions contained in the telegram as erroneously transmitted by the company, as seems to be the situation presented in the instant case. Appellant, as sender of the telegram to Henning, Chambers, & Company, was not bound by its terms as erroneously transmitted and delivered to them by appellee, and when advised by Henning, Chambers, & Company, of the action taken by them pursuant to the erroneous advice contained in the telegram, appellant could have refused to be bound for the overpurchase of oats made by them, and thereby saved himself from loss; but, instead of doing this, according to the agreed facts, he directed them to sell on the best terms possible the excess over 5,000 bushels of the oats purchased by them, and demanded of appellee that it correct the mistake it had made in the telegram, and assume responsibility for the loss he sustained resulting, as claimed, from its erroneous transmission and delivery of the telegram to the addressee. It cannot therefore be said that appellant acted reasonably and in good faith on the error committed by appellee, to his prejudice. If, without knowledge of the error committed by appellee in transmitting and delivering the telegram to Henning, Chambers, & Company, he had directed the sale of the oats they purchased for him, and by such sale suffered loss, appellee would, in that event, have been liable to him for the damages he thereby sustained, the measure of which would have been the difference, if any, between the price he was forced by appellee's error to pay for the oats and their market price immediately after the mistake was discovered; but when, after discovering the mistake, he accepted and approved what had been done by Henning, Chambers, & Company, in obedience to the telegram as erroneously transmitted and delivered to them by appellee, and directed them to sell the oats, he condoned the error committed by appellee in the transmission and delivery of the telegram, at least to the extent of releasing them from liability for the loss sustained by him in the sale of the oats.

The precise question before us does not seem to have been decided in this jurisdiction, but it has elsewhere been passed on. But only one of these decisions (Eureka Cotton Mills v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 88 S. C. 498, 70 S. E. 1040, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 1273) can be said to sustain appellant's contention, which is that appellee, as an independent principal or public carrier, is under a liability to reimburse appellant for whatever loss he sustained resulting from its erroneous transmission of the telegram, regardless of the fact that he was not bound by what the addressee did in acting upon the erroneous telegram, and of the further fact of his acceptance of such action of the addressee after he received notice of appellee's erroneous transmission of the telegram. In Eureka Cotton Mills v. Western U. Teleg. Co. supra, the facts seemed to be that the plaintiff received a telegram from the Jenks Spinning Company inquiring if they would authorize the spinning company to sell for it on commission 100,000 pounds of yarn at 24 cent a pound. By way of reply, the plaintiff delivered to the telegraph company a telegram which informed the spinning company that it would sell the yarn at 24½ cents a pound. But, as delivered to the addressee, the words "at 24½ cents" were omitted. Upon receiving this altered telegram, the spinning company assumed an acceptance of their inquiry or offer to sell the yarn at 24 cents, and proceeded to dispose of it at that price. When notified of the mistake, the plaintiff at once refused to ship the yarn at 24 cents, but finally did so. It was held by the court that the telegraph company was liable to the plaintiff as a common carrier is liable to either sender or addressee for any damage occurring by the company's negligence, but the reasoning of the opinion is brief and unsatisfactory, and the question whether the loss suffered was the result of the error in transmission of the telegram or plaintiff's own voluntary act does not seem to have been considered; and, after all, it merely held that a telegraph company is an independent principal, liable in tort to either party for the direct and proximate result of its negligence, if its breach of duty resulted directly or indirectly in injury to the sender.

The case of Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Shotter, 71 Ga. 760, also relied on by appellant, falls short of sustaining his contention. While the language of the opinion, considered apart from the facts, apparently justifies its citation by the brief of counsel, it does not really do so, because it appears, from the facts stated therein, that the supposed offer by the sender of the telegram had, in fact, been accepted by the addressee, and the merchandise actually shipped by the sender of the message before the mistake was discovered. It will also be found from an examination of the opinions in Postal Teleg. Cable Co. v. Schaefer, 110 Ky. 907, 62 S. W. 1119, and Fisher v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 119 Ky. 885, 84 S. W. 1179, cited by appellant's counsel, that they likewise fail to support his view of the law attempted to be applied to this case. In the Schaefer Case a telegram was sent by the appellee to brokers in Cleveland, offering potatoes at $1.70 a barrel. The addressees replied: "Telegram received ship two cars your price." On receipt of this telegram, appellee shipped two carloads of potatoes to the addressees at Cleveland, and mailed invoice and draft with bill of lading attached. The discovery was then made that appellee's message, which had been written $1.70 per barrel, had been erroneously delivered to the addressees reading $1.07 per barrel. Following the discovery of the mistake, the addressees refused to take the potatoes at $1.70, and the appellee refused to take $1.07 for them. Upon the arrival of the potatoes in Cleveland, the addressees sued Schaefer for the difference between the price of $1.07, claimed by them, and the market value of the potatoes, and attached the potatoes in the hands of the railroad. The telegraph company, though informed of the situation, refused to enter into the controversy. The appellee made defense in the suit in Cleveland. In the meantime the potatoes, which remained in the freight car, were spoiling, and, by reason thereof, the railroad company sold them for the freight, and held the balance of the price obtained pending the termination of the Cleveland suit. Appellee, having lost that suit, brought an action against the telegraph company for the value of the potatoes, plus the cost of the Cleveland suit, less the sale price of the potatoes at Cleveland, with freight deducted. On the appeal we held that, while there was no contract made between the sender and the addressees of the message erroneously transmitted, and the former was not bound by the terms of the message as delivered, he was entitled to recover from the telegraph company any damages incurred as the direct and proximate result of its negligence; the measure of recovery being the difference between the market value of the potatoes at Louisville when shipped and at Cleveland when the mistake was discovered. It will be observed, however, that the mistake was discovered while the potatoes were in transit, and before any delivery had been made to the consignee, so the telegraph company was never relieved of liability for its mistake in transmitting the message by any act upon the part of the sender condoning the mistake, and, after all, the principal question decided in the case was that, where a telegraph company negligently delivers a different message from that it was authorized to deliver, so that the sender was represented as offering goods at a lower price than that at which he had in fact offered them, and the supposed offer was accepted in ignorance of the mistake, there was no contract, and the sender was not bound to deliver the goods at the lower price at which the addressee of the message mistakenly supposed he was to get them, and the latter was not bound to accept the goods at the higher price at which the message, as delivered to the telegraph company, proposed to sell them; therefore the sender had the right to look to the telegraph company for the loss sustained, as it resulted solely from its negligence.

In Fisher v. Western U. Teleg. Co. the facts were that the plaintiff's offer to sell lumber at $35 per thousand was negligently transmitted by the telegraph company so as 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) to read $25 per thousand, and was accepted and the lumber furnished by the seller without knowledge of the mistake in the transmission of the message. The company also received the lumber without knowledge of the mistake in the message, and believing that they were to get it at $25 per thousand. As the sender was able to collect of the latter only that price for the lumber, it was held he had the right to recover of the telegraph company the loss resulting to him from its mistake, which was the difference between the price its negligence compelled him to receive for the lumber and its fair market value at the place of delivery.

It will readily be seen wherein the facts of the instant case differ from those of the two cases last cited. Here the loss was sustained by the appellant, not because of the mistake made by appellee in transmitting and delivering his telegram to the addressee, but because of appellant's gratuitous act in seeing fit, after his discovery of the mistake, to assume the responsibility of the addressee's action; and, applying the rule announced in the Schaefer and Fisher Cases to the facts of the instant case, it is evident that appellant was not bound to take the 45,000 bushels of oats mistakenly bought for him by Henning, Chambers, & Company, or any excess of the 5,000 bushels actually ordered by him, and, if he had repudiated instead of ratifying his brokers' purchase of the excess, it would have saved him from loss, and enabled the latter to recover of appellee whatever loss they may have sustained upon the 45,000 bushels of oats they were induced to purchase through its erroneous transmission of the telegram delivered to it by appellant.

Of the several cases cited by appellee in support of its contention as to its nonliability in this case, that of Shingleur v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 72 Miss. 1030, 30 L.R.A. 444, 48 Am. St. Rep. 604, 18 So. 425, seems to be directly in point. In that case the plaintiffs, by a telegram to their agents, authorized a sale of cotton at 8½ cents a pound. As transmitted and delivered by the telegraph company, it erroneously authorized the sale of the cotton at 8¼ cents a pound, and the addressee entered into a contract of sale with third parties at that price. After notice of the mistake in the telegram, as received by the addressee, the plaintiffs, considering themselves bound by the message, delivered the cotton to the addressee at the lower price. It was held by the court that the plaintiffs were not required to deliver to the addressee under the erroneous message the cotton to be sold, and that their voluntary act in so doing, and not the negligence of the telegraph company in erroneously transmitting the telegram, was the proximate cause of the loss sustained by them in the sale of the cotton. In the opinion it is said: "But, whether looked at in the light of contract or of tort, plaintiffs' case comes inevitably to this: That plaintiffs, at a time when they knew fully of the mistake in the telegram, and when they could have delivered or refused to deliver the cotton, and when,—the minds of the plaintiffs and of Appleton, Dixon, & Company [addressee] never having met, and there being, as to this sale, no contract made between them, plaintiffs being therefore under no legal liability to deliver the cotton,—nevertheless, acting on the sentiment that they would themselves protect their agent (already fully protected by the liability in fact of the company to such agent), and maintain their business credit, did deliver the cotton anyhow, and, having done so, now seek to hold the company. . . . Here, appellants had shipped no goods, had incurred no legal liability, had merely to refuse to comply with the terms of a contract they had never made, and remit Appleton, Dixon, & Company to their adequate remedy against the company. Their payment was voluntary and gratuitous, and cannot, on any sound or just principle, create for them a cause of action where none existed prior to such voluntary payment."

To the same effect is the case of Harrison v. Western U. Teleg. Co. decided by the Texas court of appeals, reported in 10 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 600. In that case a telegram by which the plaintiff ordered the purchase of cotton was erroneously changed in its transmission to sell. A settlement was made between the plaintiff and addressee upon the terms of the erroneous message, and the former sued the telegraph company for the resulting loss. In holding that the telegraph company was not liable, the court in part said: "The mistake which occasioned the loss, if any was sustained by Latham, Alexander, & Company [addressee], was a mistake of the telegraph company, and not of plaintiffs, and plaintiffs were not bound to pay or make good said loss to Latham, Alexander, & Company; and, if they made such payment, were not liable or responsible therefor; they could not hold the company liable over to them for repayment."

Perhaps the latest decision of this question to which our attention has been called is that of Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Peter & Neylon, 160 S. W. 991, decided by the Texas court of civil appeals November 26, 1913, from which it appears that in a telegram sent by plaintiffs to their brokers the latter were instructed to sell cotton futures for their account. In its transmission the telegram was so changed by the telegraph company as to direct the brokers to buy instead of sell. Immediately following the receipt of the telegram, the addressee purchased cotton for the senders' account. The plaintiffs, with knowledge of the mistake made in the transmission of the telegram, accepted the purchase, and resold it at a loss. It then sued the telegraph company for its loss, but the court said, in reversing the judgment of the lower court: "It appears that, if appellees, when first apprised of this purchase, had repudiated it, no loss would have resulted. . . . Notwithstanding the appellant in the present case was negligent on account of its mistake in transmitting the message, yet we think that, if plaintiffs knew of such fact, or were charged with notice thereof, and could have prevented the loss by resort to available means within their power, and failed to do so, and such failure proximately contributed to such loss, they would be guilty of contributory negligence, and could not recover."

As appellant could not have been held to the terms of the telegram to his brokers as erroneously transmitted and delivered to them by appellee, and he would have suffered no loss on the purchase and sale of the oats but for his own act in accepting, after discovery of the mistake, the brokers' purchase of the oats in excess of the quantity actually ordered by him, it necessarily follows that the negligence of the appellee complained of was not the proximate cause of the damages he sustained; and, as this was the conclusion reached by the Circuit Court, the judgment is affirmed.

LOUISIANA SUPREME COURT.

W. K. HENDERSON, Jr., Appt.,

v.

SHREVEPORT GAS, ELECTRIC LIGHT,

(— La. —, 63 So. 616.)

Contract — public — enforcement by individual.

1. A city ordinance which is a contract between the city and a quasi public cor-

Headnotes by SOMMERVILLE, J.

Note. — No case other than HENDERSON v. SHREVEPORT GAS, E. L. & P. Co. seems to have passed directly upon the question as to who is a manufacturer within the meaning of an ordinance or contract regulating the rates of public service corporations. At least an extended search discloses no electricity, gas, steam, telegraph, telephone, or water supply case which has passed upon this point.

A case which may be of interest, how-poration, and which fixes terms upon which the said corporation shall supply gas and electricity to inhabitants of the city, will be enforced in favor of the inhabitants of that city.

Trial — court — construction of contract.

2. Where such ordinance undertakes to divide the inhabitants into three different classes, terming the first "domestic consumption," the second for "public institutions," and the third "manufacturers," and the business of a certain inhabitant does not technically fall within any one of the three classes, it is a question for the court, when appealed to, to construe the contract and to determine within which class said inhabitant and his business shall be placed.

Gas — rate — generation of electricity.

3. A person who owns and conducts an automobile garage in which he uses a gas engine for the purpose of generating an electric current to supply light for a large building in which he carries on his business, to charge electric automobiles and storage batteries, to run lathes and emery wheels, to make parts for cars, to put other parts of automobiles into good condition, to grind valves of cars, and do other work in that connection, will be placed in the class denominated "manufacturers," rather than in either of the classes denominated "domestic consumption" or "for public institutions," and be held obligated to pay the rate fixed for "manufacturers."

adjacent blocks exceeded the total set by the ordinance, and that breweries not so located, which did not use a quantity of water exceeding such amount, must pay the higher rate. It should be noted that this case decides what constitutes a "manufacturing purpose" or "manufacturing plant" within the meaning of the ordinance, rather than the question whether or not brewing beer, etc., is manufacturing. It seems to have been assumed, however, that the brewery association was engaged in manufacturing.

Where plaintiff is charged a reasonable rate for services rendered by a public service corporation, he cannot demand to be placed in a class in favor of whom he alleges the public service corporation has unjustly and illegally discriminated. The remedy, if any, is to raise the rates of those in favor of whom discriminations are made.

Chouteau v. Union R. & Transit Co. 22 Mo. App. 286.

Where there is competition between public service corporations, a lower rate may be given by either of the competing companies at points of competition, without being guilty of an illegal or unjust discrimination.

Sommerville, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Under an ordinance of the city of Shreveport, the defendant company was granted the right to operate a natural and artificial gas plant, and lay gas pipes through the streets and alleys and other public places in the city, and to charge for the gas consumed. The consumers were divided into three classes, with a certain charge for each class. The first class covers "domestic consumption," for which a maximum charge of 25 cents for 1,000 cubic feet of gas, less a discount for prompt payment, is fixed. The next class is for "public institutions," which may be charged a maximum of 20 cents per 1,000 cubic feet, less a discount for prompt payment. And the third class is that of "manufacturers," which may be charged a maximum of 11 cents per 1,000 cubic feet, less a discount for prompt payment. The price to be paid by manufacturers was also graduated, so as to permit a larger discount where certain designated cubic feet of gas were used.

Plaintiff owns and conducts an automobile garage, in which he uses a gas engine for the purpose of generating an electric current to supply the lights for a large building, to charge electric automobiles and storage batteries, to run his lathes and emery wheels, with which he makes parts for cars when necessary, and places other parts of automobiles in condition so that they can be used, and to grind the valves of cars, and other work in this connection.

Defendant has classed plaintiff under the second paragraph of the 1st section of the ordinance, headed "domestic consumption," and has charged him the highest rate permitted by the ordinance for the natural gas furnished by it. Plaintiff complains that the charge made by defendant is illegal, unreasonable, and excessive. He claims that his business falls within the fourth paragraph of the 1st section of the ordinance, headed "manufacturers," and that he should be charged the rate therein established. He asked for an injunction restraining defendant from refusing to furnish gas to him at the rate fixed for "manufacturers," and for a moneyed judgment for the amount paid by him through error on his previous monthly bills. There was judgment dissolving the injunction and dismissing plaintiff's suit; and he appeals.

The ordinance which is the basis of and a part of the contract between the city of Shreveport and the defendant company is very short, and it undertakes to provide certain rates for all the gas consumed by the inhabitants of the city. And they are divided into only three classes, with a different rate or charge for each class before stated. Defendant, being engaged in furnishing the city of Shreveport with gas and electric power for lighting, heating, and power, is in the nature of a quasi public service corporation, it is being operated under a franchise granted by the common council of the city of Shreveport, and under an ordinance which undertakes to say that defendant shall supply gas and electricity to the inhabitants of the city at certain maximum rates, with the proviso: "That a less amount may be charged by the said company on its own motion, but no greater amount shall be charged."

rates to consumers for gas and electricity to be furnished by the defendant, and plaintiff's business not being specifically mentioned in the ordinance, the question presented for consideration is: Within which class does a person fall who conducts an automobile garage in which he uses a gas engine for the purpose of generating electricity to be used in his business, and where that engine is supplied with fuel gas by the defendant company? The question may be solved by a process of elimination; for it is clear that plaintiff is entitled to get gas from the defendant company, and that he must pay one of the rates established in the ordinance which grants to the defendant company the right to furnish and charge for gas.

The first class provides for "domestic consumption." "Domestic" is defined by Webster to be: "Of or pertaining to one's house or home, or one's household or family; relating to home life; as domestic concerns, life, duty, happiness, worship, service." See also 3 Words & Phrases, 2164. The word "domestic" therefore excludes the idea of business, unless one pursues his vocation or calling within his home. The Century defines "domestic" to be: "Relating or belonging to the home or household or to household affairs; pertaining to one's place of residence, or to the affairs which concern it, or used in the conduct of such affairs."

And it is this commonly accepted meaning that the council of the city of Shreveport had in mind when it passed the ordinance referred to, and provided a price to be paid for the "domestic consumption" of gas. Plaintiff does not operate his automobile garage in his home or residence. It is a separate and distinct place of business, where he uses a gas engine for the purpose of generating electricity to be used there by him in the conduct of his business. He is not therefore a domestic consumer, and he cannot be charged the rates for "domestic consumption" of gas.

The next paragraph provides for "public institutions" which use gas. A "public institution" is: "One which is created and exists by law or public authority" (32 Cyc. 767), such as an asylum, charity, college and university, hospital, schoolhouse, etc. Plaintiff's business is not a public institution.

The fourth and last paragraph in the ordinance provides prices or rates to be paid by "manufacturers." And so we are forced to the conclusion that the city council of the city of Shreveport intended to embrace in this paragraph all forms of business, except those of public institutions. The word "manufacturers" appears to have been used to distinguish the use of gas for cooking, heating, and lighting homes and residences, and again for cooking, heating, lighting, and power purposes in "public institutions," from the use of gas for power purposes, which is more generally and largely used in manufacturing than in other businesses.

There is not a doubt that, when the council passed the ordinance and used the term "domestic consumption," it referred to the consumption of gas for cooking, heating, and lighting in homes and residences, which are the ordinary domestic purposes to which gas may be put; and, in the absence of any clause to the contrary, it is quite clear that the council did not contemplate that gas should be charged for as for domestic consumption when it was used for power purposes.

And, while the use of gas for power purposes does not in every instance result in the manufacture of some article, yet, in the instant case, the gas used by the plaintiff in his business does generate electricity which produces light for the purposes of his business of carrying on an automobile garage, where he further uses the electricity for his lathes and other implements in that business.

It has been held that "the production of electricity by artificial means in a condition fit for use is generally held to be manufacture, and the theory that it is merely the gathering and use of a gift of nature is disapproved." 26 Cyc. 522. And in the case of Beggs v. Edison Electric Illuminating Co. 96 Ala. 295, 38 Am. St. Rep. 94, 11 So. 381, the court said: "According to the above definitions of the word manufacture, we are constrained to consider and declare an electric light company a manufacturing corporation to all intents and purposes. It is no answer to this argument to say that electricity exists in a state in nature. . . . It is the produce of capital and labor, and in this respect cannot be distinguished from ordinary manufacturing operations." Burke v. Mead, 159 Ind. 252, 64 N. E. 880; People ex rel. Brush Electric Mfg. Co. v. Wemple, 129 N. Y. 543, 14 L.R.A. 708, 29 N. E. 808; Com. ex rel. McCormick v. Keystone Electric Light, Heat & P. Co. 193 Pa. 245, 44 Atl. 326.

In the case of State v. New Orleans R. & Light Co. 116 La. 144, 40 So. 507, 7 Ann. Cas. 724, where that company claimed exemption from license taxation, we say: "An electric light company is not a 'manufacturer' in the sense of the exemption clause of article 229 of the Constitution of 1898, authorizing the legislature to impose license taxes." We further say there: "In the ordinary popular meaning of the word, a 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) corporation which operates gas or electric works is not a 'manufacturer,' and is not so styled, though, scientifically speaking, gas or electricity may be a product of manufacture."

And we therein apply the rule that tax exemptions are strictly construed, and hold that the light company is not exempt from taxation under the provisions of the Constitution which exempt manufacturers from taxation.

On the other hand, we have held that a cooper is a manufacturer, and exempt (New Orleans v. Le Blanc, 34 La. Ann. 596); that rice millers are also manufacturers, and exempt from the payment of license taxes (New Orleans v. Ernst, 35 La. Ann. 746); that refiners of sugar are manufacturers and exempt (State v. American Sugar Ref. Co. 108 La. 603, 32 So. 965, 973; see also United States v. E. C. Knight Co. 156 U. S. 1, 39 L. ed. 325, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 249, 254); that a publisher of a newspaper is a manufacturer and exempt (State v. Dupre, 42 La. Ann. 561, 7 So. 727); and that a sawmill is exempt (State ex rel. Browne v. A. W. Wilbert's Sons Lumber & Shingle Co. 51 La. Ann. 1223, 26 So. 106).

Other jurisdictions have been equally lenient in holding certain businesses as being within the term "manufacturers," and in not restricting the term to those who produce some material substance or article from the raw material, such as a bridge building company, an asphalt company, a boiler maker, packing of beef, milling, etc.

And under the express provisions of Laws (Ill.) 1893, p. 99, the words "manufacturing establishment, factory, or workshop," wherever used in such act, which declares that no female shall be employed in any manufacturing establishment, factory, or workshop, etc., more than eight hours in any one day, etc., shall be construed to mean any place where goods or products are manufactured or repaired, cleaned, or sorted, in whole or in part, for sale or for wages. Ritchie v. People, 155 Ill. 98, 29 L.R.A. 79, 46 Am. St. Rep. 315, 40 N. E. 454.

It has also been held that every person who purchases, receives, or holds personal property of any description, for the purpose of adding to the value thereof by any process of manufacturing, refining, rectifying, or by a combination of different materials, with a view of making a gain or profit by so doing, shall be held to be a "manufacturer" for the purposes of the revenue act.

"The primary meaning of the word 'manufacture' is something made by hand, as distinguished from a natural growth; but, as machinery has largely supplanted this primitive method, the word is now ordinarily used to denote an article upon the material of which labor has been expended to make the finished product. Ordinarily the article so manufactured takes a different form, or at least subserves a different purpose, from the original materials, and usually it is given a different name. Raw materials may be, and often are, subjected to successive processes of manufacture, each one of which is complete in itself, but several of which may be required to make the final product." 5 Words & Phrases, 4348.

All definitions of the term "manufacture" or "manufacturing" limit them to the production of material substances. And it is held in some jurisdictions that, because electricity is not a material substance, the electric companies are not manufacturers; while the opposite view is held in other jurisdictions.

As has been before seen, plaintiff is engaged in the automobile garage business, where he uses the gas furnished by the defendant for the purpose of generating electricity which is used by him for lighting purposes in his business, for charging electric automobiles and storage batteries, to run his lathes and emery wheels, with which he makes parts for cars when necessary, and places other parts of automobiles in condition so that they can be used, and to grind valves of cars and other work in that connection. And, while the electricity used by him from the gas furnished by defendant may not be a material substance, it is a very necessary substance in his business; and as that business is not provided for in the ordinance under consideration, and as he is entitled to receive gas from the defendant company, and he is obliged to pay for same in accordance with the contract between the city of Shreveport and defendant, he must fall within one of the three classes found in the ordinance or contract.

In construing the terms of contracts we do not apply the rule of strict construction applicable to exemptions from taxation. Plaintiff comes nearer being a manufacturer than he does a domestic consumer or a public institution; and he must pay the rate established in the ordinance for gas used by "manufacturers."

The judgment appealed from is annulled, avoided, and reversed; and it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that there be judgment in favor of plaintiff and against defendant in the sum of $181.53; and that the injunction herein issued be reinstated and maintained, with costs in both courts.

Petition for rehearing denied December 15, 1913.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

BERTHA GRANGER, by Next Friend, Plff.
in Err.,
v.

WALTER S. FARRANT.

(— Mich. —, 146 N. W. 218.)

Evidence — repairs to automobile — self-serving declarations.

1. Upon the question of negligence of the owner of a garage in driving a car against another on the highway, repair tickets issued by the garage showing the nature of repairs made upon his car are not admissible in evidence, nor is a private letter from him relating to repairs made just prior to the accident admissible, since they are mere self-serving declarations.

Highway — negligent driving of automobile — forcing other car off from road.

2. The driver of an automobile who overtakes and passes another car at such speed, and returns to the right side of the road so close to it as to disconcert its driver by striking the car and causing it to swerve over the embankment, is liable for the injury thereby inflicted upon the occupants of the car, although the blow was not sufficient to propel the car over the embankment.

Negligence — of driver of automobile — imputation to guest.

3. The negligence of the owner of an automobile in not properly controlling it when another machine is brought into collision with it, by reason of which it leaves the road and injures a guest riding in the machine, is imputable to the guest.

Note. — Automobiles: liability for crowding automobile off the road.

Little authority has been disclosed upon the question of liability for injuries resulting from crowding an automobile off the road. The instruction of the trial court in GRANGER v. FARRANT to the effect that if the defendant's car hit the one in which the plaintiff was riding, but the hitting did not send it over the embankment and cause the injury, then the defendant's negligent act would not be the proximate cause of the injury, and no recovery could be had, does not appear to be sound, but it would seem that in such case, as was held by the appellate court, a recovery should be allowed if it is found that, by reason of the defendant's driving his car in contact with that in which the plaintiff is riding, the driver of the latter is taken unaware, and in seeking to avoid injury to the defendant's car he is compelled to go so near an embankment as to lose his balance and go over, by reason of which the plaintiff was injured.

In Mark v. Fritsch, 195 N. Y. 282, 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 632, 133 Am. St. Rep. 800, 88 N. E. 380, where damages had been sus-

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Kent County to review a judgment in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

When there is evidence tending to support the claim of a party litigant, the case should be submitted on his theory, as well as on that of his opponent.

Unless it is definitely alleged that the violation of some duty contributes in some manner to an injury, it is not a good allegation, and it is not competent for a court to allow a mass of testimony to go before a jury and leave them to decide each for tained through an overtaking automobile attempting to pass one ahead, the defendant contended that the plaintiff unnecessarily and intentionally crowded in toward the defendant as the latter attempted to pass, and the plaintiff on the other hand claimed that the defendant unnecessarily and intentionally crowded in toward him until, under the fear of collision, even though it did not actually occur, he was forced from the roadway and his machine injured. The court held that if either party did the things charged against him by the other, he was guilty of gross misconduct, which, if it was the plaintiff, would bar him from any right of recovery, and said: "The general rules governing the movement of automobiles, except as modified by statute, are the same as those which, as the result of long usage, have been formulated for the government of simpler vehicles, such as wagons. The fundamental principle of conduct is that of reasonable care and accommodation, measured by the immediate circumstances of each case, and exercised by each traveler for the purpose of affording to the other his just and reasonable rights in the highway. When two cars meet, it is the duty of each, so far as practicable, to yield to the other the space and opportunity necessary for its safe and convenient passage."

Stone, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In this case the plaintiff, a married woman, under twenty-one years of age at the time of bringing suit, seeks to recover damages against the defendant for injuries claimed to have been received on the 30th day of July, 1910, in the afternoon of that day, while the plaintiff was riding, by invitation, with one Frank Skinner and his wife, in a Reo automobile on the highway in Ionia county near Lake Odessa. They were traveling in a northwesterly direction, and, at a railroad crossing of the highway, it is the claim of the plaintiff that defendant, operating and driving a Chalmers automobile, came up behind Skinner's automobile, in which the plaintiff was riding, driving at an unreasonable and unlawful rate of speed, and without warning passed them on the left, then swerved suddenly to the right, ahead of Skinner's automobile, and forced it over an embankment, throwing the plaintiff out and severely injuring her, by breaking her arm and inflicting permanent injuries.

All of the occupants of the Reo car testified, in substance, that the defendant, just as Skinner's automobile was going onto the railroad crossing, without blowing his horn or giving warning, suddenly ran up beside them at the west end of the crossing, and went diagonally across the road in front of the Reo car, striking it, as they judged by the jar and grating sound. There was an intersecting road immediately ahead of them at this point known as the "Lansing" road.

It is the claim of the plaintiff that the Reo car, in which she was riding, crossed the east end of the planks on the railroad crossing, and, in order to follow the road to Lake Odessa, which he desired, it was necessary for Skinner to turn a little to the left. It was while he should have been making this angle that it is claimed the defendant's automobile ran down diagonally across the road in front of him, cutting off all space on the Lake Odessa road.

The declaration, after alleging the duty of defendant, contains the following averments:

after crossing the said railroad crossing, and at the intersection of the highways, did operate and direct his automobile, which said automobile was then running at the rate of speed of 30 to 40 miles an hour, diagonally across said highway, so that his said automobile struck and came in contact with the front wheel of and otherwise came in contact with the said automobile so driven by the said Frank Skinner, and so occupied by the said plaintiff, thereby causing the said automobile so driven by the said Frank Skinner, and so occupied by the said plaintiff, to leave the highway and run down a bank, to wit, 6 feet high, over rough and impassable ground, so that the automobile came to a sudden stop, and the said plaintiff and the other occupants of the said automobile were thrown from said automobile to the ground."

"And the said defendant, further disregarding his duty in the premises, when he passed the said automobile so run by the said Skinner and occupied by the plaintiff, as aforesaid, did not slow down to a reasonable rate of speed and run in and upon the space at the left side of the middle of the traveled portion of the highway, and in such manner as not to come in contact with or interfere with the peaceable and lawful rights of the said Skinner and the plaintiff, and did not slow down and run his automobile at a reasonable rate of speed, and did not pass through and over the space between the automobile so run by the said Skinner and occupied by the plaintiff and the westerly side of the highway over the space left by said Skinner for that purpose; but, on the contrary, carelessly and negligently, and without any caution, or taking any means to protect the rights of this plaintiff, ran and drove his automobile close to and against and struck the automobile so run by the said Skinner and occupied by the said plaintiff, so that the said automobile run by the said Skinner and occupied by the said plaintiff left the highway and ran down an embankment, thereby causing great injury to this plaintiff as hereinafter set forth."

"And the defendant, further disregarding his duties in the premises, when approaching the automobile so run by the said Skinner, and so occupied by the plaintiff and Mrs. Skinner, gave no warning of his approach, and did not ask or communicate his desire to pass; but, on the contrary, with great force and violence, carelessly and negligently ran his said automobile with great speed at and against the said automobile so run by the said Skinner and occupied by the said plaintiff."

Frank Skinner, the driver of the Reo automobile, testified, among other things, as follows: "I just got nicely on the railroad track, and I heard a sound at the left-hand side of me. It sounded to me like a motor sounds when you are driving along at a high rate of speed and your engine is speeded up. You release the clutch, your engine takes the surplus power without anything connected with it, and that is the way it sounded to me and as I heard it. I turned my head, and I saw an automobile aside of me, right onto me, and they seemed to be coming in an angling way across the track towards me, and, just as I got across the track, they hit the front end of our machine, and the blow was pretty hard. It sounded to me like the fenders coming together. And that is the last I knew what it was until I picked myself up from under the car. Q. What effect did it have on the car; where did it go? A. It took it right off from the bank, right down into the ditch. I was thrown out of the car, and found myself under the car, under the running board. Mrs. Granger was lying on her back with her head near my feet. . . . This other machine was on the left-hand side of me, and when it ran across and in front of me, it came so close to the east side of the road that it pushed the sand right down the side of the road that way. It practically shut me off so that I could not turn at all. If my machine ran, it either would have run into that machine or go down off the bank."

Mrs. Eva Skinner, wife of Frank Skinner, speaking of defendant's car, testified, in part, as follows: "We were just going on the railroad track when I noticed it. I should think that the front of their machine at that time was just about where Mrs. Granger and I sat, even with our back seat. They cut right in ahead of us just after we left the crossing. They ran right towards the front of our machine. I remember that they gave a bound, and it seemed as though their fenders struck ours. I know I heard a noise, and I wondered what would become of us. I heard a noise of the machines coming together; and the next I knew I was going over the bank, and the next was picking myself up." She then testified that defendant's car did not stop, but pushed on rapidly towards Grand Rapids.

The plaintiff upon this subject testified as follows: "I was sitting in the Skinner machine on the left-hand side in the back seat with Mrs. Skinner. I do not know how I happened to notice the machine back of us; do not remember of hearing anything. I just looked around and saw it. Mrs. Skinner spoke about the same time that I looked around about the machine. The next that I saw the automobile that was following us was just before we struck the railroad track. We were just a little way—just a short distance—from the railroad crossing. At that time it was behind us. I looked towards the center. I think Mrs. Skinner looked around when I did. As to the distance I was from the railroad crossing I cannot tell. It seemed to me that we were nearly to the tracks. Then, shortly after that, we heard the machine. It was immediately, and we were then on the track. We were on the right-hand side going across the railroad track, I think so, and the other machine was on the left-hand side of us, very close. At that time I noticed a big noise, a very loud noise, and I noticed a terrible bound, and everything else happened at once. I heard the noise and felt a jar. The noise, as I remember it, seemed to me as a metallic sound, a sort of grating. Just an instant, and a jar and everything was all at once. The last I remember was I kind of caught my breath. . . ."

Q. What can you say, witness, as to whether or not the machine struck you?

A. Why, I heard the noise and a sound and a jar.

Q. Now, when was the next thing you knew, that you can remember about the transaction?

A. Why, I do not remember any more about that. The next I remember I was in bed.

Witness then described her injuries, and claimed that she received permanent injuries at that time.

To show that the cars came in contact, the plaintiff offered evidence showing the location of the tracks, the condition of the hub cap on the machine in which the plaintiff was riding, and the condition of the fenders; and also showed that they made an immediate effort at Grand Rapids, where the defendant resided and owned a public garage, to see the defendant's machine, but did not succeed, as it appeared that the defendant had secreted his automobile.

On the other hand, the defendant claimed, and gave evidence tending to support his claim, that he did not pass the Skinner car at the place named, but that he passed it before reaching the railroad crossing; that he did not touch or run against the Skinner machine at all, but passed 5 feet away from it, 25 or 30 feet south of the railroad crossing; and that his machine was not broken or injured in any way. The defendant learned on his arrival in Grand Rapids the same day of the injury that information had been conveyed by telephone to police headquarters; that the plaintiff was seriously injured; and that it was claimed the defendant had caused the injury. This suit was begun by capias ad respondendum, and defendant arrested thereon on August 8, 1910.

It was conceded that the factory number of the Chalmers automobile operated on the day in question by the defendant was 13055. Defendant's said automobile was taken from the public garage on the evening of the accident, and placed in his barn at his residence in Grand Rapids, and remained there nearly all the time until it was sold on the 13th day of August following. As tending to show that this machine was not injured and had no marks upon it, the defendant was permitted, over the objection and exception of the plaintiff, to introduce in evidence certain cards or tickets which, it was claimed, were made at his garage or place of business, showing when any work was done on a car; that these cards or tickets were kept at defendant's place of business, and were filed in numerical order. Many of these tickets or cards were offered and received in evidence.

Exhibit 20 is a fair sample: "Repair and Sales Record. August 10, 1910. Owner: Roadster 13055. Instructions: Drain all oil out of motor and put in fresh; clean clutch disk thoroughly with kerosene. Lubricate clutch properly with about 2½ oil in clutch case, mixed with about ½ kerosene. Tighten clutch slightly and evenly. Date: Workman: H. E. Time: 2 hours. Oil ½ pt. K. 3-4. 12 10c. Inspected: H. E. 1 8-15."

The following objection was made by plaintiff's counsel: "I object to this ticket. I do not know of any case that makes this kind of matter, after the transaction has occurred, competent. What Mr. Farrant did after that time, his own acts or his bookkeeper, does not matter in any way. It is not an outside bookkeeper's business; it is just what Farrant did. It is incompetent evidence; I think what he did is self-serving; matters done by him or his agents after this transaction."

Defendant's counsel: "I think it competent. It has been held that, where regular files are kept connected with a business, where the business is of such volume that regular files are kept, and these files are produced, such as railroad company files, or any business that requires a large number of such things to be made, and requires help to do it, that these are competent evidence."

Court: "I will receive it."

Plaintiff's counsel: "Note an exception."

Another ticket offered and received in evidence bore date the 11th day of August, three days after the case was commenced. It was objected to as a self-serving declaration. 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

tion made by the defendant, or by his help. It was the claim of defendant's attorney that they all referred to work done on the machine.

It appeared that the defendant was the agent at Grand Rapids of the Chalmers Motor Car Company of Detroit; that on the occasion of the injury to the plaintiff the defendant was returning from a visit to the Chalmers Motor Car Company at Detroit; that, while in Detroit, the radiator upon the automobile which he was driving had been changed by the said company by reason of a leak or defect in the radiator, and one of a different color had been placed upon the machine. Just what materiality there was in this circumstance it is difficult to discover.

The trial court, however, allowed the defendant to introduce in evidence a letter reading as follows:

W. S. Farrant.

Grand Rapids, Mich., Aug. 10, 1910.

My Dear James:—

This is purely personal. I want to get your advice. You remember the exchange of radiators,—putting on an unpainted one in place of the one that had been defective and leaking since received. I to-day received invoice R—45487 for labor and expense repairing radiator exchanged on car, net $15, and six hours' labor $3, total $18. I do not mind the labor. We do not charge our customers for labor or parts, when they have defective parts. Is this right or is it an error? Tell me how you view it and how you would handle it, and I would appreciate the favor very much, and I will then write to the proper department.

Your very truly

Farrant.

Mr. Jean Bemb,

Chalmers Motor Co., Detroit, Mich.

This letter was objected to by plaintiff's counsel as irrelevant, immaterial, and a self-serving statement made after the injury of the plaintiff. It was received over the objection and an exception.

The case was submitted to the jury, and in the course of its charge the court instructed the jury as follows:

"It is not necessary for me to say anything further to you about the claims of negligence, because of the theory of the defendant, and because it is conceded by the defendant through his attorneys, that if he (the defendant) ran his car diagonally across the road from the left side to the right, and struck the Reo car, so as to cause it to be deflected from its course and to run over the bank, that he was negligent, and is liable in this action for any damage that the plaintiff sustained. I charge you, as a matter of law, that, if you find by a fair preponderance of the evidence that the defendant, Walter S. Farrant, handled, managed, and controlled his Chalmers car in the afternoon of July 30, 1910, and drove it diagonally across the highway north of the railroad track, and struck the front hub of the Reo car, so as to cause it to turn to the right and run over the bank, and that the plaintiff suffered injury and damages by reason thereof, then the defendant, Farrant, was negligent, and is liable to the plaintiff in this action."

"So you will understand, gentlemen of the jury, that, as to the first question you have to determine,—that is, the alleged negligence of the defendant,—the question is: Did the defendant, Walter S. Farrant, run his car diagonally across the highway into the car in which the plaintiff was riding, and, by reason of striking it on the left hub, drive it off the road and over the bank? Plaintiff cannot recover unless she convinces you by a fair preponderance of the evidence that the defendant, Farrant, did so negligently drive his car. If you do not find by a fair preponderance of the evidence that the defendant, Farrant, did so run his car as to strike the Reo car and drive it over the bank, then you need not further consider the case; for in such event your verdict must be no cause of action."

This language was, in substance, reiterated a number of times in the charge. The court, however, called the jury's attention to the statutory duties of a person operating a motor vehicle upon a public highway as to rate of speed and proper management.

There was an averment in the declaration that the conduct of the defendant had been wanton, reckless, and wilful, and the court instructed the jury on that subject as follows:

"These statutory duties and any violation thereof, if you find there were any, you may consider in determining this question of added damages. I have mentioned these things to you for the application that they had in this case on the question of added damages. They have no application to the first question,—the question of defendant's negligence,—that is, as to his liability for his negligent act. A violation these provisions of the statute is evidence of negligence, but, under the circumstances of this case, as I have before explained to you, you may consider such violation only in determining that the defendant acted wantonly, wilfully, and recklessly. . . .

"And, gentlemen of the jury, I charge you, as a matter of law, that the defendant, Walter S. Farrant, is not here on trial because he did not slow down his automobile, and is not on trial for the purpose of determining whether he did or did not run his car at a reasonable and moderate rate of speed; neither is he on trial for the purpose of determining whether or not he expressed a desire to the occupants of the Reo car to pass, either by tooting his whistle or calling to them and asking the driver, Skinner, to let him pass; that, so far as the defendant is concerned, in the first instance,—that is, the alleged negligence of the defendant,—your inquiry is limited to the one single question as to whether or not he did so run and operate his car, after crossing the railroad track, as to run it into the Reo car with such force as to drive the Reo car from the highway. I told you that these various alleged violations of the statute were to be considered by you as bearing on the question of added damages. On the question of defendant's negligence in passing the car, I have explained to you that these various statutory duties do not under the circumstances in this case apply."

The jury, after being out for a time, returned into court and asked for further instructions. The following occurred:

The Court: "Gentlemen of the jury, are you having some difficulty in regard to the law in this case?"

Foreman: "We are. If Farrant's car hit this Skinner car, but not hard enough to knock it out of its course, what were your instructions?"

After ascertaining that this was the definite question, the court proceeded as follows:

"Mr. Farrant would not be liable unless his act was the proximate cause of the injury; that is, the cause that produced the injury. I said to you that the plaintiff must convince your minds by a fair preponderance of the evidence, first, that the defendant was negligent, and that his negligence was the proximate cause of the injury. Now, if his car hit the other car, but did not send it over the bank,—if his car hit the other car, but the hitting of the car did not produce the injury,—then, though he were negligent, his negligent act would not be the proximate cause of the injury, and he would not be liable. Do I make that plain to you?"

A juror: "It is to me."

Thereupon the jury again retired, and, after being absent for a time, returned into court and rendered a verdict of no cause of action, and judgment was entered accordingly for the defendant.

The plaintiff has brought the case here upon writ of error, and, while there are many assignments of error, we shall not find it necessary to consider them all in detail.

(1) By appropriate assignments of error, it is claimed that the court erred in permitting the introduction in evidence of the tickets or cards and letter which have been referred to.

The question as to the condition of these cars after the alleged collision was material. Did the court err in receiving in evidence the cards and letter above mentioned? If this evidence had any materiality whatever, it was its tendency to show the condition of the Chalmers car after the injury complained of. The effort is made by these cards to show by elimination that no repairs were made upon this car, except such as are mentioned in the respective cards, which show nothing by way of repairs to the fenders or the hub caps. It has already been noted that these cards were prepared at defendant's garage after the alleged injury, and some of them after the commencement of this suit. We think that such cards and letter were incompetent, as well as immaterial, and were self-serving statements made after the fact.

That certain work was done on this car was no evidence that there were not other defects which required repairs, even if the evidence was competent. As was said by this court in Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. v. Huntley, 38 Mich. 537, at page 544, 31 Am. Rep. 321: "The general rule in regard to other classes of hearsay evidence and statements admitted upon the same principle is that they must have been made ante litem motam, which is interpreted to mean not merely before suit brought, but before the controversy exists upon the facts."

In Vanneter v. Crossman, 42 Mich. 465, at page 468, 4 N. W. 216, this court said: "The declarations of a party may be given against his own interest, and, when a part of an entire statement or conversation is so given, he may adduce whatever has been omitted which bears in any way upon the rest. But he cannot, by collateral statements outside, make evidence for himself,"—citing authorities.

See also Kehrig v. Peters, 41 Mich. 475, at page 478, 2 N. W. 801, where this court said: "There was no error in excluding exculpatory remarks made by Kehrig to third persons, in no way constituting parts of transactions which would give them the character of res gestæ. He could not make testimony for himself by telling third persons he was innocent." Dundas v. Lansing, 75 Mich. 499, 5 L.R.A. 143, 13 Am. St. Rep. 457, 42 N. W. 1011; Jones v. Portland, 88 Mich. 598, 605, 16 L.R.A. 437, 50 N. W. 731; Baumgardner v. Henry, 131 Mich. 240, 91 N. W. 169; Lord v. Detroit Sav. Bank, 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In the case last cited we undertook to state the rule in this state, and referred to many authorities upon the subject. We there said: "This court has repeatedly held that a self-serving statement is not admissible on behalf of the party making it, and that the corroborating of the party in a material part of the case by his own statement is not permissible,"—citing authorities.

In Burley v. German American Bank, 111 U. S. 216, 28 L. ed. 406, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 341, it was held that entries in the books of one party to a transaction, not contemporaneous or made in due course of the business as a part of the res gestæ, but made after the rights of the other party had become fixed, are not competent evidence.

We are constrained to hold that the trial court erred to the prejudice of the plaintiff in admitting in evidence the cards and letter above referred to.

(2) This brings us to the assignments of error relating to the charge of the court in connection with that part of the declaration above referred to.

It is true that the evidence on the part of the plaintiff sought to show that the defendant's car collided with the car in which the plaintiff was riding. But the evidence of the plaintiff was not confined to the claim that, by reason of the collision, the car in which the plaintiff was riding was forced or pushed over the embankment. We think it was material for the plaintiff to show that the defendant was operating his car at an unreasonable and unlawful rate of speed, and that, without notice or warning, he came upon and passed the Skinner car, and forced his car across and in front of the Skinner car in such a manner as to disconcert the driver, and cause his car to go over the embankment, to the injury of the plaintiff; and that defendant might be liable, even if the jury should have found that the impact was not sufficient to forcibly throw the Skinner car out of its course.

If, for instance, it should appear in a given case that A struck at or hit B in such a manner as to cause B impulsively or instinctively, without time to consider, to step back into a deep hole to his injury, he being taken unawares, could it be said that A was not responsible for the injury? So here, had the jury found that, by reason of the defendant bringing his car in contact with the Reo car, Skinner was taken unawares, and, seeking to avoid injury to the defendant's car, he was compelled to go so near the embankment as to lose his balance and go over, can it be said that there was no liability on the part of the defendant? We think not. We think that the court, in its instructions, narrowed the issue to the prejudice of the plaintiff's case, and it is apparent from the colloquy between the court and jury at the time they returned for further instructions, that they were having difficulty upon the identical point we are here considering. We think it was competent for the jury, under the evidence and the law, to consider the course and conduct pursued by the defendant, as bearing upon his negligence, and that there might have been a recovery if the jury found that the defendant negligently hit the Skinner car, but not with force sufficient to push it over the embankment. If the jury became satisfied that the coming in contact with the Skinner car, by improperly swerving to the right on the part of the defendant, was the proximate cause of the injury, then, we think, the plaintiff might recover in this case, even if the car in which she was riding was not pushed over the embankment by the defendant.

The evident object of the statute regulating the driving of automobiles in public highways was to prevent danger of collision and like accidents which are likely to occur where the statute regulations are not observed. Potter v. Moran, 61 Mich. 60, 27 N. W. 854.

In National Casket Co. v. Powar, 137 Ky. 156, 125 S. W. 279, it was held that the statute of Kentucky, similar to ours, limiting and regulating the speed of automobiles approaching the intersection of highways, and requiring warnings of approaching travelers, is declaratory of the common law of negligence, and adds to it certain standards of care on the part of operators of automobiles, and that a violation thereof is negligence per se, and forms a sufficient basis for an action for injuries caused thereby to another using the highways. Probably the better rule is that such violation would be evidence of negligence. The only matter left to the jury by the trial court was the force of the blow or collision. In this we think there was error.

The trial court seemed to be of the opinion that the immediate cause of the injury was the car running over the bank, and that this was the proximate cause of the injury. We think the proximate cause of the injury may have been, as above indicated, that which preceded the going over the embankment, and that the defendant cannot evade liability if it is made to appear that the injury was the natural result 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) of his negligent conduct in thus causing the collision.

Whether the plaintiff's driver, Skinner, was guilty of contributory negligence in not stopping or controlling his car, was, we think, a fair question for the jury, under proper instructions; and if the jury should find the driver was guilty of contributory negligence, such negligence might, under our decisions, be imputed to the plaintiff. Colborne v. Detroit United R. Co. — Mich. —, 143 N. W. 32; Mullen v. Owosso, 100 Mich. 103, 23 L.R.A. 693, 43 Am. St. Rep. 436, 58 N. W. 663.

In our opinion the court erred in thus narrowing the issue, and the same was prejudicial error.

The other questions urged by appellant are not likely to arise upon a new trial, in view of what we have already said.

For the errors pointed out, the judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and a new trial granted.

LILLIE BELLE BOWEN, Appt.,

v.

GEORGE M. BOWEN.

Divorce — cruelty — failure to entertain wife.

A divorce will not be granted for nonsupport or extreme cruelty, because an out-door laborer earning $35 a month consumes a portion of it for liquor and cigars, paying only the grocery, meat, and coal bills, and when he reaches home after his work prefers to read or go to bed rather than to talk to his wife, or take her out to entertainments or to visit friends.

Note. — Failure to entertain wife or unsociability as ground for divorce.

No general rule can be laid down that will control the question under annotation, which really resolves itself into whether such failure on the part of the husband amounts to cruelty or indignity as cause for divorce.

In determining what constitutes cruelty, regard must be had to the provisions of the statute and the circumstances of each particular case, keeping always in view the physical and mental conditions of the party and their character and social status. 14 Cyc. 590.

In refusing to state a positive definition of legal cruelty, the court in Evans v. Evans, 1 Hagg. Consist. Rep. 35, said that mere austerity of temper, petulance of manner, rudeness of language, a want of civil atten-

APPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Circuit Court for Kalamazoo County dismissing her bill for a divorce. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. D. O. French for appellant.

Moore, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complainant and defendant were married at the city of Kalamazoo, on the 19th day of January, 1901. The complainant was thirty-seven years of age, and had been previously married. Several years before her marriage to defendant she obtained a divorce from her first husband. The defendant was of the age of forty-seven years, and had not been previously married. No children were born to the couple. The parties lived together until the latter part of April, 1912, when the complainant left the defendant, and applied for a divorce on two grounds, vis., nonsupport and extreme cruelty, and asked for relief as to the title to certain real estate. The defendant filed his answer, denying the charges of complainant and insisting that she had clandestinely associated with other men. He did not ask for any affirmative relief. The case was tried in open court, and a decree entered dismissing the bill, and complainant has appealed.

The trial judge filed a written opinion, from which we quote:

"The complainant in her bill of complaint alleges, as a ground for divorce from her

tion and accommodation, even occasional sallies of passion, if they do not threaten bodily harm, do not amount to legal cruelty. And further said that it must not be an apprehension arising merely from an exquisite and diseased sensibility of the mind. Petty vexations applied to such a constitution of mind may certainly in time wear out the animal machine, but still they are not cases for legal relief; people must relieve themselves as well as they can by prudent assistance by calling in the succor of religion and the consolation of friends; but the aid of the courts is not to be resorted to in such case with any effect.

In Rice v. Rice, 6 Ind. 100, the trial court refused the following instruction: "The conduct necessary to constitute cruel treatment must be not only habitual and continuous, but it must be aggressive in its character. Mere indifference or inattention of a husband, not accompanied with an omission to provide the necessities of life, although habitual, cannot of themselves constitute cruel treatment." The appellate court, in commenting on the refusal, said: "We may remark of this instruction that it seems to contemplate an entirely physical, sensual view of the marriage relation; and if that relation has no aim to the social happiness and mental enjoyments of those united in it, the instruction should have been given. But if it is otherwise, if it be true that we are possessed of social, moral, and intellectual natures, with wants to be supplied, with susceptibilities of pain and pleasure; if they can be wounded and healed, as well as the physical part, with accompanying suffering and delight, then we think that conduct which produces perpetual social sorrow, although physical food be not withheld, may well be classed as cruel, and entitle the sufferer to relief. And, in point of fact, we have no doubt that mere cold neglect, such as is assumed in the instruction, has sent broken-hearted to the grave hundreds of wives, where the dagger, poison, and purposed starvation have sent one. Men generally supply a sufficiency of food to their brute animals."

Refusal to speak to the wife or go out with her, coupled with other acts of cruelty, was held sufficient in Downey v. Downey, 135 Mich. 265, 97 N. W. 699.

So, also, in Sharp v. Sharp, 116 Ill. 509, 6 N. E. 15, where it was held that acts of physical violence in connection with harsh and unkind treatment constituted "extreme" and "repeated" cruelty, justifying divorce, the court, in referring to the fact of the husband's continued refusal to speak to her after her written appeal to him to break his silence, said that "it was a great wrong to the wife for the husband longer to remain silent, in comparison with which the bruises made upon her person by his hand and foot are as nothing. Although these parties resided in the same house for two years after this letter was written, it does not appear from this record he ever addressed a single word to her either in anger or in kindness. This treatment ill accords with the duty a husband owes to his wife, and surely is not that conjugal kindness implied in every act of condonation. It is difficult to imagine anything more disagreeable and exasperating than the presence of one who, from mere sullenness, will not utter a word. The veriest solitude, where no living creature is visible, would be preferable. There is no more important right of the wife than that which secures to her in the marriage relation the companionship of her husband and the protection of his home. This right of companionship, so essential to all happiness, was withheld from the wife for a most unreasonable time by her husband, after she had invited and solicited it, both verbally and by writing. It is not necessary to inquire whether defendant's conduct in this respect amounted to wilful desertion for a period of more than two years, under the provisions of the statute. It is enough that his ill-treatment of his wife in the manner the proof shows constitutes a breach of that kindly usage which she had a right to expect from her husband, and she is not therefore barred from obtaining a divorce on the ground of extreme and repeated cruelty arising from acts done before, and although some years have since elapsed."

husband, failure to support and extreme cruelty, and asks to have the interests of both parties determined by the court in a certain house and lot on Seminary street, to which they hold the title as tenants by the entireties, as husband and wife. The defendant is a target man on Harrison street at the Michigan Central crossing, and has worked for the company for a great many years, and was crippled many years since while in the company's employment, so that his left hand has become comparatively useless, so far as ordinary manual labor is concerned. That the defendant receives an income of $35 a month, and works from early in the morning until late in the evening. He was engaged in the same employment when the marriage took place between complainant and defendant, so that the complainant knew of his circumstances and income and ability to provide. The complainant charges extreme cruelty; namely, for the reason that he has not taken her out in society or to entertainments, or visited with her at any place except at their own home. Such a charge as this might well be regarded as cruelty under some circumstances; but under the testimony produced in this case it would seem that the defendant did not have any time to do differently. That every day in the week, including Sundays, he was busily employed. It would also seem that he could not provide a very luxurious support on a salary of $35 a month. Both parties claim that they furnished a portion of the funds

And in Reinhard v. Reinhard, 96 Wis. 555, 65 Am. St. Rep. 66, 71 N. W. 803, it was held that as marriage implies companionship and is supposed to be based upon mutual regard and affection, a divorce for cruel and inhuman treatment is warranted where the husband and wife live and sleep in the same house, eat at the same table food prepared by the wife without the husband speaking to the wife, except in anger, for a period of three months at a time.

So, also, in Zweig v. Zweig, 46 Ind. App. 594, 93 N. E. 234, in affirming a judgment of divorce granted for cruel and inhuman treatment, where the allegations were that the husband for over two years refused to speak to, or hold any conversation with, his wife, or to permit her to in any manner converse with him, and when she attempted to do so, would say that he wanted to have nothing to do with her, and that he refused to visit the neighbors with her, and would not permit the neighbors to visit her, the court said that whatever threatens to or does impair either or both the mind or body endangers health or life, and constitutes "cruel and inhuman treatment" as ground for divorce.

And in Paterson v. Paterson, 3 H. L. Cas. 308, it was held that a cause for divorce a mensa et thoro for cruelty and maltreatment was set forth where the allegations of the complaint were that the husband, "instead of behaving himself toward the pursuer with tenderness and humanity, conducted himself towards her in a cruel manner, so that her life had been rendered a burden to her, and might have been endangered if she had continued to live with him; that his whole conduct had been influenced by a desire to expel her from his house, . . . and since about six weeks after the date of the celebration of the marriage he ceased to hold any intercourse with her, did not speak to her, and never entered her apartment, but treated her in the most contemptuous and insolent manner, and did so openly in the presence of servants and others."

indignities to the person of the wife as rendered her condition intolerable and her life burdensome, and thereby forcing her to withdraw from his house and family, the court in defining indignities said: "The result of the authorities we understand to be as follows: Indignities to the person are a kind of legal cruelty, less extreme than cruel and barbarous treatment. A single offer of indignity will not support a proceeding for divorce; a decree can only be justified when indignities have been practised often enough to be fairly described as a course of conduct. The body need not be physically touched; they may be offered to the person just as truly by a course of insult, of wilful neglect, of contemptuous and humiliating treatment, or by any other method in which hatred or revenge or a settled malice may find expression. The 'person' meant by the statute is the indivisible personality joined by the union of body and spirit, and indignities offered to either are necessarily offered to both. But some indignities must be borne; indeed, all must be borne, until they render the condition of the sufferer intolerable and her life burdensome, and thereby force her to withdraw from her husband's house and family. Obviously, however, mere withdrawal (which is easy to accomplish) is not satisfactory evidence that she has endured up to the requirement of the law; she must show further that her bodily or mental health was either impaired or endangered by the treatment by which she was subjected. This is a practical and somewhat arbitrary test; but it rests upon experience and observation, and is the safest within our reach, because it is the hardest to evade. The burden of proof is upon the libellant; she is bound to show that her condition has been rendered intolerable and her life burdensome, and it is not unreasonable to require her to prove as the most probable and most visible sign of that condition that her health is either broken or is likely to break." And it was held that all these requisites were present in the case at bar, where the evidence, as set forth in the opinion, was that "he declared afterwards that went into the purchase and rebuilding of the home on Seminary street.

"The first question in the case is as to whether or not the complainant has made out a case for a divorce. I do not believe that, under the law of this state, the defendant could be charged with a wanton and wilful failure to support, and with gross and extreme cruelty under the facts as alleged and proven in this case. Therefore the second question becomes unnecessary to decide. They still hold as tenants by the entirety, and the court cannot, in the absence of a decree of divorce, determine their respective interests therein."

The case in some respects is a peculiar one. The complainant is a hard-working, industrious woman, a good housekeeper, and ambitious to get along. She worked out by the day without the knowledge or desire of her husband. She was able to do this because he went to work early, taking his midday luncheon with him, and did not return from his work until late. Complainant admits that defendant paid the grocery bills, meat bills, and coal bills all the time they lived together, but denies he contributed anything further to her support. She also alleged that he wasted a good deal of money for Duffy's malt whisky and tobacco and cigars; that he bought the whisky by the quart and consumed more than was good for him. She admits that he brought the whisky home and did his drinking there. Defendant insists that he contributed his full share toward the sup-

that he knew before the wedding that he was making a mistake, and that he would not marry his wife if he had to do it again. To other witnesses he said that he had made a mistake when he married her, that he could not respect her, and that it was impossible to treat her as a wife; and finally, after separation had taken place, he declared that he could not live with her, and that if she had not left him he would have left her. He gave no reason for this aversion, and none appears now upon the testimony. Cherishing this feeling, it is not surprising to learn that even during the brief honeymoon (which was spent at a hotel in Philadelphia) he was with his bride as little as possible, remaining away nearly all day and returning late at night, often under the influence of liquor. When he was with her he was usually sullen, and rarely spoke except to say that if it was not so expensive he would have a room to himself. During the railroad journey from Philadelphia to their home, in Millersburg, he accompanied her over the house, explained the working of the furnace and stoves, telling her that she was to attend to them in the future, and showed her two bedrooms, pointing out one as hers and one as his own. This life thus inauspiciously begun was continued on these lines for about four months. During all this time he was away from home as much as possible, habitually returning late at night. When he was at home, he was usually in a room by himself, drinking and smoking; if his wife entered the room he would leave it, and he rarely spoke to her or answered her questions. Except when visitors were in the house, he compelled her to sleep in a separate room. She often implored him to explain how she had displeased him, promising to do what he would suggest, but his only response was to leave her without a word. At their meals together he helped himself to food, but did not help her; and he carried this so far as to neglect to serve her even when visitors were at the table. On one occasion during this period she was sick for about a week, and although she was confined to her room all that time he paid no attention to her condition, came to the room but once during the week, and then only upon the urgent request of the servant, and even when there did not go in, but simply looked through the doorway and turned back without saying a word. On another occasion when she was not well she brought a bucket of coal from the cellar and asked him to put it on the fire, but he refused, saying: "What did I get you for?" As an occasional visitor at the house testified, speaking of another instance of harshness in the presence of others, "He treated her more as a servant than as his wife."

Right to divorce for acts of cruelty which have been condoned is not revived by the fact that the husband, who was a fisherman and preparing to start the next morning for Alaskan waters on a fishing expedition, refused at 9 o'clock in the evening to accompany his wife to the theater after she had visited a moving-picture show, and left her downtown. Johnsen v. Johnsen, — Wash. —, 139 Pac. 189.

But in Robbins v. Robbins, 100 Mass. 150, 97 Am. Dec. 91, right to maintain an action for divorce for acts of extreme cruelty which were condoned, and which were sufficient to sustain a decree, was held to have been revived by proof that for a period of six weeks beginning only a fortnight after the last act of extreme cruelty proved, the husband, while living in the same house with his wife, wholly and continuously refused to speak to her, the court stating that such evidence of persistent and enduring unkindness and ill temper warranted the wife or court in inferring that his smothered anger would break out again into acts of cruelty.

In Walmesley v. Walmesley, 69 L. T. N. S. 152, 1 Reports, 529, action for divorce because of cruelty and adultery, it was held that such cruelty as, coupled with adultery, entitled the wife to a divorce, was shown where the uncontradicted evidence of the wife was that within a few days after the marriage the husband refused to occupy the same bed with his wife, never went anywhere with her, and refused to speak to her unless an answer from him was absoport of the family, and that he drank whisky in moderation at his home, because he thought it was good for him, as his work exposed him to all sorts of weather from early in the morning until late at night. A striking peculiarity of the case is that defendant never took with him to his work any intoxicating liquors, and it is not claimed he consumed any except at home, nor is it shown that he drank in such quantities that it interfered with his work. It is not shown that the parties ever quarreled with each other, unless one occasion may be regarded as an exception, and as to that occasion the facts are in dispute. On the day when complainant left defendant she prepared his breakfast for him, and made no suggestion to him that he would not find her at home when he returned from his work. The record discloses beyond any question that defendant was a hard-working person, who had a hand badly lacerated many years ago while coupling cars, and for nineteen years had been gate tender at railroad crossings, keeping very long hours, working daily, though the hours were not so long on Sunday.

A careful reading of the record satisfies us that complainant was disgusted with defendant, because, after he came from his work, he preferred, after doing work in and about the yard, to read or go to bed, instead of going with her for walks or calls or to places of amusement. The humdrum of their lives pallied upon her.

We quote some of the averments of the bill of complaint:

"(e) She further shows that he is no companion for her or anyone else; that he never talks or has anything to say, and she cannot longer endure it to be tied down with a load on her neck; that he is morose and sullen, and sometimes even jealous, and generally very disagreeable.

"(f) Your oratrix shows that she did many times talk with him about his unkind treatment of her, and about her monotonous life, and has for years tried to arouse him from his dumb and sleepy condition, but she has been unable to arouse him, and she can no longer endure it.

"(g) She shows that for years she has lived a wretched life, and her home has been a most unhappy one, and she can no longer endure it, nor can she longer tolerate the said defendant."

We have no doubt the life of complainant has, from her point of view, become a very uncomfortable one, but she has failed to show such conduct on the part of defendant as would justify the court in granting a divorce.

The decree is affirmed.

lutely necessary; that he took no notice of their child when it was born, and refused to allow it to be called by his own Christian name; that he declined to take things from his wife when she handed them to him, and in one house where they were staying, rather than eat his meals with his wife, he took them in the kitchen.

But in Cousen v. Cousen, 11 Jur. N. S. 656, 4 Swabe y & T. 164, 34 L. J. Prob. N. S. 139, 12 L. T. N. S. 712, action for divorce on a ground of "cruelty and adultery," it was held that the husband's indifference and neglect, his aversion to his wife's society, and the cessation of matrimonial intercourse, where there was no allegation of personal violence or word of menace, did not amount to legal cruelty, although the husband was carrying on an adulterous intercourse with a servant in the house in which he was living with his wife, and so a decree was denied, as, under the statute, the adultery alone was insufficient.

That want of civil attentions is not sufficient ground for divorce for extreme and repeated cruelty was held in Trenchard v. Trenchard, 245 Ill. 313, 92 N. E. 243.

And in Wood v. Wood, 80 Ala. 254, it was held that allegations of a bill which make a case of an absence of the common attention; a nonobservance of the most ordinary courtesies; heartless neglect; an unfeeling indifference to the comfort and relief of the wife in sickness; a disregard of the obligation of marital vows; holding the wife in the capacity of a menial servant when able to relieve her from such service instead of an equal and companion in life; viewing the marriage relation as merely physical and sexual,—while making a case of treatment and conduct disgraceful to the husband and deplorable to the wife, productive of domestic unhappiness, do not involve the kind and degree of cruelty necessary to constitute a cause of divorce "in favor of the wife, where the husband has committed actual violence on her person, attended with danger to life or health, or when from his conduct there is reasonable apprehension of such violence," there being no allegation of actual violence or threat or conduct from which there is reasonable apprehension of such violence.

Also in Wile v. Wile, 48 Pa. Super. Ct. 494, it was held that there being no evidence of physical violence, a wife who is separated from her husband will not be granted divorce on ground of indignities to the person, because, as the wife testified, "he was brusque, curt, moody, had a queer disposition; his manner was not gracious; he was bored as if it was an effort for him to talk. He never bought any presents; he had not any affection whatever. I might as well have been married to a block of stone. He would turn his cheek to be kissed; I tried to be very affectionate; very demonstrative and very agreeable, when he would reply, 'Oh don't worry me.'"

ROBERT LASSMAN, Resp't.,
v.
TOLLEF JACOBSON et al., Appts.
(125 Minn. 218, 146 N. W. 350.)

Usury — registry fee.

A loan for which the borrower paid the maximum interest, and in addition paid the mortgage registry tax upon the mortgage given to secure the same, held not usurious.

(Brown, Ch. J., and Hallam, J., dissent.)

(March 20, 1914.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Cass County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the amount of an alleged usurious loan which the borrower was compelled to pay to an innocent holder. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Constant Larson and Gunder-son & Leach, for appellants:

Services necessarily rendered and expenses reasonably incurred in making the loan, provided they are necessary and the amount thereof reasonable and rendered in good faith, may be charged to the borrower, and such charge does not render the loan usurious even though the highest legal rate Cases like Union Mortg. Bkg. & T. Co. v. Hagood, 97 Fed. 360; Kidder v. Vander-sloot, 114 Ill. 133; Home Ins. Co. v. Dun-ham, 33 Hun. 415; and Sloane v. Lucas, 37 Wash. 348, 79 Pac. 949, where the agreement related to the payment of taxes upon the entire estate in the real property as such, are not within the scope of the note.

It is not usurious to contract for or to require payment by the mortgagor of a simple recording "fee" in addition to interest at the maximum lawful rate. Gault v. Thurmond, 39 Okla. 673, 136 Pac. 742; American Mortg. Co. v. Woodward, 83 S. C. 521, 65 S. E. 739.

As stated in the opinion in LASSMAN v. JACOBSON, the holding of that case that the payment by the mortgagor of a recording "tax" in addition to the maximum rate of interest is not usurious, is sustained by the decision of the special term of the supreme court in Moore v. Lindsay, 61 Misc. 176, 114 N. Y. Supp. 684. The omission of the statute involved in that case to specify who was to pay the tax was especially significant not only for the reasons mentioned in the quotation in the opinion in the LASS-MAN CASE, but also because the statute 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) of interest is exacted on the loan, exclusive of such charges and expenses.

Daley v. Minnesota Loan & Invest. Co. 43 Minn. 517, 45 N. W. 1100; Cox v. Massa-chusetts Mut. L. Ins. Co. 113 Ill. 385; Goodwin v. Bishop, 145 Ill. 421, 34 N. E. 47; American Mortg. Co. v. Woodward, 83 S. C. 521, 65 S. E. 739, 39 Cyc. 981.

Mr. Fred W. Smith, for respondent:

The burden of paying the tax imposed under the 1907 act is by its terms specifically impressed upon the mortgagee; and when by specific agreement in advance and as part of the contract of loan he insists that it shall be sustained and paid by the mort-gagor, in addition to the highest rate al-lowed by law, a condition of usury is plain-ly made out.

Holt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit is by a borrower against the lenders to recover the amount of an alleged usurious loan, which the borrower was com-pelled to pay to an innocent holder of the debt and security. To pass on the question presented this will be a sufficient statement of the facts: In December, 1909, plaintiff borrowed from defendants $350, to be repaid within five years, with 10 per cent interest, was an amendment of earlier statutes im-posing an "annual tax" on debts secured by mortgage on real property, which expressly provided that any agreement by which the mortgagor became bound to pay the tax or any part thereof should be usurious and void. There was an alternative ground for the decision in the Moore Case, namely, that the recording tax was not paid or de-ducted from the principal sum constituting the loan, in pursuance of any mutual agree-ment between the parties, but, without the knowledge of the mortgagee, was deducted by a title company from the proceeds of a check representing the full amount of the loan delivered to the borrower, and indorsed by him to the title company. Both the LASSMAN CASE and the Moore Case rejected the contention based on that provision of the act imposing the tax, by which the pay-ment of the tax relieves the lender of the obligation to pay the personal property tax to which the debt secured by the mortgage might otherwise be subject.

But where the maximum lawful rate of interest is charged, an agreement by the mortgagor to pay a "personal-property" tax assessed against the mortgagee on account of the debt has been held usurious. Green v. Grant, 134 Mich. 462, 96 N. W. 583 (obiter), followed as authority in Stack v.

payable semiannually. To secure the loan plaintiff gave mortgages on land in Beltrami county, and agreed to pay, and did pay, the mortgage registry tax of $2.50 and the recording fee of like amount. After the loan was made, defendants assigned the main part thereof to an innocent good-faith purchaser. Thereafter plaintiff paid the debt. No point is made that part of the debt was not assigned, but was paid to defendants direct. The court below held the transaction usurious, and gave plaintiff judgment for the full amount paid, being the entire loan. Defendants appeal from the judgment.

There was no finding that in the agreement there was any corrupt intent to violate or evade the usury law; and that, perhaps, is unimportant, since there was no misunderstanding or mistake concerning the amount to be paid. The parties must be held to know that the stipulated interest was the maximum allowed by law, and hence, if the recording fee or the mortgage registry tax agreed to be paid by plaintiff is to be considered as something received by the defendants for the loan of the money, the contract was as a matter of law tainted with usury.

The test of a usurious contract is: Will its performance result in producing to the lender a greater return for the use of the amount loaned than is allowed by law, and was that result intended? Smith v. Parsons, 55 Minn. 520, 57 N. W. 311. Expenses incident to making the loan and

The same rule was applied in Meem v. Dulaney, 88 Va. 674, 14 S. E. 363, where the mortgagee, upon the earnest solicitation of the borrower, withdrew his money from an investment in nontaxable United States bonds, and put it into the personal bonds of the borrower, bearing interest at the same rate, upon an undertaking in a separate agreement by the latter to save him harmless from all taxes and assessments thereon. (Compare quotation from Moore v. Lindsay in LASSMAN v. JACOBSON.)

In Green v. Grant, supra, the court said: "When defendant pays a tax, as in this case, on account of complainants' ownership of the mortgage indebtedness, he is not making a payment to preserve the security, but he is paying money for the complainants' benefit. . . . The payment of the tax relieves the lender from an obligation which clearly rests upon him."

In Norris v. W. C. Belcher Land Mortg. Co. 98 Tex. 176, 82 S. W. 500 (on rehearing in 98 Tex. 183, 83 S. W. 799), the court said that a contract which binds the mortgagor to pay the taxes which the law imposes on the lender would necessarily be usurious if it would, with the interest reserved, necessarily make the charge for the use of the money exceed the maximum rate.

But it has been held that even where the agreement was to pay taxes in addition to the maximum legal rate, the question of the intent to take usury may be considered. In Mortimer v. Pritchard, Bail. Eq. 505, no taxes were ever assessed and no usury actually taken, but it was contended that the contract was void because it provided that the mortgagor should pay the tax in addition to lawful interest. The court was of the opinion that the contention was correct, but as the matter was not free from doubt and the parties had taken the advice of counsel before action, its decision was that there had been no intent to take usury and the contract would not be void by reason of the mistake of law. The ground of 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

this decision is somewhat doubtful in view of the language of the cases cited above.

And Union Trust Co. v. Radford, 176 Mich. 50, 141 N. W. 1091, seems to be an authority contrary. In that case the mortgage was on a "committee form" containing the clause in question. It was contended that there was no intent to take usury, because, although the tax rate was known to exceed the difference between the interest charged and the maximum rate allowed by law, the mortgagees believed and still contended that these particular bonds were nontaxable. The court held otherwise, and also found the contract usurious; since "the parties must be deemed to have intended the result expressed by the contract," where it is unambiguous and "its legal meaning clear."

But in Dubose v. Parker, 13 Ala. 779, where a general tax upon loans was involved, the court arguing that there was no reason why the return upon loans should be less than that upon other debts, held that the legislature did not intend the tax to be taken out of the lender's profit, and that a contract by the borrower to pay the tax was permitted by the revenue measure. As in Moore v. Lindsay, and upon much the same grounds (see quotation in LASSMAN v. JACOBSON), the court went further and said that even apart from the implied permission conferred by the revenue act, the exaction of the tax in addition to the maximum lawful interest would not be usurious, since the usury law aims to permit "as profit 8 per cent per annum," and by the contract in question, "he receives no more." This language has been effectively criticized in Green v. Grant, supra.

In Banks v. McClellan, 24 Md. 62, 87 Am. Dec. 594, the single statement was made: "We consider that the charges for taxes on the mortgage, with simple interest on each item from the time it was paid, are allowable, Mr. McClellan having agreed to pay them, and the law authorizing such payments without incurring usury." But no light is given as to what authority of law the court found.

In First Nat. Bank v. Glenn, 10 Idaho, 224, 109 Am. St. Rep. 204, 77 Pac. 623, furnishing the lender satisfactory security for its repayment can in no sense be considered compensation for the use of the money loaned. Therefore it is generally held that any sum paid by the borrower towards the reasonable and legitimate disbursements made by the lender in investigating the physical and legal value of the security offered, and also in placing it in lawful form to protect the lender, is not to be considered in determining whether the contract is tainted with usury. Daley v. Minnesota Loan & Invest. Co. 43 Minn. 517, 45 N. W. 1100; Smith v. Wolf, 55 Iowa, 555, 8 N. W. 429; Goodwin v. Bishop, 145 Ill. 421, 34 N. E. 47; Webb, Usury, § 323, and cases therein cited. In Stein v. Swensen, 46 Minn. 360, 24 Am. St. Rep. 234, 49

N. W. 55, it is said: "But, as usury consists in taking or contracting for a greater rate than the law permits for forbearance of money, it must be apparent that, if the taking or contracting be for something else than forbearance—than for the use of the money,—it is not usury." This would exclude from consideration all necessary and reasonable disbursements incidental to placing the security agreed to be given in legal shape.

As we understand the record, neither the court below nor the counsel for plaintiff believed that any usury taint inhered in the borrower's agreement to pay $2.50 for recording the mortgages. This is virtually conceded to be an expense, incident to furnishing the security, which the lender may where the mortgage called for the highest lawful rate of interest, and also for the payment by the mortgagor of all taxes on the mortgage and the debt secured thereby, the statute in force when it was given provided that any contract whereby the mortgagor agreed to pay taxes on the money loaned was as to such agreement null and void. The court took the position that as the particular stipulation in question was void, the contract did not call for more than lawful interest, and was not usurious. In this case no taxes were ever collected from the mortgagor, and there was no intent to contract for usury, since the mortgagee testified that he did not know the tax stipulation was in the mortgage until long after its execution.

In Detroit v. Board of Assessors (Detroit v. Rentz) 91 Mich. 78, 16 L.R.A. 59, 51 N. W. 787, where the tax was imposed not upon the debt secured by the mortgage, but upon the mortgagee's interest or estate in the realty, the court said that there was no obstacle, either in this act (citing Hammond v. Lovell, 136 Mass. 185) or in the usury law, to prevent a mortgagor from agreeing to pay all taxes assessed against all interests in the realty, since this "is in the nature of an agreement to preserve the estate which constitutes the security, and is no more unlawful than an agreement to keep the property insured with a similar purpose." In Green v. Grant, supra, the court distinguished between a tax upon the mortgagee's interest in the real property and a tax upon the debt as personal property.

Even when it is held or assumed, as in cases previously cited, that a reservation of the maximum rate of interest with an agreement on the part of the mortgagor to pay taxes on the debt as personal property is necessarily usurious, the question may arise as to whether an agreement to pay such taxes is usurious per se when the rate of interest agreed upon is less than the maximum rate, but the total of the interest and the taxes proves to be in excess of the maximum interest allowable.

of the opinion that under the circumstances, it could not be presumed the mortgagees knew that the aggregate of taxes when added to the interest would exceed the lawful rate, and it was held that the contract was not usurious. The court enforced the clause for payment of taxes although the effect was to allow a greater return to the lender than the maximum lawful interest. Hooker, Ch. J., while agreeing with the majority that the agreement was not usurious, was of the opinion that the mortgagee should only be allowed for taxes to an amount which, with the interest reserved, would not exceed the legal rate of interest.

So, in the similar case, Norris v. W. C. Belcher Land-Mortg. Co. 98 Tex. 176, 82 S. W. 500 (rehearing in 98 Tex. 183, 83 S. W. 799), where the difference between the interest reserved and the maximum lawful rate was 1 per cent, the court said that it could not be laid down as a broad proposition that the mortgage was usurious; but as it was common knowledge that the tax rate had uniformly been more than 1 per cent (compare Green v. Grant, supra), the finding of usury by the trial court was justified. But it was also held that, under the pleadings, evidence should have been received to show that, through a mistake, the writing did not express the real understanding of the parties, there being no intention that the provision as to payment of taxes should apply to existing personal-property taxes on the "bonds and coupons," but to "any tax or assessment that might be imposed by Texas legislation during the life of the mortgagor, whereby the mortgagee would be taxed on the landed security only to the value of his equity therein." The latter was not, however, as in Green v. Grant, and Detroit v. Board of Assessors (Detroit v. Rentz), supra, distinguished in kind from a tax on the debt as personal property; but the court was of the opinion that if such was the real contract there could have been no intent to take usury, since the mortgagee could not know that such a tax, if imposed, would exceed 1 per cent. C. F. L.

require the borrower to bear, without thereby being held to have increased the stipulated interest or profit for the use or forbearance of the money loaned. American Mortg. Co. v. Woodward, 83 S. C. 521, 65 S. E. 739, considers the fee for recording the mortgage not to bear on the question of usury.

It is difficult to see why the $2.50 paid as mortgage registry tax does not stand on the same basis. Defendants had the perfect right to receive legal security on land for the repayment of the loan. They could obtain no protecting, enforceable security on land unless a real estate mortgage thereof is duly recorded; and it cannot be recorded until the mortgage registry tax is first paid. But it is contended that by the payment of the mortgage registry tax the lender is relieved of the obligation to pay personal property tax on the money or credit represented by the loan. But we think this a mere incident flowing out of the payment by the borrower of a necessary expense connected with the giving of a real estate mortgage, and which expense has not by law been placed upon the lender. It is said the security belongs to the mortgagee, and he should pay the tax thereon. This is true; but he is under no obligation to accept it or make the loan until he receives a valid, enforceable mortgage, and it is not such until the tax is paid and it is recorded. A recorded security is not thereafter subject to tax.

We think the right of plaintiff to prevail in this action must depend entirely upon finding in the mortgage registry act some provision which imposes a duty or obligation upon the mortgagee to pay this tax, or which forbids the lender from saddling this necessary expense connected with real estate security upon the borrower, for as before stated there is no finding here of any corrupt intent to violate the usury statute. There is in chapter 328, Laws of 1907 (Gen. Stat. 1913, §§ 2301-2309), no command to pay the registry tax or record the mortgage, and, of course, no penalty against failure to do either. The mortgagee is under no legal obligation to pay the tax. He may, if he choose, omit to record the mortgage. The legislature was undoubtedly intent on securing revenue from this source, but evidently assumed that there was sufficient inducement to accomplish the desired result in the provision that the mortgage could not be recorded, legally enforced, or used as evidence, unless the tax was paid by someone. Gen. Stat. 1913, § 2307. We may assume that the legislature was aware of the practice of money lenders to place the expenses connected with a secured loan upon the borrower. If, therefore, there had been any intention to shield the mortgager from the burden of the registry tax, we should expect to find apt language indicative of such intent in the statute. But it is absolutely silent upon that point. So it is in regard to the payment of the tax on executory contracts for the sale and conveyance of land. This tax is neither a charge against a person, nor against the security. It is not a tax upon the debt, but it becomes such upon the real estate security when anyone desires to record it or use it for some legal purpose. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. v. Martin County, 104 Minn. 179, 116 N. W. 572. That we are unable to spell out any intention from the mortgage registry tax law to place the legal obligation upon either party to a mortgage, or to an executory contract for the sale of land, to pay this tax, is sufficiently indicated in Mason v. Fichner, 120 Minn. 185, 139 N. W. 485, and First State Bank v. Hayden, 121 Minn. 45, 140 N. W. 132. Someone must pay the tax, and unless that is done there is no usable, valid, or enforceable mortgage or contract. We therefore conclude that there was no intention to legislate as to who should bear the burden of the mortgage registry tax, a necessary expense connected with the giving of valid real estate security, but the parties are free to contract with reference thereto without thereby affecting the question of usury.

These cases relied on by the plaintiff depended upon statutes which unequivocally imposed the duty upon the lender to pay taxes which by the loan contract he required the borrower to pay in addition to the highest legal interest. Green v. Grant, 134 Mich. 462, 96 N. W. 583; Vandervelde v. Wilson, 176 Mich. 185, 142 N. W. 553; Norris v. W. C. Belcher Land Mortg. Co. 98 Tex. 176, 82 S. W. 500, 83 S. W. 799; and Meem v. Dulaney, 88 Va. 674, 14 S. E. 363. For that reason we do not regard them of great weight as precedents under the reading of our registry tax law. Dubose v. Parker, 13 Ala. 779, and Banks v. McClellan, 24 Md. 62, 87 Am. Dec. 594, are to the contrary, and more than support the position we have taken. The court in the former says: "The prymment of the tax upon the loan is not very dissimilar from the payment of expenses for conveyances, which are usually borne by the borrower."

A case very similar on the facts, and under a statute like our own in declaring real estate securities subject to tax, but omitting to specify who is to bear the burden, is Moore v. Lindsay, 61 Misc. 176, 114 N. Y. Supp. 684. With reference to the omission alluded to the court says: "These omissions are very significant, and may properly be considered in construing the enactment. It has been an almost immemorial practice for a mortgagor to bear all the expenses incurred in searching of the title to premises mortgaged by him, including the fee for recording the mortgage; and it has been held that, where a party loaning money to another is put to trouble and expense in procuring it, a charge for such trouble and expense will not be deemed an act of usury." And referring to the contention there made, as here, that the mortgagee, by exacting payment of the registry tax from the mortgagor, secures exemption from the payment of the tax he otherwise would have to pay on the money loaned or on the credit arising to him therefrom, the court proceeds: "If the defendant's contention be sound, a nonresident mortgagee might with impunity exact payment of the recording tax from a mortgagor, since in his case, it may be assumed that no advantage could come to him by virtue of the exemption provided for in the act; whereas a resident mortgagee under similar circumstances would ipso facto be subject to the penalties of an usurious agreement. We may also suppose the case of a resident having his money invested in nontaxable securities, which he has converted into cash for the purpose of making the mortgage loan. Would any advantage be derived by the mortgagee in such a case by reason of the exemption clause? There is not the slightest evidence that the plaintiff would necessarily obtain any advantage by reason of the exemption above referred to. A mere possible, incidental, or indirect advantage that he might derive will not taint the transaction."

Our usury statute is drastic. The present case illustrates this, where the entire expense for a real estate loan of $350 for five years is only $5. Nevertheless, if plaintiff's agreement to pay this trifling amount is a violation of the law, it forfeits the whole loan. Such results ought not to flow from a statute which is silent or doubtful as to whose is the obligation to pay the tax in question.

The judgment is reversed.

Brown, Ch. J., dissenting:

I am unable to concur in the views of the court in this case, and therefore dissent. Usury is the taking of greater compensation for the loan of money than that allowed by law, namely, interest at the rate of 10 per cent per annum. If a greater rate be intentionally taken, the law pronounces the transaction usurious, without further inquiry into the motives of the parties. The corrupt intent sometimes said to be necessary to a violation of the statute arises by implication of law from the fact that an excessive rate of interest is intentionally reserved by the contract. No evidence of a corrupt bargain, or of an intention to violate the statute, need be produced. The sole question is: Does the contract intentionally reserve to the lender excessive compensation for the loan? In the case at bar the borrower was required to pay for the loan the highest legal rate of interest, and in addition thereto the expense of recording the mortgage securing the loan and also the mortgage registry tax. In my opinion this rendered the transaction usurious, at least as respects the payment of the registry tax. It was clearly the intention of the legislature in the enactment of the mortgage tax statute, that the tax so imposed should be paid by the mortgagee, and by requiring as a condition of the loan the payment thereof by the mortgagor the mortgagee thereby exacted greater compensation for the loan than allowed by the law, and the contract was usurious and void. Green v. Grant, 134 Mich. 462, 96 N. W. 583; Vandervelde v. Wilson, 176 Mich. 185, 142 N. W. 553; Norris v. W. C. Belcher Land Mortg. Co. 98 Tex. 176, 82 S. W. 500, 83 S. W. 799; *Meem v. Contracting Co. 175 Fed. 176.

Cook, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In changing the grade of certain streets in the city of Vicksburg, appellant undertook to raise the church building of the King David Baptist Church, a colored organization, to the new grade, and employed a contractor to do the necessary work. The bill of complaint alleges that "on account of the insufficient number and size of the pillars put under the said building, and the poor material used therein, and the negligent and imperfect workmanship, the said church was not safe for the purposes for which it was intended; that, in addition to the above, the said pillars were set upon the surface of the ground, so that they were likely to be undermined and weakened by water flowing under said church, all of which should, and could, by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence, have been known to said defendants." It is further alleged that after the building had been turned over to its owners, and "when a funeral was being held from said church, the floor thereof gave way, and complainants, along with a number of others, were precipitated to the ground, some 12 or 15 feet below, with a mass of broken timbers, benches, hot stoves, and humanity, and were bruised and maimed," etc. The complainants were strangers to the contract between the city and the King David Baptist Church, and when the collapse of the building occurred they were attendants at the funeral obsequies of one deceased. The city demurred to the bill of complaint, which demurrer was overruled, and the city prosecuted this appeal.

Appellant does not challenge the jurisdiction of the court to try this cause. We will consider only one of the grounds of the demurrer, viz., "(2) that under the facts stated and alleged in said bill, complainants are not entitled to the relief sought for, or any relief." "The general rule is that, after the contractor has turned the work over, and it has been accepted by the proprietor, the contractor incurs no further liability to third parties by reason of the condition of the work; but the responsibility, if any, for maintaining or using it in its defective condition, is shifted to the proprietor." 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 969.

Before the city can be held liable to complainants, it must be shown that there was some element of deceit, or concealment of the dangerous instrumentality. It is not sufficient to allege negligent construction. It must also be alleged that there was a concealment of this dangerous condition when the building was turned over to its owners and accepted by them. We think the bill of complaint may reasonably be construed to mean that the negligent construction and poor material used in the building was obvious, and that the owner accepted the work without demur; and, if this be true, it follows that the owner knew of the defect when it accepted the building. It must be shown that the owner was unaware of the danger, and it must be shown that the city, or its agent, concealed the defective material and workmanship. For a collation of the authorities, we cite Thornton v. Dow, 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 968, and note, 60 Wash. 622, 111 Pac. 899; O'Brien

v. American Bridge Co. 110 Minn. 364, 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 980, 136 Am. St. Rep. 503, 125 N. W. 1012.

The demurrer should have been sustained. Reversed and remanded.

MISSISSIPPI SUPREME COURT.

A. G. RUSSELL, Appt.,

v.

PALATINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

(— Miss. —, 63 So. 644.)

Principal and agent — authority to collect account — institution of criminal proceedings — liability.

An agent to settle the accounts of another agent of the common employer has no implied authority to institute criminal pro-

Note. — Liability of principal for malicious prosecution, false arrest, or false imprisonment by agent authorized to collect a debt.

Generally as to liability of master for malicious prosecution by servant, see notes in 14 L.R.A. 791, and 27 L.R.A. 195.

As to liability of municipality for malicious prosecution by its officers, see note in 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 36.

So far as an exhaustive search is concerned, this note as indicated in its title is limited to cases where the agent is employed to procure the payment of a debt. A few cases not involving the collection of a debt are included, where the transaction is so analogous as to warrant an inclusion of the case. The rules of agency apply in this class of cases whether, as is subsequently shown, the agent is a partner or an attorney at law; and the question of liability depends upon whether or not the prosecution or arrest was within the scope of the agent's authority or employment.

The general rule appears to be in accord with RUSSELL v. PALATINE INS. Co. that the authority conferred upon an agent to settle accounts or collect a debt does not imply authority to cause an arrest, so as to render the principal liable in an action for malicious prosecution or false arrest or imprisonment, in the absence of ratification or adoption of the agent's act.

Thus, in Thompson v. Bank of Nova Scotia, 32 N. B. 335, it was held no part of the ordinary banking business for an agent to lay a criminal information and to have a warrant issued, for one of the bank's customers. Consequently, where an agent in charge of a branch of a bank criminally prosecuted a customer who had failed to pay certain notes, the court, in the above case, held that the agent acted without authority, and that the bank was not liable for malicious prosecution.

So, the chief secretary and treasurer of a corporation having control, management 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

ceedings against him for embezzlement, so as to render the employer liable for malicious prosecution because of his act in so doing.

(December 15, 1913.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Warren County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for alleged malicious prosecution. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. C. Bryson, Anderson, Vollor & Kelly and Hirsh, Dent & Landau for appellant:

Klein was not stating merely the fact of his agency or relating the history of past transactions, but he was actually engaged in the service of the Palatine Company and his statements had reference to the im-of the receipts, and disbursements of corporate funds, cannot arrest a person for embezzlement in the name of the state so as to render the company liable for malicious prosecution. Gillett v. Missouri Valley R. Co. 55 Mo. 315, 17 Am. Rep. 653.

Nor has an agent or servant intrusted with the custody of the goods or money of a corporation implied authority to cause the arrest of a person for embezzlement, so as to render the corporation liable for malicious prosecution or false imprisonment. Carter v. Howe Mach. Co. 51 Md. 290, 34 Am. Rep. 311.

And it is held in RUSSELL v. PALATINE INS. Co. that an agent authorized to employ all appropriate means to collect a debt is not authorized to prosecute for embezzlement. The court observing that it cannot be said that a criminal prosecution is a means appropriate to the collection of debts.

So, an agent authorized to collect money due a corporation, and even to bring suits, is not thereby authorized to charge the corporation with his own malicious acts in setting in motion the criminal procedure of the state, from the legitimate result of which the corporation could derive no benefit. If his motive was to obtain for the corporation a benefit from the abuse of the process, the corporation would not thereby be charged, even if the prosecution was in the line of his duty, as he understood it, since his duty or authority in fact was not extended by his understanding of either. Cleveland Co-op. Stove Co. v. Koch, 37 Ill. App. 595.

To the same effect is Springfield Engine & Threshing Co. v. Green, 25 Ill. App. 106, an action for malicious prosecution, where it is held not to be within the express or implied authority of an agent employed to collect a note to prosecute the maker for forgery.

It does not appear just what the authority of the agent was in Dally v. Young, 3 Ill. App. 39. The case, however, holds that mediate business on hand, and were, therefore a part of the res gesta and in the nature of admissions against interest.

The criminal prosecution was a mere means to an end and that end was the collection of what Russell & Moore owed his company. This was the business of his company and whatever he did in reference thereto was and is imputable to it.

Williams v. Planters' Ins. Co. 57 Miss. 759, 34 Am. Rep. 494, 60 Miss. 916; King v. Illinois C. R. Co. 69 Miss. 245, 10 So. 42; Richberger v. American Exp. Co. 73 Miss.

The several acts detailed tend to establish an agency in Klein sufficiently comprehensive to bind the Palatine for commencing the criminal prosecution.

St. Louis Transit Co. 108 Mo. App. 152, 83 S.

the general agent of a sewing-machine company is not liable for a criminal prosecution commenced by a subagent without his knowledge or consent, the charge being embezzlement of funds and notes belonging to the sewing-machine company. The court applied the principle that where an agent institutes a malicious prosecution without the instigation or direction of his principal, the latter will not be liable unless he adopts and continues the same with knowledge of all the circumstances.

In Murrey v. Kelso, 10 Wash. 47, 38 Pac. 879, it is held that an agent employed to search for lost property and to take all legal steps necessary to its recovery has no authority to cause the arrest of a person for larceny so as to render the principal liable for malicious prosecution.

A mortgagee's agent having possession of a stock of salable merchandise, his principal duty being to do whatever was necessary to convert the same into money, was held in Laird v. Farwell, 60 Kan. 513, 57 Pac. 98, to have clearly exceeded his authority so as not to render his principal liable for his acts in causing the arrest of a person on the charge of perjury in making an attachment affidavit in an action wherein some of the goods were seized and taken from the possession of such agent.

While the general superintendent of a telegraph company has authority to arrest a person for obtaining, by false pretenses, money sent for transmission, so as to render the company liable for a wrongful arrest, a mere subordinate employee, has no such authority. Consequently, where the proof was conflicting as to whether the superintendent or subordinate caused the arrest, a failure to submit this issue, to the jury was held error in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Thompson, 75 C. C. A. 334, 144 Fed. 578.

It is held in Powell v. Champion Fiber Co. 150 N. C. 12, 63 S. E. 159, that the superintendent of a corporation, having authority to collect debts, has no implied authority to arrest a debtor's wife on account of the debt, so as to render the corporation liable for such unauthorized or unratified act.

If an agent who makes the affidavit and bond in an attachment proceeding acts maliciously in doing it, his malice will not be imputed by presumption to his principal, though his bad judgment in wrongfully suing out the writ will be. Wallace v. Finberg, 46 Tex. 35; McCullough v. Walton, 11 Ala. 492.

It was held in Thompson v. Bell, 11 Tex. Civ. App. 1, 32 S. W. 142, that in the absence of evidence that a principal either participated in the malice of his agent in suing out an attachment for a debt, or that with knowledge of his malice, acquired since the levy of the attachment, the principal approved or ratified it, the court is not warranted in submitting to the jury the issue of the principal's liability for exemplary damages.

In Dupre v. Childs, 52 App. Div. 306, 65 N. Y. Supp. 179, affirmed in 169 N. Y. 585, 62 N. E. 1095, however, the proprietors of a restaurant were held responsible for the act of the general manager in procuring the arrest of a person who, before being served, had left the restaurant without stopping at the cashier's desk. The court, in answer to the contention that the defendants were not liable for what was done outside of the restaurant,—because there was a general rule that the manager should not go out of the restaurant until he had been relieved by someone else, said: "He was there as the alter ego of the defendants, and to do precisely those things which the defendants might have done and would do if present; and if in the performance of those duties it became necessary for him, in order to collect a bill, to step outside the restaurant and to procure payment from the person who had not paid his bill inside, there is no doubt that he might not only properly do it, but was expected to do it. The rule that he should not leave the premises was made, undoubtedly, to require him to stay in charge of the restaurant until he was relieved, but it was not intended nor could it be intended, to restrain him from doing on the steps of the restaurant just what he might do inside by way of collecting a bill."

So, where a sewing-machine agent, having full authority to represent the company, sell machines, and collect the money, procured the illegal arrest and detention of a person in attempting to recover a machine conditionally sold, the company was held liable in Wheeler & W. Mfg. Co. v. Boyce, 36 Kan. 350, 59 Am. Rep. 571, 13 Pac. 609, for false imprisonment, the agent's act, although wrongful, being within the scope of his employment. The arrest was incidental to the replevin suit brought by the agent, and was made to compel the delivery of the machine under a statute providing for the commitment of a person who should conceal property replevied.

So, an express agent charged with the duty of receiving goods and collecting charges thereon was held in Cameron v. Pacific Exp. Co. 48 Mo. App. 99, to be acting within the scope of his implied authority so as to render his employer liable for malicious prosecution, where, with a view of recovering the property or the charges thereon, he instituted a criminal prosecution against a person who had taken a C. O. D. package without paying the charges. The court observed that if the agent had caused the arrest in order to punish the offender for the commission of a crime, instead of adopting such means to recover the property or charges thereon, the company would not have been liable; for in such case he would not have been acting for the company, but for the state.

In Stalker v. Drake, 91 Kan. 142, 136 Pac. 912, a money lender was held liable for malicious oppression, acting through his agent, in seeking to enforce usurious and unlawful claims against plaintiff, who had borrowed a sum of money.

It was held in White v. International Textbook Co. 150 Iowa, 27, 129 N. W. 338, an action against a corporation and its agent for malicious prosecution, that a verdict in favor of one and against the other was inconsistent and therefore erroneous, since the corporation could not have been found to have been actuated by malice unless the agent also was actuated by the same bad motive. It is only by imputing 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

the malice of the agent to the principal that a corporation may be held amenable to a suit for malicious prosecution. If the agent was not malicious in what he did, there was no malice to impute to the company. On the other hand, if the company is chargeable with malice the agent must have entertained an evil motive in doing what he did. Manifestly, the verdict in finding for one defendant and against the other was fundamentally contradictory, and was necessarily erroneous as to one or the other. (In this connection, see notes in 54 L.R.A. 649; 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 880, and 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 404, as to verdict or judgment in favor of servant as a bar to an action against master.)

Partner as agent.

Generally as to liability of partner for malicious prosecution, false arrest, or false imprisonment by copartner, see note to Bernheimer v. Becker, 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 221.

The liability of a partnership for the wilful and malicious torts of an individual member is discussed in note to Page v. Citizens' Bkg. Co. 51 L.R.A. 403.

As a general rule a partner is not liable for malicious prosecution instituted by his copartner, unless committed in the course of, and for the purpose of transacting, the partnership business.

Thus, a partner is not liable for the malicious arrest and imprisonment of a debtor of the firm by his copartner where it was done without his knowledge, consent, or participation, and the act was of no benefit to him or the firm. Rosenkrans v. Barker, 115 Ill. 331, 56 Am. Rep. 169, 3 N. E. 93. The court in the above case observed that if the partner, after knowledge of the arrest, approved of what had been done, he would only be liable for the real injury sustained, and not for vindictive damages. Citing Grund v. Van Vleck, 69 Ill. 478.

A partner is not liable for the malicious suing out of an attachment for debt by his copartner, where he did not advise or actively co-operate in procuring the writ, ratify, or derive any benefit from it. Swenson v. Erickson, 90 Ill. App. 358.

The act of Klein was the act of his company, and both are responsible.

Attorney.

Where a claim is sent to an attorney with no specific instruction as to its collection, it is not within the scope of the attorney's duty in making collection to arrest the debtor, so as to render the client liable for malicious prosecution, unless the client advised, consented to, or ratified the act. Moore v. Cohen, 128 N. C. 345, 38 S. E. 919; West v. A. F. Messick Grocery Co. 138 N. C. 166, 50 S. E. 565.

The rule is laid down in Burnap v. Albert, Taney, 244, Fed. Cas. No. 2,170, that if a debtor is maliciously prosecuted and imprisoned by an attorney without probable cause, a client is not responsible unless he directed the attorney's act. But if the client afterwards refuses to stay the proceedings or discharge the party from imprisonment, from the desire to obtain thereby, unjustly, any pecuniary advantage to himself, and knows or believes at the time of his refusal that such proceeding and imprisonment have been procured maliciously and without any probable cause, he is liable. If, however, in refusing to interfere, he is actuated by honest motives is seeking and deserving by legal means to recover money which he believes due him, and is guided in his course by advice of counsel whom he believes trustworthy, he will not be liable.

The mere fact that one is acting as the agent of another in collecting a debt will not make the latter liable for his act in maliciously suing out an attachment. Consequently, where a firm sent a claim for collection to an attorney, who maliciously sued out an attachment, the members of the firm were held not liable in Oberne v. O'Donnell, 35 Ill. App. 180, where they in no manner aided, abetted, advised, or consented to, or adopted or ratified, such acts.

Where an attorney at law is instructed to collect a note by suit it is within the scope of his authority to sue out an attachment, and his client is liable if the attachment is wrongfully sued out; but the client is not responsible in any greater degree if the attorney was influenced by malicious motives. Kirksey v. Jones, 7 Ala. 622. 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

A mere authority of Klein to collect this money from Russell & Moore did not make him a vice principal of the Palatine Insurance Company in any sense.

Fox v. Fisk, 6 How. (Miss.) 328; Bush v. Southern Brewing Co. 69 Miss. 200, 13 So. 856.

A special agent, such as Klein was in this case, "is one who is appointed for a particular purpose and under a limited authority."

Planters' Bank v. Cameron, 3 Smedes & M. 609; Malone v. Robinson, — Miss. —, 12 So. 709; Fox v. Fisk, supra; Thompson v. Beacon Valley Rubber Co. 56 Conn. 493, 16

If an attorney and client, acting in concert, procure an unauthorized order of attachment, operating injuriously upon a debtor's rights, both are liable; but if a client proceeds under the advice of his counsel, which he confides in and honestly believes to be correct, being ignorant, as it may be presumed of the law and of the forms of judicial proceedings, the implication of malice, arising merely from the want of probable cause or crassa ignorantia, which would justify a finding against him, may be repelled. Wood v. Weir, 5 B. Mon. 544.

So, both client and attorney are liable for false imprisonment, where an attorney, at the request of his client, causes a debtor to be imprisoned on an illegal execution. Barker v. Braham, 3 Wils. 368, 2 W. Bl. 866; Sleight v. Leavenworth, 5 Duer, 122.

So, where a debtor was arrested upon a ca. sa. issued upon a discharged judgment at a client's special instance and request, both client and attorney who issued the execution were held liable for false imprisonment, regardless of whether or not they were notified of the discharge. Deyo v. Van Valkenburgh, 5 Hill, 242.

So, clients are held liable in Guilleaume v. Rowe, 94 N. Y. 268, 46 Am. Rep. 141, affirming 63 How. Pr. 175, for the arrest of a debtor upon an unauthorized execution, although they did not direct the issuing of the execution or the arrest. The court said the retainer of the attorney was by these defendants, the issuing of the execution was within the scope of his implied authority, and the arrest of the judgment debtor was for the purpose of compelling payment. This was enough to make them liable. There was, however, evidence tending to show actual knowledge on the part of the defendants, and, at any rate, acquiescence by them in the course adopted by their attorney.

In Anderson v. Canaday, 37 Okla. 171, — L.R.A. (N.S.) —, 131 Pac. 697, where a creditor, through his attorney, garnished a debtor's exempt wages, the court stated that where an attorney is himself actuated by malicious motives in bringing an action or proceeding for his client, he is liable for damages for bringing such action or proceeding equally with his client. Cook, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant filed this suit against the Palatine Insurance Company, appellee, and W. B. Klein, the special agent of said company, for malicious prosecution. At the close of the evidence the court instructed the jury to find a verdict for each of the defendants. This appeal is from the judgment in favor of the Palatine Insurance Company; no appeal having been instituted from the judgment for Klein.

Many interesting questions are presented by the able and exhaustive briefs filed by counsel for both sides of this controversy, but we deem it only necessary to discuss the point which is necessarily determinative of this appeal.

Appellant was the local agent for the insurance company and fell behind in the payments of his accounts due to the company for premiums on policies issued by him, which premiums he had collected from the policy holders or he owed to the insurance company by his contract with it.

W. B. Klein was the special agent of the insurance company, and as such he was authorized to suspend, check up, and settle with the local agents of the company. The scope of his agency is assumed for the purpose of this appeal, for as a matter of fact, it is not altogether clear from the record what authority Klein actually had to act for the insurance company. His authority is largely established by proof of his declarations and acts, but we will consider him as the authorized agent of appellee for the purposes mentioned.

"From the natural improbability that one should voluntarily, without authority, assume to act for another, settling his obligations for a considerable period of time, and from the fact that such conduct would naturally come to be known by the assumed 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

principal, the fact of agency may be presumed." Neibles v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 37 Minn. 151, 33 N. W. 332.

Klein checked the books of appellant, and the amount due the company was ascertained and agreed upon. Various efforts were made to collect the balance, and various expedients were suggested by appellant and by Klein whereby this end could be reached, none of which "panned out" anything. The effort to collect and the conferences between Klein and appellant seemed to have ended some time near the 1st of March, 1911.

The grand jury at the April term, 1911, indicted appellant for embezzlement of the company's funds; this indictment having been returned solely on the evidence of Klein, who appeared before the grand jury voluntarily, never having been subpoenaed as a witness. The jury at the trial of this indictment acquitted appellant, and it is upon this prosecution this suit is based.

There is nothing in the record to suggest that the insurance company was advised of this indictment, or that they ratified the action of Klein in bringing about the prosecution; but it is earnestly insisted that Klein acted within the scope of his authority when he volunteered as a witness against appellant.

This court in Fisher v. Westmoreland, 101 Miss. 180, 57 So. 563, cited with approval Daniel v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 136 N. C. 517, 67 L.R.A. 455, 48 S. E. 816, 1 Ann. Cas. 718. In that case the supreme court of North Carolina held: "The appointment of one as cashier at a railway station, with power to collect money, give receipts, sell tickets, take care of the money received, and forward it to the treasurer of the company, does not empower him to arrest persons whom he suspects of having stolen money which has come into his possession, so as to render the railroad company liable in case he causes the arrest of an innocent person." Judge Walker, speaking for the court, said: "The circumstances under which they pursued this man, without the warrant of the law, even to his bed-chamber and at the silent hour of midnight, arousing him from his peaceful slumbers, invading the sanctity and privacy of his room, which the law surrounded with its protection as much so as if it had been his home or his castle,—subjecting him to such indignities as no self-respecting man could submit to, even under compulsion, without feeling that he had been humiliated if not degraded by them, marching him through the office of the hotel and down a public street where any and all might see the infamy and disgrace which they had fastened upon him,—all these things and more they did which made their offense against him, if the evidence be true, a very serious one, and to him they and all who participated in causing his arrest are responsible before the law, and they must reckon with him if he sees fit to call them to account. But we must not allow any feeling of indignation at the grievous wrong inflicted upon the plaintiff (which cannot be too severely condemned, if, as we must assume, he is an innocent man) to withdraw our attention from those principles of that same law by which the defendant's rights are guarded."

It will be seen from this graphic description that plaintiff in that case was most outrageously treated and gratuitously humiliated by the agent of the railroad company. The court then states the plaintiff's contention and the court's response thereto as follows: "The plaintiff's sole contention is that what Atkinson did at Greenville, and Meacham at Kinston, was within the line of their duty and the scope of their employment, and therefore they had implied authority from the defendant to do what they did, upon the theory, we suppose, that every authority carries with it, or includes in it, as an incident, all the powers which are necessary, proper, or usual as means to effectuate the purposes for which it was conferred, and that consequently when an agency is created for a specified purpose, or in order to transact particular business, the agent's authority, by implication, embraces the appropriate means and power to accomplish the desired end. He has not only the authority which is expressly given but such as is necessarily implied from the nature of the employment. Story, Agency, 9th ed. ¶ 97. This is the general rule, and the doctrine of respondeat superior is a familiar one. But in our opinion it has no application to the facts of this case. If we should hold that it is so broad in its scope as to include a case like this one, it would lead to most dangerous consequences. For us to say that an agent can by his acts subject his principal to liability in damages to anyone injured by his said acts, done when he was not about his master's business, and had no express or implied authority to do them, but was merely seeking to avenge a supposed wrong already committed or to vindicate public justice, would be carrying the doctrine of respondeat superior far beyond its acknowledged limits. A servant intrusted with his master's goods may do what is necessary to preserve and protect them, because his authority to do so is clearly implied by the nature of the service; but when the property has been taken from his custody or stolen, and the crime has already been committed, it cannot be said that a criminal prosecution is necessary for its preservation or protection. This may lead to the punishment of the thief or the trespasser, but it certainly will not restore the property or tend in any degree to preserve or protect it. It is an act clearly without the scope of the agency, and cannot possibly be brought within the limits of the implied authority of the agent."

In the case of Markley v. Snow, 207 Pa. 447, 64 L.R.A. 685, 56 Atl. 999, also cited in Fisher v. Westmoreland, supra, it is held that "Employees of a mining partnership, who are charged with the care and management of its property, do not act within the scope of their employment in causing, long after the commission of the crime, the arrest, for the purpose of vindicating the law, of one who is suspected of having set fire to a building belonging to the partnership, so as to render the partnership liable for malicious prosecution in case the arrest proves to have been without justification."

An express company is not liable for the wrongful acts of its agent at its office in a city, in charge of its business there, in causing the arrest of one for larceny from the office, unless it authorized or ratified the act. Minter v. Southern Exp. Co. 153 N. C. 507, 69 S. E. 497.

Mr. Klein was employed by the insurance company to collect its claim against appellant, and he was authorized to employ all appropriate means to accomplish this end; and while the agent is employing appropriate means to carry out his master's business, the master is responsible for his acts. Certainly it cannot be said that a criminal prosecution is a means appropriate to the collection of debts. In Dally v. Young, 3 Ill. App. 39, it is said: "Where an agent institutes a malicious prosecution of his own head, and without the instigation or direction of his principal, the latter will not be liable for the same, unless he adopts and continues the same with knowledge of all the circumstances."

Should we hold that appellee was responsible for the acts of Klein, it would be to hold, when an authority to collect a debt is shown, the law will imply the authority to institute criminal proceedings against the debtor in case the debtor fails or refuses to pay. We do not believe that this is sound in reason or in law.

OHIO SUPREME COURT.

PETER ANDERSON, Plff. in Err.,
v.
UNITED REALTY COMPANY et al.

(79 Ohio St. 23, 86 N. E. 644.)

Removal of cause — withdrawal of bond — dismissal as to petitioner — effect.

1. Upon the filing in a state court of the requisite petition and bond for the removal of the suit to a Federal court, the state court is divested of jurisdiction; but a party who procures the withdrawal of the petition and bond by the party who filed it, before any action in the Federal court, and then dismisses his action in the state court as to the party who filed the petition for removal, and by agreement with the remaining parties prosecutes the suit in the state court, cannot be heard, after judgment against him, to assert that the jurisdiction of the state court had not been restored.

Will — death without lineal descendants — estate created.

2. Where in a will there is a devise to a son, and, if he dies without lineal descendants living at the time of his decease, then over, these words are not, by themselves, without assistance from other parts of the will, sufficient to create an estate by implication in the lineal descendants, but the son takes a fee defeasible upon his death without lineal descendants living at the time of his decease; and, in the event of lineal descendants living at the time of the son's decease, his fee becomes absolute, and such descendants have no interest under the will as against his grantee.

Summers, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In the court of common pleas of Lucas county this was an action by Peter Anderson against several defendants to recover the possession of several city lots, or parcels of real estate, in the city of Toledo. The title of Peter Anderson to the lands in question depends upon the construction to be given to his grandfather's (Henry Anderson's) will. Henry Anderson, the grandfather, made his will on February 28, 1846, and died on the 3d day of April following. He left two children only, William, born February 12, 1828, and James H. born June 25, 1831. William died in 1850 intestate, unmarried, and without issue. James H., the other son, died in 1902, intestate, and left surviving him as his only child, and only heir at law, the plaintiff, Peter Anderson, who was born August 27, 1859, and he is the grandson, and the only grandchild, and only living descendant, of the said Henry Anderson.

The testator gave all of his property, both real and personal, to certain persons in trust, and the will then reads as follows:

"Item. It is my will that when my son William arrives at the age of twenty-one years, the trustees of the first and general trust shall deliver to him a settlement of the affairs of the trust, and if my debts are then paid, and as soon as that takes place, they shall put him in possession of one half of my property, reserving thereout two-fifths parts of said moiety by valuation, which my said trustees shall hold in trust and properly invest and pay over to him at the age of twenty-five years. If my interest in the American Land Company be not brought into the general trust at the time William becomes twenty-one, but is brought in at any time before he arrives at twenty-five, so soon as brought in, two fifths shall be deducted therefrom and invested and paid over to him at twenty-five, the other three fifths he shall have as soon as paid in. I find the above does not express my will in this: When I say two fifths shall be deducted from the interest I may have in the land company for investment, and three fifths to be paid to him, I mean two fifths of a moiety shall be deducted, and three fifths of a moiety paid over.

"And it is my will that my said trustees hold and invest and pay over the remaining moiety of my estate to my son James at the respective periods of twenty-one and twenty-five years of age, being governed as to the amounts to be paid at each of the respective periods by the same rules and directions as are above laid down in the bequest to William, and to be governed in all other respects by the regulations laid down concerning the same.

"If either of my sons die without lineal descendants, the one surviving shall take his estate above bequeathed, and, if the survivor dies without lineal descendants, then one half both of the decedent's original portion, as well as one half of the portion taken by survivorship, shall go to my brother Peter, the other half to such of my brothers and sisters as may be living at the time of the death of such surviving son. If my brother Peter be not living at the time of the death of my surviving son, so dying without lineal descendants; then the share he would have taken, if living, shall go to his children, living at the time of the decease of my said son, and if there be no children surviving, then the share shall go to my other brother and sisters surviving at the time of such decease of my son. I make the following explanation: The limitation over on the death of my surviving son without lineal descendants is intended to take effect if there be no lineal descendants living at the time of the decease of such son. Nothing in the foregoing will shall be construed as to deprive either of my sons disposing of their portions by will on their attaining the age of twenty-one years, respectively. The above limitations over shall give way to the provisions of such wills."

This will was duly probated in Mississippi, and an authenticated copy of the will and of the probate thereof was thereafter duly filed in the probate court of Lucas county, Ohio, where the will was duly admitted to probate and record as a will from another state. On April 7, 1860, James H. Anderson, the father of the plaintiff, and the then surviving son of the testator, executed and delivered to one Charles Butler a quitclaim deed of all the real estate involved in this action, which deed was duly signed, sealed, acknowledged, and executed by him in the presence of two witnesses, who signed the deed as such, and which deed was duly recorded in the recorder's office of Lucas county, Ohio, on May 3, 1860. The defendants derive their title from Charles Butler. In 1838 the land in controversy was owned in fee simple by one Edward Bissell, who then mortgaged it to Charles Butler to secure the payment of his bond for a large sum due in one year. In 1841 Butler assigned the bond and mortgage to Henry Anderson as collateral security for the payment of his note to Anderson, and, in default of payment, Anderson in 1843 filed his bill in chancery in the court of common pleas of Lucas county, Ohio, to foreclose the Bissell mortgage. The land was bid in by Anderson at the master's sale in 1844, and he received the deed therefor. He then entered into an agreement with Butler, which, in effect, so it is contended, made the land the property of Butler, and vested the title in Anderson merely as security for the payment of Butler's note to Anderson. Butler thereafter obtained quitclaim deeds from Bissell and from Anderson's trustees and from William and James H. Anderson, and it is also contended that the proof shows that the payments made by Butler to Henry Anderson and to his trustees discharged the note, but it is not necessary to narrate the facts in detail; for, if the title was in James H. Anderson, his quitclaim deed conveyed it to Butler, and it did not descend from James H. Anderson to his son, the plaintiff, and these facts become material only in the event the plaintiff took an estate in the land under his grandfather's will. The facts are set out in detail in the opinion of the circuit court. 9 Ohio C. C. N. S. 473, 27 Ohio C. C. 267.

The petition in this case was filed August

17, 1905. The defendants were not tenants in common, but each held a lot in severalty. Some of the defendants by answer objected to the petition, on the ground that separate causes of action against several defendants were improperly joined, and on August 25, 1905, one of the defendants, a corporation, filed its petition and bond for removal into the next circuit court of the United States to be held in the northern district of Ohio, western division. The petition for removal averred that the corporation was the owner, and in exclusive possession, of one of the lots; that it had no interest in any of the other lots, and that none of the other defendants had any interest in its lot; that the corporation was a citizen of Michigan; that plaintiff was a citizen of Tennessee, and that the controversy in said suit between the corporation and the plaintiff was a separable controversy, wholly between it and the plaintiff, relating to the ownership and right to possession of the real estate described as lot 332 in Port Lawrence Division, Toledo, Ohio, and the rents and profits to the same; and that the value of the real estate in controversy, exclusive of interest and costs, exceeded the sum of $2,000. The transcript does not show any action by the court upon the petition for removal or upon the bond, but it does appear that on the 6th of November, 1905, the plaintiff dismissed his action, without prejudice, as to that defendant, and that in consideration thereof such defendant withdrew its petition for removal, and on the same date there is this docket entry, "Petition for removal withdrawn." The action was dismissed also as to some other defendants. Thereafter, on January 2, 1906, the plaintiff and the remaining defendants entered into a stipulation that the defendants waived the misjoinder of causes of action in the plaintiff's petition, and that all the parties consented and agreed to try together all of the causes of action set forth in the petition. Thereafter the action was tried in the court of common pleas, and a verdict was directed for the defendants, and each of them, and the petition was dismissed. On July 14, 1906, the plaintiff filed a petition in error in the circuit court, and assigned, as his first ground of error, that the common pleas court lost jurisdiction of the action with the filing of the petition and bond for removal. Other errors are assigned. The circuit court affirmed the judgment of the court of common pleas, and the case is brought here on error to reverse the judgment of the lower courts.

Upon the filing of such petition and bond the Federal statute makes it the duty of the state court to accept them, and to proceed no further in the suit. Thereupon the state court is divested of jurisdiction of the suit, and its subsequent orders are coram non jure, unless its jurisdiction be restored. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Koontz, 104 U. S. 5, 28 L. ed. 643; National S. S. Co. v. Tugman, 106 U. S. 118, 27 L. ed. 87, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 58; Madisonville Traction Co. v. St. Bernard Min. Co. 196 U. S. 239, 49 L. ed. 462, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 251. In this case we think the jurisdiction was restored as to the remaining defendants by the withdrawal of the petition for removal by the defendant that filed it, and the dismissal by the plaintiff of his action against that defendant, before any action upon the petition and bond had been taken in either court. The state court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the parties, but under the Federal Constitution and laws it was the privilege of one of the defendants to have the suit transferred to a Federal court, and when he filed the requisite petition and bond, the jurisdiction of the state court was suspended. The Federal court could, with the consent of the parties, restore the jurisdiction by remanding the suit, and we see no good reason why the jurisdiction of the state court may not be restored by the withdrawal of the petition for removal before any action upon it has been taken. In the Federal court, to which the case was sought to be removed on the ground of an alleged separate cause of action against one of the defendants, it would be, as a matter of course, remanded to the state court upon the entry of a discontinuance as to him (Texas Transp. Co. v. Seeligson, 122 U. S. 519, 30 L. ed. 1150, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1261), or upon settlement of the controversy between him and the plaintiff. Torrence v. Shedd, 144 U. S. 527, 36 L. ed. 528, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 726. There was merely an irregularity in the mode of restoring the jurisdiction, of which the plaintiff will not be heard to complain. In Garrozi v. Dastas, 204 U. S. 64-72, 51 L. ed. 369-376, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 224, 227, Mr. Justice White says: "The assertion of the want of jurisdiction in the court below rests, however, not upon a denial of power in that court to have entertained the controversy if the suit had been originally brought there, but upon the contention that, as a defendant other than the husband was a resident and citizen of Porto Rico, the cause was improperly removed from the local court. And the proposition goes to the extent of insisting that such want of jurisdiction may be asserted by the person who procured the removal, who resisted the effort to remand, and when the want of jurisdiction is only suggested after the trial and final decree." And the conclusion was that, even though the removal was irregular, the party who caused the removal could not be heard, after judgment against him, to assert that the United States court was wanting in jurisdiction solely on the ground that the case was erroneously removed. And if the conclusion in Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Fulton, 59 Ohio St. 575, 44 L.R.A. 520, 53 N. E. 265, that where a suit is removed to the Federal court, and then dismissed without trial, no subsequent suit upon the same cause of action can properly be brought in the state court, is not correct, as seems to be the opinion in Gassman v. Jarvis (C. C.) 100 Fed. 146 (and see note to Young v. Southern Bell Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 501, where the cases are collected, 75 S. C. 326, 55 S. E. 765, 9 Ann. Cas. 940), then, in effect, the withdrawal of the petition and bond for removal, and the trial of the suit in the state court by agreement of all the parties, was the prosecution of a new suit upon the same cause of action.

The remaining question, what estate did the plaintiff take under the will? would not, perhaps, have consumed much time, for the leading text-books and the cases are in accord that he took none, had not the circuit court of appeals reached a different conclusion in Anderson v. Messinger, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1094, 77 C. C. A. 179, 146 Fed. 929, where the same will was construed. It is there held that James H. Anderson, the surviving son, took a life estate, with the remainder to his son, Peter Anderson, the plaintiff. In Underhill on the Law on Wills, § 468, it is said: "Where real or personal property is given to a person absolutely, but if he should die without leaving children, then over, the primary devisee takes a common-law fee conditional, which is defeasible on his death without leaving children, though the children, if he leave any, take no estate as purchasers under the will by implication. If the first taker shall die leaving children him surviving, by which event the remainder is defeated, they will take by descent from their parent, and not as purchasers under the will. He has an estate in fee, with full power of disposal, and the only effect of mentioning the children in the will is to indicate the contingency upon which his estate in fee is to be defeated." At common law it was settled, says Mr. Jarman (Jarman, Wills, 6th ed. *521), that a devise to a person indefinitely, with a limitation over in case he died without issue, or words of similar import, conferred an estate tail on such person, and on the ulterior devisee a remainder in fee expectant on the estate tail in such prior devisee, on the ground that, by postponing the ulterior devise until the failure of the issue of the prior devisee, the testator afforded an irresistible inference that he intended that the estate to be taken by the prior devisee under the indefinite devise should be of such a measure and duration as to fill up the chasm in the disposition, and prevent the failure of the ulterior devise, which, as an executory devise to take effect on the general failure of issue, would be void for remoteness. And in like case, where there was an express estate for life in the first taker, he was held to take an estate tail. In Stanley v. Leonard, 1 Eden, 87-95, the lord keeper said: "Where a man, by his will, makes one tenant for life, with remainder to one, two, three, four, five, etc., of the issue of the tenant for life, and then for want of issue of tenant for life, limits the estate over, this will be an estate tail in the first taker for life by necessary implication, and this, because of the word 'then' before the limitation over, which, though sometimes an adverb of time, yet is sometimes a word of relation, and signifies as much as 'in such case,' and must have this effect: That upon the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, etc., limitations failing, the remainderman could not take it because of the words 'for want of issue;' and therefore, unless the tenant for life was construed to have an estate tail, it would descend, in the meantime, to the heir at law, because the contingency on which the remainderman was to take had not happened. But as the testator certainly intended to dispose of his whole estate, it has been construed a necessary implication that the tenant for life should take an estate tail to carry the testator's intent into execution. But where there is an express estate for life, the court never enlarges this estate for the sake of the tenant for life himself, but merely for the sake of other persons who are intended to take by the will. To this it is objected that you will introduce an estate tail, which will give the party an opportunity of defeating the limitations over; but this proves too much, for so it happened in all the cases that have been cited at the bar; for you cannot supply the defect and omission in the will without giving the tenant for life power to destroy the remainders over." This result follows from interpreting the words "die without issue," or words of similar import, to mean an indefinite failure of issue. But in 1837 an act was passed (St. 1 Vict. chap. 26, §§ 28, 29) by which it was provided that a devise of real estate without any words of limitation shall be construed to pass the fee simple, or other the whole estate and interest which the testator had power to dispose of by the will, and "that in any devise or bequest of real or personal estate the words 'die without issue,' or 'die without living issue,' or 'have no issue,' or any other words which may import either a want or failure of issue of any person in his lifetime or at the time of his death, or an indefinite failure of his issue, shall be construed to mean a want or failure of issue in the lifetime or at the time of the death of such person, and not an indefinite failure of his issue, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will." And so Mr. Jarman says (*522): "Under this clause, coupled with the preceding section, which makes a devise confer an estate in fee without words of inheritance, it will generally happen, in cases in which, according to the old law, the prior devisee would have been tenant in tail, by the effect of words devising over the property on the failure of his issue, that he will, under the new rule of construction, take an estate in fee simple, subject to an executory devise in the event of his dying without leaving issue at his death." And then, speaking of the advantages attending the present mode of construction, he says (*523): "Secondly, that, by excluding the implication of an estate tail in the person whose issue is so referred to, where he takes an estate under the will, or where he or the express devisee happens to be the heir at law of the testator, the new construction has the effect of exempting the interest of the ulterior devisee from its liability to be defeated or destroyed by the act of the prior devisee; the result being that, instead of the ulterior devisee having (as formerly) a remainder in fee expectant on an estate tail in such prior devisee (which, of course, the latter might have barred by a disentailing assurance), he takes by executory devise ingrafted on a preceding fee simple, to arise on the event of the first devisee dying without leaving issue at his death, the estate of such prior devisee being absolute in the alternative event." Now, the pertinency of this statement that, in such a case under the new rule of construction, the prior devisee takes an estate in fee simple, subject to an executory devise in the event of his dying without leaving issue at his death, is apparent when it is stated that in this state the common-law rule never was adopted, but was rejected, and the modern rule was adopted. Parish v. Ferris, 6 Ohio St. 563; Niles v. Gray, 12 Ohio St. 320.

Where there is a devise to A for life and in case he should die without issue to B, it has been urged, in case A dies leaving issue, the issue take by implication, on the ground that it would be absurd in the testator to make the estate of the ulterior devisee depend on the contingency of there not being issue, and yet, in the alternative event, to give the property neither to A himself nor to such issue, but to leave it to devolve to the heir at law or residuary devisee. Mr. Jarman says (*522): "There is, however, no authority for implying an estate in the issue living at the death, and the contrary conclusion is supported by Monypenny v. Dering, 7 Hare, 588, 14 Jur. 1083, where it was argued that a devise over in default of issue of A, a tenant for life, to some only of whose issue an estate was expressly given, showed that the intention must have been that, not some only, but all the issue, should take; but Sir J. Wigram, V. C., said that, admitting such to be the intention, it furnished no sufficient ground for supplying estates by purchase to the omitted issue. He had asked for, but did not get, any authority for such a proposition." It may be added that there is no such absurdity, for in cases of bequests for life, with gift over in default of children, it is held that the children do not take by implication. In Jarman on Wills (*524) it is said: "As no implied estate to the issue arises (as we have seen) from a limitation over in case of the prior devisee or legatee dying without leaving issue at his decease, it should seem that there is the same absence of authorized ground for implying a gift to children from a similar limitation over in default of these objects. Accordingly, in several cases it has been considered that a bequest to a person, and, if he shall die without having children, or without leaving children (which means without having had a child born, or without leaving a child living at his decease), then over, does not raise an implied gift in the children; but the parent takes an absolute interest, defeasible on his dying without having had, or without leaving, a child, as the case may be. The rejection of the implication in such a case is not (as already pointed out) productive of any absurdity; for it supposes the testator, by making the interest of the legatee indefeasible on his having or leaving a child, to intend that, if there are children, he shall have the means of providing for them. And even where the language of the will necessarily confines the interest of the parent to his life, the children will not generally be held to take by implication. It is extremely probable that the testator intended a benefit to them, but si voluit non dixit."

Before the making of this will an act was passed (March 3, 1834 [32 Ohio Laws, p. 41] 1 Curwen, p. 145, now § 5970, Rev. Stat.) which declared that, in any will thereafter made, a devise of lands shall be construed to be a fee simple, "and the devisee shall take all the estate which the deviser had in the property or thing de-vested, unless it appears by express words the manifest intent that a lesser estate was intended." And before the passage of this act it had been decided by this court that words of inheritance are not necessary in a will to pass an estate in fee simple. So that Henry Anderson, by the direction in his will to his trustees to put his son William, when he arrived at the age of twenty-one years, in possession of one half of his property, excepting two-fifths part of said moiety, which they shall pay over to him at the age of twenty-five years, and by a similar direction as to his son James, vested in them a fee simple title of all the estate he had in real property, unless it appears by express words or manifest intent that a lesser estate was intended. There are no express words, unless the son died without lineal descendants living at the time of his decease, which was not the event at the decease of the surviving son, James. But it is contended that, by making the limitation over contingent upon the death of the son without lineal descendants living at the time of his decease, the testator manifested an intention that the son, in the event he died with lineal descendants living at the time of his decease, should take only an estate for life, and that the lineal descendants should take a remainder. The answer to this is that it is settled, as already shown, that the limitation over in the event of nonexistence of lineal descendants does not of itself imply a devise to the lineal descendants. The alternative of the devise over is an indefeasible estate in the son. To say that the testator must have intended the grandchildren to take is merely conjecture. The testator may have supposed that the son's children would inherit the son's property, or that the son would give it to them. This is the most that can be implied from his mention of them; and if he acted upon that belief, and after the devise of his property to the sons, attempted to provide only for the contingency of their death without surviving lineal descendants, then not only can it not be said that he intended to devise it to grandchildren, but a reason for his not doing so is apparent. In this will not only is there nothing from which to imply an estate in grandchildren, but such an implication is precluded by the explanations of the testator. He says: "Nothing in the foregoing will shall be construed as to deprive either of my sons disposing of their portions by will on their attaining the age of twenty-one years, respectively. The above limitations over shall give way to the provisions of such wills." This is not the gift to the sons of a power to dispose of the estate by will. In the contemplation of the testator that power they already had upon attaining the age of twenty-one years, for he says they are not to be deprived of it. If it be said that this explanation merely qualifies the limitation over, then it does not help the plaintiff; and if taken literally, then the sons, upon attaining the age of twenty-one years, could dispose of their estates by will, even though they had children, which is inconsistent with an intention of the testator to make the grandchildren objects of his bounty. The evident intention of the testator was to give his sons absolute estates, to be divested only in case they died without issue living at the time of their decease, and without having disposed of the estate by will.

In Dowling v. Dowling, L. R. 1 Eq. 442, the testator directed that the interest from his residuary estate should be divided half-yearly between his four sons, "and at the decease of either without lawful issue, such share to revert to the remainder then living, or their child or children." Stuart, V. C., held that the sons took only a life estate, and that the children took a remainder by implication, but on appeal (L. R. 1 Ch. 612) his decree was overruled, and it was held: "That each of the four sons took an absolute interest in his share, subject to be divested in case of his dying without leaving issue, and that there was no gift by implication to the children of any who might die leaving issue." In the opinion, Turner, L. J., says (615): "There is therefore in my opinion an absolute gift to the sons; but this absolute gift is subject to this condition, that upon the death of either of them without issue, the share is to revert to the remainder then living, or their child or children. It appears to me, upon the construction of the whole will, that the children are not to take any interest as against their parents. If the parents are out of the way, then the children are to take in their place; but, so long as there are parents, the children are to take nothing. The testator thought that in that case he had done enough for them, for the parents might provide for their own children."

In Re Rawlins, L. R. 45 Ch. Div. 299, it is held: "Where in a will there is a gift to A for life, with a gift over 'on the death of A without leaving children,' those words are not, by themselves, without assistance from other parts of the will, sufficient to create a gift by implication to the children." This case went on appeal to the House of Lords, where it was affirmed, under the name of Scale v. Rawlins [1892] A. C. 342. There it was contended that the construction below led to an absurdity, and that either the niece took an absolute interest in fee simple in the houses, subject to defeasance if she left no children, or there was an implied gift to the children. Lord Halsbury, L. C., says: "It is manifest that, taking either alternative proposition put forward by the appellants, this House, if it is called upon to give that effect to the instrument, must put words into the will in order to do it. The thing has not been done; and I am not aware of any authority which would lead your Lordships to come to the conclusion that, because the testator had at some time or other the intention in his mind to give this property to the person in question, you are justified in saying that he has done so by the instrument which he has executed." Again he says: "Then it is said that he intended to make a gift to the children. Again I say that he does not do so. I cannot say that he had not the intention, but all I can say is that he has not expressed it, and your Lordships cannot put in words, simply because you may have some suspicion that in making his testamentary disposition that was the intention in his mind."

In Doe ex dem. Barnfield v. Wetton, 2 Bos. & P. 324, there was a devise to S. S., her heirs and assigns forever; but, if she shall happen to die leaving no child or children, lawful issue of her body, living at the time of her death, then to F. B. and his heirs, and it was held that the devise in fee to S. S., who was not restrained by the subsequent words to an estate tail, and that the devise over to F. B., was a good executory devise. In the opinion Lord Eldon, Ch. J., says: "It has been argued in this case that it was manifestly the testator's intention that the children and grandchildren of S. Saunders should be benefited. But however that may be, the question is whether the testator intended that the children and grandchildren should be benefited by this will, or by some disposition to be made by S. Saunders. If she had any children living at the time of her death, the estate being given to her in fee, she would have abundant power to provide both for children and grandchildren. Nothing, however, is given to them by this will. They are merely named in the description of the contingency on which the estate is to go over."

In Den ex dem. Sinnickson v. Snitcher, 14 N. J. L. 53, where there was a devise to a son, and, if he should die without issue, then at his decease over, Hornblower, Ch. J., says (59): "It appears to me hardly possible that any intelligent mind, unembarrassed by technical rules and legal refinement, can entertain a doubt upon the plain reading of this will that the testator intended his son Samuel should have the whole of the plantation in fee simple in case he had issue, and that at all events he should be the absolute and unconditional owner of one half of it. He did not intend to give the estate to Samuel's issue, but he intended to give it to Samuel if he had issue." Again he says (60), referring to the statute of that state providing that a devise without the word "heirs" shall convey an estate in fee simple: "Let us then inquire: First. Did Joseph Copner devise to his son Samuel any lands, etc., without using the words 'heirs and assigns'?" He certainly did; and, if he had stopped there, the whole plantation, under the influence of the act of assembly, would have passed in fee simple to Samuel, the devisee. Secondly. Has the testator used any expressions to show that he intended to give Samuel 'only an estate for life,' in all the lands devised to him? Or, to change the form of the interrogatory, Has the testator used any expressions to show that he did not intend that Samuel should have a fee simple in any part of the lands devised to him? I consider these questions of exactly the same import; for, since the act has declared that a devise to A, without words of perpetuity or inheritance, is a devise in fee simple, we must presume the testator used the words understandingly, and so intended to give the land in fee simple, unless he has used some expressions inconsistent with such intention, or qualifying the general gift, and showing that he did not mean to give the devisee either the whole, or any part, of the land in fee simple."

In Kinsella v. Caffrey, 11 Ir. Ch. Rep. 154, the master of the rolls, after reviewing a number of cases, says: "I apprehend, therefore, that the authorities may be classed under three heads: First. Where there is an indefinite bequest to the parent, and, if he die without having or leaving children, to B. In that case it is clear that the children do not take any interest by implication. Secondly. If there is a bequest to the parent for life, and, if he die without having or leaving children, to B, if the parent dies leaving children, they are not entitled by implication. Thirdly. If, however, in a case such as I have last mentioned, there are matters on the face of the will to raise an inference in favor of the children, the court is at liberty to consider these circumstances in connection with the bequest over in the event of the parent dying without having or leaving children, although such bequest over, by itself, is not sufficient to justify the court inferring a gift in favor of the children." These rules of construction are expressly approved in Re Rawlins, supra.

The case of Shaw v. Hoard, 18 Ohio St. 227, supports the contention of plaintiff, but it is contrary to the current of authorities, and appears to have been disposed of without reference to any decisions, and upon the conjecture that the testator supposed the property would descend to the children of the wife and daughter, and that this was sufficient to give it to them by implication. The case was decided in 1868, long after the making of the Anderson will, and so cannot be insisted upon as controlling the decision in this case. It is in conflict with other well-considered decisions of this court. In Niles v. Gray, 12 Ohio St. 320, where the testator gave real estate to his daughter, and provided that, if she died without any legitimate heir, her part of the real estate should go to his eldest son, and the daughter had children, and conveyed away the land, it was held, in a suit to quiet title by the grantees against the children, and in which the children claimed that the mother took only a life estate, and they took a fee simple, that the mother took an estate in fee simple, subject to be determined by the contingency of her dying without issue living at the time of her death, on the happening of which the estate would pass over to the eldest son by way of executory devise. This case is followed and approved in cases decided subsequently to Shaw v. Hoard.

The judgment is affirmed.

Price, Ch. J., and Shauck and Spear, JJ., concur.

Davis, J., dissenting:

It seems to have been conceded at every stage of this case that Shaw v. Hoard, 18 Ohio St. 227, if adhered to, would control the judgment in the present controversy; but the circuit court passed over it with the remark that it had been ignored, if not substantially overruled, in cases following Niles v. Gray, 12 Ohio St. 320. It is also stated, in the conclusion of the majority opinion above, that Shaw v. Hoard is in conflict with Niles v. Gray and subsequent cases which follow the latter. I have no difficulty in distinguishing, to my own satisfaction, Shaw v. Hoard from Niles v. Gray and cognate cases. Indeed, it has always seemed to me that the distinction was very plainly indicated by the court itself, by Scott, J., in Carter v. Reddish, 32 Ohio St. 1, as follows: "The English rule that a devise to A and his heirs, followed by a devise over in case A die without issue, will be cut down to a fee tail in A, and the word 'heirs' be construed as meaning issue, is owing to the fact that in that country the words 'dying without issue' are construed as meaning an indefinite failure of issue. 2 Jarman, Wills, 301. In this state, however, it is well settled that the words 'dying without issue' import a dying without issue living at the death of the prior devisee. Parish v. Ferris, 6 Ohio St. 563; Niles v. Gregory [misprint for Niles v. Gray] 12 Ohio St. 320. Still, we should have no hesitation in finding, from the language of the will before us, that the testator intended a life estate only for the first devisees, if the sole condition of the limitation over to the nephews and nieces had been the dying of his children without issue, and without reference to the time when they should so die. But such is not the language of the will," etc. An examination of the cases referred to by Judge Scott, as well as the other decisions of this court relied on by the majority, will disclose the fact that he has stated the doctrine of this court with admirable precision and conciseness; and he cannot be presumed to have misunderstood the decisions to which he refers, for he participated in and concurred in both of them. And we will not underrate the authority of the distinction outlined in Carter v. Reddish, when we remember that the personnel of the court which made it was not one whit inferior to the highest standards of this court as to breadth of learning, depth of insight, sound discrimination, and analytic power. And still, in Carter v. Reddish, notwithstanding those decisions, the court would have had "no hesitation in finding that the testator intended a life estate only for the first devisees," under conditions such as are found in Shaw v. Hoard and the case now at bar, but said that such conditions did not exist in Carter v. Reddish.

But I waive further elucidation of this proposition, because from my point of view the question as to the nature of the estate devised by this will is merely academic. It is a matter of indifference whether it be a life estate or a determinable fee, because in either case the only power of disposition apparently intended by the testator is by will, as provided in this clause: "Nothing in the foregoing will shall be construed as to deprive either of my sons disposing of their portions by will on their attaining the age of twenty-one years, respectively. The above limitations over shall give way to the provisions of such wills." That is to say, the testator gives to his sons the power of appointment by will, and, except in that way only, the property devised cannot be diverted from the family line prescribed by the testator. Whether each of the sons took an estate for life with a contingent remainder over or a fee simple, determinable on the happening of the contingency, he could not defeat the devolution of the property within the family, as prescribed by the testator, except by appointment in a will. I will not discuss this proposition further than to say that this clause of the will stands out as prominent as the Washington Monument, and it cannot be ignored in any fair construction of the will.

The sons of the testator never executed the power of appointment by will. Charles Butler, from whom the defendants in error claim title, by a course of procedure which is, to say the least, very suspicious, obtained from one of them, who had succeeded to the rights of the other, a quitclaim deed for a consideration of "one dollar and other considerations." This deed, as I think I have shown, he had no power to make, even if the transaction was free from fraud. Butler also, at or about the same time, procured from the executors of Henry Anderson a quitclaim upon a like expressed consideration, in which it is recited that, "it being understood that the above-described premises were conveyed to Henry Anderson in fee, but held by him in his lifetime as a mortgage to secure the payment of a certain sum of money due from Charles Butler to Henry Anderson, which fact, after his death, was duly acknowledged under seal by William Anderson and James H. Anderson, his only heirs at law," etc. As I construe the will, neither the sons of the testator nor his executors and trustees had power to divert the estate by these deeds; and I am constrained to believe that they executed the deeds under mistake and misinformation as to both the law and the facts.

I will not unnecessarily consume space by making any argument of my own to show that not a remnant of title, legal or equitable, remained in Butler after Anderson bought the property at the master commissioner's sale, even after the agreement between Anderson and Butler on October 4, 1844. For brevity's sake I refer to the opinion in Anderson v. Messinger, by Severens, J., 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1094, 77 C. C. A. 179, 146 Fed. 929. I might add something to that, but it would be fruitless.

I. Introduction.

Although it is true, as the courts are fond of remarking when confronted by decisions which they do not wish to follow, that no will has a brother, it is equally true that in reviewing cases involving the same question it is possible to make certain deductions having a general application, and to note the considerations which have influenced other courts in construing similar phraseology. Without the aid to be derived from such observations, the task of construing a will would be like adventuring, without map or compass, into a pathless wilderness of conjecture.

It is accordingly the function of the present note to collect, and to set forth as fully as may be necessary to show the reasoning of the courts, the decisions dealing with the question of testamentary construction indicated by its title; to indicate the relation of such question to other questions which may arise out of the same form of limitation; and to state the general principles to be derived from a study of the cases.

The presentation of cases includes those in which a limitation over has been made in phraseology substantially equivalent to that indicated in the title of this note; including cases in which the class of persons in default of whom the property is given to another are also mentioned in the primary gift, e. g., where the gift is to A and his children, but if he dies without children, then to B. The note does not include cases in which the question whether a gift to the class of persons in default of whom the property is given over may be implied was not discussed, although the effect of the decision is to deny the existence of such a gift,—as where it is held that the person to whom the property is given in the first instance takes a base fee defeasible upon dying without issue, or a fee conditional, or a fee tail (the issue in the two cases last mentioned taking, not as purchasers, but per formam doni). It does not, of course, include cases in which the question is whether a gift to the person named as progenitor may be implied from the existence of a gift over in case of his death without issue.²

The question whether there is a gift by implication to the offspring of the person to whom the property is given in the first instance arises in three aspects:

First: Where the person named as progenitor has died in testator's lifetime, leaving descendants, in which case the form of the question is whether his descendants are substituted by implication.

Second: Where the person named as progenitor has survived the testator, but has died before the time when the gift vests in possession,—e. g., during the continuance of an antecedent estate,—leaving descendants, in which case the question is whether a gift to them taking effect as an alternative contingent remainder or by way of executory devise may be implied. And Third: Where the person named as progenitor has survived to take possession, in which case the question is as to the existence of a gift by implication of a remainder to his offspring.

The first problem which one confronted with the necessity of working out the construction of a will containing the phrase in question has to solve is to determine whether or not the term "lineal descendants" or "issue" or "heirs of the body" (as the case may be) is used to designate an indefinite succession of issue. In doing so, he will be aided in most jurisdictions by a statute declaring that, in the absence of evidence of a contrary intention, such phrase shall be construed to mean heirs or issue living at the death of the person named as ancestor. If, however, such term is used to designate an indefinite succession of issue, it is not a word of purchase; and the question of the existence of a gift to them by implication cannot arise, because the only mode in which they can take in the indefinite succession which the term connotes is by devolution, thereby necessitating the treatment of the term as one of limitation.³

Where the condition of the limitation over is found to denote an indefinite failure of issue, its presence has certain effects upon the estate taken by the primary devisee, of which notice may here be taken.

Where the subject of the gift is real property, and the statute *de donis*⁴ is in force, the effect will be to give the first taker, even though his estate is expressly limited to one for life,⁵ a fee tail by implica-

² For an instance of this sort, see McAlpin's Estate, 211 Pa. 26, 60 Atl. 321.

dition, being performed, was thenceforth entirely gone, and therefore that the tenant in fee conditional might, by aliening the land, bar not only his own issue, but also the donor of his interest in the reversion; and so, by afterward repurchasing the lands, might himself become possessed of a fee simple absolute. Thereupon the nobility, to enable them to perpetuate their possessions in their own families, procured the enactment of the statute de donis, which, by providing that where tenements should be granted to one and the heirs of his body, they should at all events go to the issue, if any, or if none, should revert to the donor, gave rise to the estate known as fee tail. For a more detailed statement of the above matters, see 2 Bl. Com. pp. 110 et seq.

⁵ A very clear explanation of this was given by Lord Thurlow in Knight v. Ellis, 2 Bro. Ch. 570, who said: "A man, by his will, devises to A for life, there being plainly an interest only for life given; if that were all, the disposition would end there as to A, and any other gift would be effectual after his death. The testator then gives the same fund over to B after failure of issue of A. What is the court to do? It is clear that a life interest only is given to A. It is clear that no benefit is given to B while there is any issue of A. The consequence is that, as no interest springs to B, and no express estate is given after the death of A, the intermediate interest would be undisposed of, unless A were considered as taking for the benefit of his issue as well as of himself; and, as the words in this case are capable of such amplification, tion,⁶ by operation of the rule in Shelley's Case.⁷ The reason for this is that, as an intention to benefit the issue of the first taker is inferable, the only way in which such intention may be given effect is by enlarging the estate of their progenitor. The fee tail thus vested in the first taker may, by operation of the various statutory provisions in force in different states, be turned into a fee simple; or into a life estate with remainder to those to whom the property would pass at his death; or may be retained as a fee tail in the first taker, with remainder in fee to his issue.

But where the statute de donis is not regarded as part of the common law, or has been expressly abrogated, the older doctrine comes into play that a gift to one with a limitation if he dies without issue creates a conditional fee with a limitation over by way of executory devise.⁸ If there is issue born alive, capable of inheriting the estate, the tenant in fee conditional has the right of alienation,⁹ and his conveyance, whether made before or after birth of issue, is good as against them; though if he does not alien, the estate will descend to them, not according to the ordinary course of descent, but (to use the technical expression) per formam doni to the particular class of heirs named in the condition.¹⁰

Where the subject of the gift is personal property, and the gift is indefinite, with a gift over in default of descendants, issue, etc., of the first taker, the first taker will the court naturally implies an intention in the testator that A should so take, that the property might be transmissible through him to his issue, and he was therefore considered as taking an estate tail, which would descend on his issue."

⁶ If a devise be made to one without specifying any estate, and in case of an indefinite failure of his issue, a devise over, the first devisee shall take an estate tail, for it is manifest that the testator intended a benefit to the issue, and that the estate should not cease but on a general failure; and this intention can be effected only by declaring the estate a fee tail in the ancestor. Per Story, J., in Lippett v. Hopkins, 1 Gall. 454, Fed. Cas. No. 8,380, citing Forth v. Chapman, 1 P. Wms. 664; Rex v. Rumball, Cro. Jac. 448; Wyld v. Lewis, 1 Atk. 432; Denn v. Slater, 5 T. R. 335; Hope v. Taylor, 1 Burr. 268; Sonday's Case, 9 Coke, 127; Milliner v. Robinson, F. Moore, 682; Rex v. Melling, 1 Vent. 231; Newland v. Shephard, 2 P. Wms. 194; Blackburn v. Edgley, 1 P. Jac. 599; Brice v. Smith, Willes, Rep. 1. Continuing, the same authority said: "And even where the estate to the first devisee has been expressly limited for life, and a devise over upon a like failure of his issue, the same construction has prevailed. Forth v. Chapman, 1 P. Wms. 667; Target v. Gaunt, 1 P. Wms. 432, Gilb. Eq. Rep. 149, 10 Mod. 402; Brice v. Smith, Willes, Rep. 1. And so where no estate whatsoever has been directly devised, upon the implication arising from the devise over on the failure of his issue, the devisee has been permitted to take an estate tail. Goodright ex dem. Goodridge v. Goodridge, Willes Rep. 369, 7 Mod. 453; Walter v. Drew, 1 Comyns, Rep. 372. These are cases of an estate tail arising by implication."

"It is as well settled that a devise to one and his heirs, and if he die without issue, then over to another, creates an estate tail, as if the principal devise had been in the 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

most technical language, to him and the heirs of his body. The words of the devise over, 'if he die without issue' then over to another, limit the generality of the term 'heirs' in the principal devise, and lead us to the inevitable conclusion that the testator intended heirs of the body only, and not heirs generally. And whenever this intention can be collected from the whole will, taken together, let the phraseology in the particular clauses of it be what it may, it has been always construed to make an estate tail." Den ex dem. Harris v. Taylor, 5 N. J. L. 413.

But "where the limitation over is to take effect, not on an indefinite failure of issue of the prior taker, but on a failure of children only, or on a failure of issue within a given time, there the limitation over will not raise an estate tail by implication in the prior taker, but he will have a life estate with a contingent remainder over, or a life estate with a limitation over of a springing interest, or a fee with a conditional limitation over, as the case may be." Smith, Executory Interests, p. 301.

"It is an established rule of law that a devise to one, and if he die without heirs of his body, then over to another, creates an estate tail in the first taker whatever the actual intention of the testator may have been; but words qualifying such a devise, which show that the testator had in mind a definite failure of issue on the decease of the first taker, and made provision for that, will defeat such a construction." Schmaunz v. Goss, 132 Mass. 141.

take an absolute estate under the well-established rule of construction that where personal estate is given in terms which, if applied to real estate, would create an estate tail, it vests absolutely in the first taker.¹¹ For this rule there seem to be two reasons, first, that the term used indicates a clear meaning on the part of the testator that the property shall go in a course of devolution till there is an exhaustion of heirs of the body, which intention cannot be carried into effect,¹² an estate in chattels not being transmissible to the issue in the same manner as real estate, nor capable of any kind of descent; and, second, that, as the gift over can take effect, if at all, only as an executory bequest,¹³ it is void for remoteness, leaving the estate of the first taker unaffected. And as the use of words of inheritance is unnecessary to pass an absolute interest in personal property, his estate therein stands unqualified.¹⁴ It may be remarked in passing, however, that in order to render the gift over good, the courts are inclined to construe the limitation as intending a definite failure of issue.¹⁵

But where a gift of personalty is to one for life, and if he dies without issue, etc., over, an absolute interest will not be given him by implication,¹⁶ though, if the property had been real estate, he would have taken an estate tail by implication under the rule in Shelley's Case, as herein before pointed out.

The practical application of what has been said of the consequences which follow the employment, in a limitation over of real property, of the terms "lineal descendants," "issue," etc., as denoting an indefinite succession, is this: That, though persons answering the description at the death of their progenitor cannot, ex necessitate rei, take directly, they may at common law take the property as tenants in tail, or, under some of the statutes abolishing fees tail, a remainder in fee. Or, where the statute de donis is not in force, they may, if their ancestors have not aliened the property, take it per formam doni. With cases involving these consequences the present note has no concern.

From what has been said, it will be apparent that the question whether the class in default of whom the property is given to another take by implication can arise only where, as a result of the preliminary inquiry above suggested, it is found that the phrase "lineal descendants" or "issue" or "heirs of the body" or "children" was used by the testator, not as signifying an indefinite succession, but as designating persons answering to the description at the death of the person named as ancestor.¹⁷ But even then the question may not arise if the operation of the contingency is so confined as to give the primary devisee an absolute estate at some time prior to his death.¹⁸

II. Gift of remainder by implication.

With reference to the decisions comprised in this note the following general observations may be made:

Where the question is whether descend-

¹³ The reason why the gift over can take effect only as an executory bequest is that, as the statute de donis applies only to real property, and as the gift is absolute, subject only to be defeated upon a future contingency, there remains to the donor only a possibility of reverter, which cannot be limited over by way of remainder, and therefore must take effect, if at all, as an executory bequest. But as an executory gift to take effect upon an indefinite failure of issue is void for remoteness (see note in 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1143), the gift is not operative.

¹⁵ See Forth v. Chapman, 1 P. Wms. 663; Target v. Gaunt, 1 P. Wms. 432, Gilb. Eq. Rep. 149, 10 Mod. 402.

ants take a remainder by implication at the death of their ancestor, it is settled that a fee given in apt terms¹⁹ to the primary devisee will not be cut down to a life estate for the purpose of letting in such a remainder, since it would be a violation of the intention of the testator to give the descendants anything as against their progenitor; and because the implication in such case is wholly unnecessary, it being within the power of one who takes absolutely to provide for his descendants.

The same is of course the case where, though technical terms are not used in the

In Lee v. Shivers, 70 Ala. 288, testator devised lands to his son "to have and to hold the said described lands to him, the said R. H. Lee, and to his heirs and assigns forever, together with all the appurtenances thereunto belonging." In a subsequent item of the will he provided: "It is my will and desire that, if my sons, or either of them, named in this will, should die without children or a child; or if they, or either of them, should die leaving children or a child, and such children or child should die without a child or children, then, and in that event, the real estate and the slaves given to my said sons by this will, or such of them as may die without children or a child, or having died leaving children or a child, and such children or child shall die without a child or children, shall go to the surviving brothers of said sons, or their children." It was held that, as the language of the disposing clause, taken alone, would create a fee simple estate in the son, the effect of the subsequent provision was simply to convert this interest into a qualified or determinable fee, with a limitation over by way of executory devise, and therefore that a child of the son took nothing under the will by implication.

In English v. McCreary, 157 Ala. 487, 48 So. 113, the testator provided that the respective shares given to his several daughters "are given to them and their bodily heirs, or the lawful heirs of their bodies" (which clause, if it stood alone, would have created a fee tail, which a statute would have converted into a fee simple), and further provided: "Should any of my youngest children die before having or leaving any heir, then their shares to be divided between the remainder or surviving part of said four younger children." It was held that the latter clause did no more than postpone the vesting of the fee until the having of a child, and therefore that the title taken by the grantee of a daughter was good as against her children.

In Friedman v. Steiner, 107 Ill. 125, where a testator devised the residuum of his estate to his wife "and unto her heirs and assigns forever, to the total exclusion of any and all person or persons whatsoever: Provided, however, upon the express condition hereby made by me in case the said Rebecca Steiner after my decease shall die intestate and without leaving her surviving lawful issue, . . . that then and in such event" the property given to her should be converted into money and paid to certain legatees,—it was held that the wife took not merely a life estate with power of disposal, but a determinable fee, it being clearly the intention of the testator to give her an estate which might descend to her surviving lawful issue and thereby become in them an estate in fee simple absolute.

In Greer v. Wilson, 108 Ind. 322, 9 N. E. 284, where a testator devised to his daughter "and to her heirs and assigns forever, the fee simple of all said real estate of which I may die seised," and further provided: "It is further, however, my will that in case my said daughter shall die without any heir of her body surviving, or in case of such heir and it do not survive to full age," then over,—it was held that the daughter took an estate in fee simple determinable on a future contingency, and not merely a life estate with a remainder over to her children contingent upon their arriving at full age.

In Whayden v. Wilson, 4 Ky. L. Rep. 827, it was held that under a devise to E. "and her heirs forever," and in case E. should die without any heir, the land to belong to A. and her heirs, E. took the absolute fee liable to be divested if she should die without heirs; and therefore that a purchaser from her was entitled to hold as against her children.

In Rothwell v. Jamison, 147 Mo. 601, 49 S. W. 503, a testatrix who had only one child, a daughter, who was at the time of her mother's death about eight or nine years of age, devised to the daughter "and her children" certain property, with the proviso: "And if my said daughter . . . shall die without issue, it is my will that all the property which I do hereby devise to her shall be equally divided, after the death of the said [daughter], equally be-words of gift, the language of the testator imports (without the aid of the statutory presumption presently to be referred to) the gift of a fee²⁰ or absolute interest.²¹

tween my brothers and sisters." The words "and her children" were, in view of the daughter's tender years, construed by the court as words of limitation, and not of purchase, and it was held that it could not be said from anything appearing in the will that it was the intention of the testatrix to devise any less estate to the daughter than a fee.

In Carter v. Reddish, 32 Ohio St. 1, a testator having two infant children gave and bequeathed to each of them certain real estate, adding: "Each of my aforesaid children to have and to hold the same during their natural lives, and to their heirs, and in case of the decease of both my aforesaid children before they may be of maturity according to law, and without lawful issue, then the whole of the aforesaid real estate, as also all the real and personal estate, or any property whatsoever which may be coming to them through this my last will, to be left to" the children of a brother and sister. He continued: "I give and bequeath to my children as aforesaid the whole of my remaining property, whether real or personal, . . . to be equally divided between the said Sarah and Stevenson, at the time the said Sarah becomes of age," and directed that upon the division taking place the share of the son should be retained by his guardian until he should become of full age. It was held that the children took a fee defeasible only upon death without issue during minority, and not a life estate with remainder by implication to their issue.

In Cudworth v. Thompson, 3 Desauss. Eq. 256, 4 Am. Dec. 617, a testatrix bequeathed certain slaves to her nephews, "their heirs and assigns forever; but in case both my nephews shall die without leaving issue of their bodies, then I give and bequeath the said slaves with the future issue and increase to Mr. Thomas Hamlin, their heirs and assigns forever. My will further is that until the contingency aforesaid shall happen the said slaves shall remain and be in the charge of and under the direction of [the executors] whom I hereby nominate and appoint executors of this my last will, who are hereby directed annually to pay over the profits arising from the labor of the said slaves to the said [nephews] equally for their exclusive use and benefit." It was held that the language used was apt to give the legatees an absolute estate with cross remainders by implication; and that no presumption of an intent to restrain the estate of the first legatees to a mere life estate, so as to let in their children as purchasers, was furnished by the provision that the slaves should remain in charge of the executors.

of a deceased sister. He further provided that in case the sister died before those children were raised, his brothers should take charge of the children and property, in conjunction with his mother if living, and carry out his wish in regard to them, and ultimately to dispose of the estate for the benefit of testator's heirs; but that if the sister should live until the children mentioned were "raised and old enough to no longer require care of guardians and support," "she is to continue the ownership of the estate, and do as she pleases with it at her death, provided she leaves heirs of her own body, which heirs are to take it. But if she dies without leaving heirs of her own body, then my will is, that brothers John and Murry Walker are to dispose of the estate for the benefit of my heirs at law." The court held that the sister took, not a life estate, but a defeasible fee, saying: "We do not think there is much difficulty in determining what was the testator's plan for disposing of his estate; for it was evidently well considered and matured. The term 'ownership,' used to describe the quantity of estate he intended his sister Maria Jane to have, according to its common signification, comprehends a fee, and cannot be properly restricted so as to mean a mere life estate. And the proviso of her leaving heirs of her own body, who were to take the estate, was obviously intended to be operative only in case she died intestate, and not to limit the estate already given to her. For their absolute right to take it cannot be at all reconciled with her unqualified power to do as she pleased with it at her death. Moreover, if the testator had intended to restrict the devise to a life estate, it is a reasonable supposition he would have used the word 'children' instead of 'heirs,' to indicate who were at all events to take at her death."

In Cleveland v. Cleveland, 5 Ky. L. Rep. 56, a testator who had been married twice devised to his only child by his first wife a tract of land, "to her and her heirs forever," and then said: "My six children not provided for (naming them) are to have the balance of my estate not disposed of. In case of the death of any of my children without bodily heirs, their landed estate to revert back to their brothers and sisters." It was held that, as the devise to the daughter by the first wife clearly gave her the fee, and as no reason appeared upon the face of the will or from the language used that would lead to the conclusion that it was the purpose of the testator to limit the estate given to the others, they should be regarded as taking a defeasible fee, and not a life estate with remainder to their children.

In Richardson v. Noyes, 2 Mass. 56, 3 Am. Dec. 24, where testator gave to his three sons certain lands, adding, "Also my will is that if either or any of my three last-named sons, John, James, or William, should die without children, the survivor or survivors to hold the interest or share of each or any of them dying without children as aforesaid," it was held that the will did not give an estate for life to a son with remainder to his children, if he should have any, but a fee determinable upon dying without issue, the court adducing in support of this conclusion expressions in the will showing an intention to give the sons a fee, and the fact that a different construction would produce an inequality of distribution among grandchildren. In the course of its discussion the court said: "The fee was certainly intended to vest in children or grandchildren. Whether any of the latter existed, at the time the will was made, or not, we are ignorant. But, in either case, no motive is suggested why the testator should entertain a more favorable regard for his grandchildren, and make a better provision for them, than for his own children."

In Yocum v. Siler, 160 Mo. 281, 61 S. W. 208, a testator provided: "To my well-beloved son [name], my natural son, I bequeath absolutely [certain realty], and further, with the express understanding and restriction, namely, that if my said son dies without legal issue, descendants of his, legitimate issue of his, said land shall pass to" certain sisters, nieces, and a nephew. It was held, though by a divided court, that it was the intention of the testator to give the devisee a fee simple absolute, subject to be determined or defeated if he should die without legal descendants, the effect of words appropriate to the creation of a fee simple in the devisee not being subject to diminution by inference of an intent to give the devisee a life estate with remainder to his descendants.

The construction of the same will was also under consideration in Yocum v. Parker, 130 Fed. 722, in which it was held that the son took, not a life estate with remainder to his children, but a fee which became absolute on birth of issue, the court saying: "After the birth of such children, to limit the son's interest to a mere life estate would be to read out of the granting part of the devise the word 'absolutely,' and to import into the grant the customary apt words essential to the creation of an estate in remainder in the children." The foregoing decision was reversed by the circuit court of appeals upon the ground that there was no affirmative showing in the record of jurisdiction (66 C. C. A. 80, 130 Fed. 770), but upon motion for rehearing it was satisfactorily shown that, in the preparation of the transcript of the record of the court below, an error had been made in the copy of the petition, and that in fact it contained the necessary jurisdictional averments; whereupon the court proceeded to a consideration of the merits of the controversy and affirmed the decision of the court below, both on the ground that the construction given to the will was a proper one, and on the ground that it was the duty 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) of the Federal court to follow the decision of the state court above set forth. 66 C. C. A. 227, 134 Fed. 205.

In McLoughlin v. Maher, 17 Hun, 215, where testator gave the residue of his estate to his children, share and share alike, and directed that the share given to a daughter "be taken and held by her free from any control of her husband, and that in case of her death without issue that then and in that case such share shall go to my surviving children," it was held that the daughter did not take a life estate with remainder to her surviving brothers, but a fee with a contingent limitation over to them on her dying without issue. The court said: "To construe the will as vesting her with a life estate only would necessarily impute to the testator the intention to disinherit her children for the benefit of her brothers, to whom he had by the same will given an equal share of his estate. Such a construction would be wholly unwarranted. But the only effect of changing the estate of Mrs. De Forest into one for life would be to make the brothers remaindermen instead of executory devisees. The estates under the will would then be a life estate in Mrs. De Forest, and a remainder in her brothers. The children of Mrs. De Forest could in no event take any estate under the will in the lands devised to their mother."

The question herein under discussion received very extensive consideration in a series of South Carolina cases arising out of the following testamentary provision: "The rest and residue of my estate, both real and personal, to be equally divided between my grandsons Wilson and Thomas, and delivered to them at the age of twenty-one years, but should they die leaving no lawful issue, in that case I give and bequeath the whole of my estate, both real and personal, to" certain persons. One of the grandsons died under age and without issue, by which his moiety went over to the other by way of cross remainder by implication. The surviving grandson sold portions of the property, both real and personal, so devised to him; and afterward died leaving several children, who set up a claim to such property on the theory that their father took only a life estate, and that they took the remainder by implication. It was held by the court of appeals at law that the grandson took an absolute estate (Carr v. Jeannerett, 2 M'Cord, L. 66); and by the court of appeals in equity, that the legal effect of the words of gift was controlled by subsequent provisions of the will and the implications arising therefrom of an intention in the testator to provide for the issue of his grandsons if they should leave any (Carr v. Green, 2 M'Cord, L. 75). Not long thereafter these two courts were abolished, and a court of appeals was established having final appellate jurisdiction in all cases. A case involving the same will having been brought to this court, the reasoning of the former cases was reviewed, the authorities elaborately examined, and the conclusion arrived at, both upon authority and upon the evidence of the testator's intention afforded by the wording of the will, that the grandson took an estate transmissible to his issue by descent, and that there was therefore no necessity for implying a direct gift to them (Carr v. Porter, 1 M'Cord, Eq. 60).

In Hill v. Terrell, 123 Ga. 49, 51 S. E. 81, the provisions of a will by which a testator directed property to be held for the benefit of his grandchildren, their respective shares to be paid to them as they should respectively come of age or marry, and in the event that any of them should die before marriage or arriving at the age of twenty-one years, his or her share to be equally divided between the surviving grandchildren or the children of any deceased, adding: "It is also my will, desire, and intention that if either of my daughter's children should depart this life after marriage, and should die without leaving any child or children at the time of his or her death, that his or her share of all or any part of the property or the proceeds thereof . . . shall revert to and be equally divided between her surviving children and their legal representatives,"—were held to give to a granddaughter an estate in fee, subject to be divested if she should die after marriage without leaving child or children, rather than a life estate with a remainder by implication to such children as she might have at the time of her death; the court also holding that there was nothing in the limitation over in the event of a grandchild's dying before marriage or arriving at twenty-one years of age, or in the use of the word "also" in the expression "it is also my will," with which the provision above quoted begins, or in a direction that the executors should hold the property devised to the testator's female grandchildren in trust for them, to alter this construction.

In Webster v. Webster, 93 Ky. 632, 21 S. W. 332 (petition for rehearing overruled in 22 S. W. 920), testator bequeathed to each of his daughters various sums of money, and gave the residue of his estate to be equally divided among them, further providing "in case either of my daughters [naming two of them] should die without children, then in that event it is my will and I so direct that the estate of the one dying shall be equally divided among all my then living children." He also appointed a trustee for the daughter, the nature of whose interest was in question. It was held that the daughter did not take a life estate only, but an absolute estate, subject to be defeated by her death without living children before the time of the distribution of the estate.

In Howell v. Gifford, 64 N. J. Eq. 180, 53 Atl. 1074, where testator provided: "After the death of my said wife . . . I will that the principal sum of my estate, with the accumulations thereof, . . . be divided among all my children, each to have an equal share thereof; the parts or shares thereof going to my sons to be paid to them. . . . Should any of my said children, son or daughter, die without leaving lawful issue him or her surviving, then the share of the surviving son in such decedent's portion of my estate so held by my executors shall be paid said son or his heirs or legal representatives." It was held that the children of a son took no estate by implication, but that the share of each vested, subject to be divested only by his death in his mother's lifetime without leaving issue, the court saying: "The argument is that, as testator had not, in terms, provided for the case of children dying leaving issue, and has only given the estate over in case they die without leaving issue, he must have intended the issue to take if he left any, and consequently he must be assumed to have given it to the issue. It is difficult to put this contention in plausible form as applied to a cause like the present, for we at once ask ourselves, why imply an estate in the issue of the son when, in express words, we find it given to the son himself?"

In Rewalt v. Ulrich, 23 Pa. 388, testator provided: "My granddaughter (Elizabeth) shall have one-seventh part in right of her deceased mother, my daughter Elizabeth. Should, however, my granddaughter die without heirs, her seventh part shall then be equally divided among my six children before named or their heirs." The granddaughter having brought an action for the legacy, it was contended by the executors that her title was only for her life with a quasi remainder to her children or to the testator's children, and therefore that she was not entitled to the legacy without giving security; but it was held that the legatee was absolutely entitled, the court saying: "It is not at all likely that he intended her children not yet born or his

In one instance only²² has the implication arising from the terms of the gift over been permitted to overcome the effect of the use of words of inheritance, but in this case the circumstances were such that the children would not have received a benefit through their parent had the latter been given the fee.

legatees over after them to have the principal benefit of this gift. That the gift is to her proves that, as to it, she was the principal object of his bounty."

In Manigault v. Holmes, Bail. Eq. 298, a testator bequeathed a third of his negroes to his daughter Ann "during her natural life, and her heirs lawfully begotten, forever; and the other remaining two-thirds parts . . . be equally divided betwixt my said two daughters, Susannah and Mary Summers, share and share alike. But in case it shall happen that either of my said three daughters, Ann Olney Summers, Susannah Summers, and Mary Summers, shall die, or depart this life, without leaving issue lawfully begotten, then, and in such case, it is my will, and I do hereby give, devise, and bequeath, that part, or share, of my estate, real and personal, hereinbefore given, devised, and bequeathed, to such my daughter, or daughters, so dying, unto the survivors, or survivor of them, and to their respective heirs lawfully begotten, forever." Mary Summers having died leaving issue, the question arose, as between such issue and creditors of her husband, whether she took an absolute and unconditional property in the slaves bequeathed to her, which vested in the husband by virtue of his marital rights, or whether she took only a life estate with a limitation over to her children as purchasers. It was held that the fact that the first-named daughter, Ann, took a life estate with a remainder over, did not show that the other daughters should take the same estate; and that the reference to the issue in the limitation over gave them no remainder by implication, as "it would be a violation of the intention of the testator to give them anything as against their parent."

In M'Lure v. Young, 3 Rich. Eq. 559, testator gave to a daughter, without words of limitation, certain personal property, and in another clause of his will provided that in case of her death without issue living at the time of her death, the property bequeathed to her should be equally divided between others of his children. It was held that the limitation over could not have the effect to vest anything in the issue.

In Dowling v. Dowling, L. R. 1 Ch. 612, reversing L. R. 1 Eq. 442, testator directed his residuary estate to be invested, "the interest therefrom to be divided half yearly between my four sons above named and at the decease of either without lawful issue, such share to revert to the remainder then living or their child or children." It was held that under the rule that an unlimited gift of the interest of a fund will pass the

But where the gift to the primary devisee is in general terms which, by virtue of statute, will be presumed to carry the fee in the absence of an expression of a contrary intention, there is a difference of opinion, illustrated by the conflicting conclusions reached by the Ohio supreme court in ANDERSON v. UNITED REALTY CO. and by capital, the sons took absolute interests, subject to be divested in the event of their dying without leaving issue, Turner L. J., saying: "It appears to me, upon the construction of the whole will, that the children are not to take any interest as against their parents. If the parents are out of the way, then the children are to take in their place; but so long as there are parents, the children are to take nothing. The testator thought that in that case he had done enough for them, for the parents might provide for their own children. I do not understand that there is a difference between us and the learned vice chancellor as to the general rule of construction; but he has drawn an inference in favor of the children from the fact of the gift over being to the surviving sons or their children. But if the gift over is only to take effect in favor of the children if the parents are out of the way, no inference can be drawn from it in favor of the children of a son dying leaving issue as against the parents of such children. I am therefore of opinion that the general rule of construction must prevail, and that there is nothing in the context to take the case out of it."

²² Wetter v. United Hydraulic Cotton Press Co. 75 Ga. 540, where testatrix provided that should her daughter live to attain the age of twenty-one years, she would then become the absolute owner of all the property of the testatrix, "to have and to hold the same, and her heirs forever," adding: "Second. It is further my will, that if my said daughter should depart this life leaving no issue or lineal heirs, that the whole of the estate herein bequeathed should go and belong to my mother and my sister, as tenants in common, and their heirs forever, and should they two be survived by my said daughter, and she, my said daughter, subsequently die without issue as aforesaid then living, then it is my will that the whole of my estate vest in and belong to my own next of kin then living and their heirs forever." It was held that, as the will was manifestly drawn without reference to technical rules, the doctrine that in construing a will the testator's intention must be diligently sought for and allowed full operation was especially applicable; that the natural effect of the language employed, the disposition manifested by the testatrix in reference to her estate, and the fact that such a construction would give to the estate such a direction as natural affection would suggest, supported the construction which gave to the daughter's children a remainder by implication. The court adduced in support of this construction the argument that the Federal circuit court of appeals in construing the same will,²³ as to whether there is such an implication in the terms of the

if the will should be construed as vesting the whole estate in the daughter at twenty-one, subject to be determined upon her failure to leave issue, and she did reach that age, then by virtue of her marriage it passed immediately to her husband free from all contingency whatever, and, being thus his, would be subject to the possible perils of improvidence, bad judgment, second marriage, or whatever else on his part might prevent her children from enjoying it.

Wetter v. United Hydraulic Cotton Press Co. supra, is distinguished in Matthews v. Hudson, 81 Ga. 120, 12 Am. St. Rep. 305, 7 S. E. 286, upon the ground that the consideration last above adverted to therein was not applicable in the case of the devise to a son, the court saying: "The will involved in that case was made in 1839, when the old law prevailed both as to marital rights and sole inheritance by the husband, and the legatee, then an infant, was the daughter of the testatrix, and by the will took the whole of her estate, real, personal, and mixed." And after reviewing the provisions of the will in the Wetter Case, the court continued: "Such was that will, and that it presents a very powerful case in favor of an estate in fee, defeasible on the contingency of death without leaving children, cannot be doubted or denied. I need not pass in review the reasons which the court gave for deciding otherwise, but those which present themselves to my own mind are briefly these: The legatee was an infant, and whether she would have capacity to provide by marriage contract, discreetly or judiciously, for her offspring, or even for herself, the testatrix did not and could not know. If she failed so to provide, her fortune, both as to her and her children, would be at the mercy of her husband, who by reducing it to possession would own it all. Should he not do this, he would, in case of her death during the coverture, be her sole heir at law, and as such take it all, unless she died testate, which could not happen without his consent. In the face of these legal possibilities, it would be rational, if not necessary, to imply a remainder in behalf of the daughter's children. None of the reasons here indicated are operative in the present case, in which a son, and not a daughter, was the immediate object of the mother's bounty. Though his age is not disclosed by the bill (and on the bill alone was the judgment we are reviewing predicated), he had reached years of discretion, and the mother's confidence in his discretion was manifested by appointing him trustee for her other children. His marriage would not result in clothing his wife with his rights of property; he could make a will without her consent, and on his death intestate leaving children, she would not inherit his whole estate, but take only dower or a child's part in realty, and a child's part in personalty. Such, to say nothing of other distinctions, are the differences between the two cases in respect to causes for imputing to the testatrix by mere implication an intention to provide for grandchildren by way of remainder."

And in Hill v. Terrell, 123 Ga. 49, 51 S. E. 81, it is said that if the decision in the Wetter Case can stand at all, it must be upon its own peculiar facts.

²⁴ In Shaw v. Hoard, 18 Ohio St. 227 (which is disapproved in ANDERSON v. UNITED REALTY CO.), a testator who left him surviving a widow and an only daughter devised to them "all the real estate of which I may be seised at the time of my death, to each one half. On the death of either my wife or daughter, then the survivor shall have all the property left them by me; and if both die without leaving any heirs of their body, then and in that case said property shall be given to my wife's brother David Campbell." The widow married again and died leaving issue of her second marriage. The daughter died without issue. Three contentions were made, by the various parties interested, first, that it was not the intention of the testator that his daughter or children of his wife's second marriage should be considered as issue, and therefore that the gift over to David Campbell took effect; second, that as the gift over was upon the contingency of the death of both the wife and daughter without leaving any heirs of their body, and as such contingency had not happened, the property descended to testator's heirs at law; and, third, that there was a devise by implication to the heirs of the body of the mother or daughter. The court held that the surviving issue of the wife was entitled to take the property under the will, either as a remainder or an executory devise, saying: "The will was not drawn with technical completeness, but the disposition that the testator intended to make of his estate is clearly discernible from the language he has employed in his testament. It does not admit of doubt that he devised at least a life estate to his wife and daughter. It would seem to be just as clear that he intended, in case of the death of both his wife and daughter without issue, that, if David Campbell survived them, he should take the property, instead of his brothers and sisters, his present heirs at law. He certainly intended to prefer him over them. Whether he did so for a good reason, we do not know, nor is it material that we should, since such is his clearly declared will and purpose. If he preferred Campbell to the defendants in error, much more does his preference extend to the issue of his wife and daughter, since Campbell can take under the will only on default of such issue. It is also very clear that the testator did not intend that Campbell should have the property unless 'both' his wife and daughter should die without leaving issue; for 'then, and in that case' only, does he give it to him. Although there are no words in the will expressly giving the estate to the issue of his wife and daughter, it is manifest he intended that their issue should have it after their decease. It would seem that he regarded it as not to be doubted but that the property would pass to the children of his wife and daughter, if they died leaving children. He was therefore careful only to direct what disposition should be made of his property in the event that both should die 'without leaving any heirs of their body.' It follows, by clear implication, that he intended to give the property to the issue of his wife and daughter after their decease, if they left issue surviving them, to the exclusion of all other heirs, and of Campbell even, who is preferred in the will to them."

As is noted in ANDERSON v. UNITED REALTY Co., the same will therein involved was construed with a different result by the Federal circuit court of appeals in Anderson v. Messinger, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1094, 77 C. C. A. 179, 146 Fed. 929. Briefly stated, the difference of opinion between the two courts is this, that while the Ohio supreme court holds that the effect of words sufficient, standing alone, to give a fee to the primary devisee, is not to be diminished by any implication drawn from the subsequent provision of the will, where the general purpose of testator can be given effect without drawing such implication, the circuit court of appeals asserts the right to determine the testator's specific purpose from a consideration of the whole will, without being embarrassed by the presumption that the testator intended to give each of his sons a fee. The reasoning of the court is shown by the following excerpts: "Now, we cannot but think that to the common understanding this language would convey the meaning that in the other alternative—that is, if the sons should leave lineal descendants—it was intended that they should take, and that it was only in the event of their not leaving lineal descendants that the estate should go over to collateral relatives. The reason which gives force to the familiar rule of construction that the inclusion of one alternative is the exclusion of the other, and vice versa, would tend to confirm the impression. Moreover, the whole paragraph shows beyond doubt that the testator intended to prefer his lineal descendants to the collateral branches of his family. After providing that his sons should take the estate by moieties, his mind went forward to the time of their death. The working of the natural instinct to keep the property in the family becomes evident. He does not say, if either of my sons shall die 'without heirs,' but without 'lineal descendants.' He evidently chose his words, and the distinction is clear. It would not comport with his idea that the lineal descendants should take as heirs. Nor did he intend so wide a class. He made a distinct blunder if he discarded the familiar term 'heirs' and employed the selection of 'lineal descendants,' if he had in mind a succession by inheritance, and not by purchase. We are now considering this paragraph as if it stood unaffected by anything else in the will, and we cannot but be much impressed by the considerations which tend to the conclusion that the testator intended that, if the survivor of the sons should die leaving lineal descendants, they should take the remainder. Then, if this were doubtful, there is a long established rule of construction of devises in the law of real property, one of such as were referred to in the early part of our discussion of this subject, that, when a devise can, without doing violence to the language of the testator, be construed as creating a remainder, it shall not be construed as being an executory devise. . . . The contention of the defendant rests upon the assumption that the language of the will imports a devise of an estate in fee simple to the sons of the testator, and this assumption would probably be well taken if we looked only to that part of the will which devises the property to them. It is true there is no mention of heirs, but it would in the case supposed be implied that the testator intended to devise the whole estate. But the implication is removed if, from other provisions in the will, it is seen that the testator did not intend to devise an unqualified estate. And it is to be observed that the defendant's contention proposes to cut down the fee simple which the earlier parts of the will are said to devise to the sons, by a condition that the sons shall leave lineal descendants. So, in either construction of the parties, the implication which would arise from the unqualified language of the devise to the sons cannot prevail." And, after reviewing a number of decisions, the court continued: "There is another consideration which must not be ignored. The authorities recognize a more significant purpose in an implication which tends to cut down a larger estate to a life estate, where the remainder thereby passes to a person who is in the line of descent, than it would if it were to pass to a stranger. This results from the stronger motive which the testator would have to prefer the former to the latter class. The gift of the power to dispose of the property by will when the sons should reach the age of twenty-one does not enlarge a life estate. Jones v. Shields, 14 Ohio, 359; Baxter v. Bowyer, 19 Ohio St. 490; Stableton v. Ellison, 21 Ohio St. 527; Huston v. Craighhead, 23 Ohio St. 198. We are therefore of opinion that the intention of the testator was that the lineal descendants of the surviving son should take an estate in remainder at his decease."

[In connection with the foregoing case, its subsequent history may be of interest: Upon a second trial the court again in-

of a remainder is in such a case ordinarily to be implied.²⁵

In some instances in which the gift was of personality, the presumption of an inten-structed a verdict for the defendant upon a ground not involving the interpretation of the will, but its judgment was again reversed and a new trial awarded, in 85 C. C. A. 468, 158 Fed. 250, in which the court declined to reconsider the question of the construction of the will. Upon the third trial in the court below, the defendant interposed a plea in bar arising out of the judgments of the Ohio courts which are affirmed in ANDERSON v. UNITED REALTY Co. The circuit court of appeals, in 96 C. C. A. 445, 171 Fed. 785, declined to adopt the construction placed upon the will by the Ohio supreme court, on the ground that the law of the case had been determined by its previous decision, and on the further ground that in the decision of the Ohio supreme court no rule of property was stated necessarily conflicting with the opinion of the circuit court of appeals, saying: "This court found 'assistance from other parts of the will' in reaching the conclusion we did, as will be seen by consulting the opinion. It will also be noticed that the opinion of the Ohio court, as exhibited by that of Judge Summers, does not deal with circumstances to which we attached importance." This latter decision, was reversed on certiorari by the United States Supreme Court in 225 U. S. 436, 56 L. ed. 1152, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 739, where it was held that, even apart from the effect of the state judgment as an adjudication, it should have been followed because, at least as against the decision of the circuit court of appeals, it was right, the court saying: "We should lean toward an agreement with the state courts, especially in a matter like this. In the present instance we see no sufficient reason for refusing to follow their judgment, even if, for any cause not pointed out to us, it did not finally adjudicate the question of title as between these parties in such wise as to be binding upon every court before which that title subsequently might be discussed." For a statement of the opinion of the Supreme Court as to the proper construction of the will, see note 25, infra.]

As to whether a gift over in event that the person first named shall die without children or issue will prevent the application of a statute declaring that estates given by will in general terms, without the use of the word "heirs" or its equivalent, will pass a fee if there is no further devise of the premises after the decease of the first devisee, see also Steward v. Knight, 62 N. J. Eq. 232, 49 Atl. 535, in which it is said the decisions are not entirely harmonious.

in which it is said: "The latter clauses that we have quoted from the will make a difference, it is true, according to whether the sons leave lineal descendants at their death or not. But the interest thus exhibited in descendants is satisfied by the probability that they would inherit the property or be provided for out of it. It is not shown to be so definite and paramount as to cut down the gifts imported by the previous words, except in the single event in which the will does so in terms. On the contrary the still later provision that nothing shall be construed to 'deprive' the sons of the power to dispose of 'their portions' by will indicates that the testator meant the sons to be owners of his estate, subject to the divesting clause."

In Matthews v. Hudson, 81 Ga. 120, 12 Am. St. Rep. 305, 7 S. E. 286, it is said that the general rule is that a devise or bequest to a child, though followed by a contingent limitation over, is not to be construed as a direct provision for grandchildren, unless so expressed, but as means to enable the child to provide for his own children in a way suitable to himself; and that unless some sufficient reason appears why this latter object, alone or with others, is not to be expressed, it is not sound construction to attribute to the testator an object which he has not declared.

In Burton v. Black, 30 Ga. 638, a will gave property to B., and if B. should die "without children," then to R. The question before the court was not whether there was a gift by implication to the children, but whether the limitation over was valid, which depended on whether or not the first taker took an estate tail. It was held that the term "children" did not describe a class having succession from generation to generation, and therefore that the first taker did not take an estate tail, but a fee simple determinable upon the condition expressed. In stating its conclusion the court incidentally remarked that the children were not intended to take in any event, except to take their chances as heirs or legatees of their father.

In Sumpter v. Carter, 115 Ga. 893, 60 L.R.A. 274, 42 S. E. 324, where a testator devised his whole estate to his wife for life, and at her death to be equally divided between his six children, adding: "My said effects thus going into the hands of my said daughters not to be subject to the control of any husband, but the same to belong to my said daughters and their children. And in case either of my said six children should depart this life without leaving issue, then their part of my estate to be equally divided between my other children, to be controlled in the same way as first above directed," it was held that the children of a son of the testator took no estate under the will, either expressly or by implication, the court saying that the rule that estates by implication are not favored applied to the case in hand with especial force, as there was no intent whatever on the part of the testator to give his son a lesser estate than a remainder in fee in his whole share, which was only to be divested in favor of the testator's other children and remaindermen, upon the contingency of dying without issue.

In Post v. Rohrbach, 142 Ill. 600, 32 N. E. 687, where a testator who had devised certain real estate to a daughter, further provided that should any of his children "die without issue, or should either or any of them leave surviving them no children or child, nor the issue of such children or child, or should any or either of my said children die leaving surviving them a child or children, and all of such children of either of my deceased children, as aforesaid, shall die without issue, then and in that case it is my will that the respective portions of my said property hereby bequeathed of any of my said children deceased, as aforesaid, shall descend or revert to such of my children as shall then be living, and to such children or child as shall then be living of any of my deceased children, as aforesaid, said property so reverting to be divided among them according to the laws of descent of the state of Illinois," it was held that the language used admitted of no construction other than that the daughter took a defeasible estate, and not a life estate to be followed by a life estate in her child.

In Holt v. Wilson, 82 Kan. 268, 108 Pac. 87, testatrix gave the residue of her estate to her husband for life and at his decease to her adopted son, William N. Holt, "if he be living at the time, but if he dies before that time and leaves a child or children living, then the said residue of my estate is bequeathed to said child or children, but if the said William N. Holt shall die without issue either before or after the first legatee's estate expires, then and in that case, I direct that the whole of said estate be and the same is bequeathed and given to Martha M. Wilson or her heirs. (The intention of this will is to bequeath to William N. Holt, after the first legatee's tenure expires, the whole of my said estate, and to his children after his death, but if he should die childless, then the same to go to the said Martha M. Wilson or her heirs.)" It was claimed by the ultimate devisee that William N. Holt took a life estate only, with remainder to his child or children who survived him, and in default thereof to Martha M. Wilson or her heirs; or that if he took a fee, it was a conditional one, subject to limitation over by executory devise in the alternative,—that is, to his child or children if any survived him, otherwise to Martha M. Wilson. The court held, however, that the devise was in clear language sufficient to convey an absolute fee, which was not cut down to a mere life estate with a vested remainder by the provision relative to dying without issue. In order to reach this conclusion, the court held that the son had an absolute right to dispose of the property, and substituted a period for a comma following the phrase, "then the said residue of my estate is bequeathed to said child or children," in the provision above quoted; and further held that the direction that the property should go over if the son should die without issue after the first legatee's estate expired was void as inconsistent with the absolute interest given him.

In Parrish v. Parrish, 86 Ky. 84, 4 S. W. 819, a testator gave the residue of his estate to his wife during widowhood, or until his son should arrive at the age of twenty-one, from and after either of which events a certain provision was made for the wife, and the son was given the balance of the estate "in fee simple." Testator further provided: "Subject to the interest devised by this will to my wife, I give the whole of my estate to my son, . . . but should he die without lawful children or grandchildren living at the time of his death, then in that event the whole of the estate devised to him is to go and belong to my wife." It was held that, whether the estate devised to the son was an absolute or a defeasible fee, his children could in no possible event take any interest therein as devisees under the will.

In Dorsey v. Maddox, 103 Ky. 253, 44 S. W. 632, it was held that under a devise of lands to testator's granddaughter, "to her sole and separate use," "free from the control of any husband she may marry, with remainder over to [others] in case she should die without issue," with the further proviso that the right and title to such land should not rest in the granddaughter until her father should surrender the note of the testator held by him, the granddaughter took a defeasible fee, subject to be defeated by her death without issue living at the time of her death; and therefore that her conveyance passed the title as against her surviving son.

In Smith v. Phelps, — Ky. —, 121 S. W. 656, it was held that testator's grandchild took nothing under a will by which testator devised lands to his three youngest sons, "to be equally divided between them as they become of age," with the further proviso, "I further will and desire that should any of my children die without legal heirs or heir, the portion allotted to him or her be equally divided between my other children or their heirs,—my meaning in this my last will and testament by heirs is my sons and daughters, and not their wives or husbands, or the children of my sons and daughters."

In Easton v. Miller, — Ky. —, 128 S. W. 1091, it was held that under a will by which testator gave a share of his estate to his wife, and gave one third of the remainder to a daughter, with the proviso: "It is my will that in case she should die before her husband without any living issue, that after the death of her husband that portion of my estate that she inherits by this will or such portion of it as may then be remaining, if any, shall revert back to the children that are now living of her two sisters,"—the daughter took a defeasible fee, and not a life estate with a power of disposal. The fact that testator devised other shares of his estate to another daughter, and to the children of a deceased daughter absolutely, and also provided that if his wife should die before him, the provision made for her should be divided among his children and the children of a deceased daughter, was relied on by the court as indicating an intention on his part not to create a limited estate.

In Elkins v. Thompson, 155 Ky. 91, 159 S. W. 617, it was held that under a devise to testator's son of a half of his estate, with the proviso that if such son should die without leaving heirs of his body, the portion devised and bequeathed to him should go over, the son took a defeasible fee, and not a life estate with remainder over to his children.

In Whalin v. Bailey, 29 Ky. L. Rep. 1048, 96 S. W. 1105, it was held that under a devise to testator's three sons of a farm, "all to use said land for their use and benefit, and I further stipulate in the bequest of my real estate that if either of my sons die without heirs, then their interest in said land to go to my surviving sons or son unto the last remaining one or their heirs," each of the sons named took a fee defeasible upon dying without issue, and not a life estate with remainder to his issue, failing which, to his brothers and their issue.

The question whether the devisee took a fee defeasible in event of dying without children, or a life estate with remainder to children, was adverted to, but not decided, in Miller v. Carlisle, 90 Ky. 205, 14 S. W. 75.

In Devecmon v. Shaw, 70 Md. 219, 16 Atl. 645, where testator, after giving his daughter certain real and personal property without words of limitation, added: "But in case my said daughter should die without leaving any child or children at the time of her death, or if leaving such child or children, such child or all such children should die before arriving at the age of twenty-one years, then all the real estate and personal estate devised to my said daughter shall go to my sister . . . and her children and grandchildren then living," it was said that it was quite clear that the children the daughter might have could take nothing as devisees or legatees under the will.

In Whitby v. Jump, 94 Md. 185, 50 Atl. 701 testator gave his residuary estate to his wife and youngest son during their natural lives, to be equally divided between them. In case the wife should survive the son and the son should die without children, the property given to the son was to be equally divided among the children of testator's daughters; and in case the son survived the wife, testator provided that whatever should remain of the property bequeathed to her during her life should then descend to the son, and in case of his death without children the whole should be equally divided among the children of testator's 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) daughters. It was held that the son took a fee defeasible upon dying without children, and not a life estate with remainder to his children, if any, the court saying: "If the appellant's contention is sustained and we hold that Wm. Elbert took only a life estate under the will, there would be an intestacy as to the whole residue of the estate, upon his death without [erratum for "with"] children, the contingency upon which alone there was any devise over, his death without children, not having happened; and the testator's children and grandchildren, who were intended to be excluded, would all participate in the residue of the estate."

In Schmaunz v. Göss, 132 Mass. 141, the testamentary provision under construction was as follows: "As heirs of what I leave, I hereby ordain and appoint my sister Magdalena Schubert, John Göss, Jacob Göss, and Betti Schmaunz, to the effect that each of these four persons should take a quarter of all I leave, in equal rights and portions. . . . Likewise, the half of the portion which the said Betti Schmaunz receives out of what I leave shall fall to John Göss and Jacob Göss and their descendants, in two equal parts, if Betti Schmaunz deceases without heirs of her body; otherwise, she is succeeded by her descendants alone, as also John Göss and Jacob Göss leave to their legitimate descendants their portions received and to be received out of what I leave, so that if John or Jacob Göss should decease before me, their children step in the place of their father as heirs, respectively, of one quarter of what I leave." It was held that the words, "otherwise she is succeeded by her descendants alone," were too indefinite and ambiguous to cut down the estate first given in fee to Betti Schmaunz, either to an estate for her life with remainder in fee in her descendants or children if she die leaving heirs of her body, or to an estate tail; and that she took an estate in fee simple determinable upon the event of her dying without leaving at her death heirs of her body, with an executory devise over dependent upon that contingency.

In Halsey v. Gee, 79 Miss. 193, 30 So. 604, testator devised to his two grandsons a tract of land, adding: "And in the event that either of my said grandsons should die without issue, then it is my will and I hereby direct that the land herein devised to him shall go to the surviving grandson, and in the event that both of them die without issue surviving, then it is my will that the land herein devised and bequeathed to them, together with all the bequests hereinafter made to them, revert to" a son and daughter. It was held that the children of a grandson took nothing under the will; but that the grandsons took the fee as tenants in common, with cross remainders over contingent on the death of either without issue, and with an ulterior limitation if both should die without issue.

ty, subject to the payment of certain legacies, with the direction that in case the daughter should die without issue, the property should go to testatrix's husband and sister for life, with remainder to her brothers, "the devise over to my husband, sister, and brothers to depend upon the contingency of my daughter Minnie dying without issue." It was held that the daughter took a base or conditional fee defeasible by her dying without leaving issue living at the time of her death; that her issue, should she leave any, would take by inheritance from her, but a conveyance by her in her lifetime would be effectual as against them.

In Beck v. Ennis, 54 Hun, 126, 7 N. Y. Supp. 264, a testatrix, after dividing her property among her children, provided that if a daughter "should marry and die without children, or die previous to her brother or sister, then the property given or bequeathed her shall revert to her brother . . . and her sister . . . or their heirs." It was held that the daughter took a conditional fee defeasible by her dying without leaving issue before the death of either her brother or her sister; that her issue, should she have any, would take by inheritance from her, but a conveyance by her in her lifetime would be effectual against them.

In Whitfield v. Garria, 131 N. C. 148, 42 S. E. 568, testator devised realty to a grandson, adding: "And in the event of the death of the said [grandson] leaving no heirs of his own body, then and in that event the above described land and other property shall descend to" certain other grandchildren, or the survivor of them, and in case of the death of the last survivor without descendants, to be equally divided among all testator's grandchildren. It was held that the devisee's children took nothing under the provision above set forth. On rehearing, reported in 134 N. C. 24, 45 S. E. 804, the contention was strongly urged that the grandson took an estate for his life only, with remainder in fee by implication to his children if any. The court, after saying that, in order to support this contention, plaintiffs must make out a very strong case, said: "It is provided by our statute that when real estate shall be devised to any person, the same shall be held and construed to be a devise in fee simple, unless such devise shall in plain and express words show, or it shall be plainly intended by the will or some part thereof, that the testator intended to convey an estate of less dignity. The Code, § 2180. By force of this statute, which is the act of 1784, Franklin Whitfield took an estate in fee, unless it was 'plainly intended' by the testator that he should have a less estate. It surely cannot be contended by the plaintiffs that it appears 'in plain and express words' the testator intended that he should not have an estate in fee simple, or that he should have only a life estate. We have found no expression in the will, nor can we discern therefrom any intention of the testator, which precludes the construction the statute places upon its words, or which prevents the full operation of the statute in vesting a fee when inheritable words are not used. The plaintiffs encounter not only the strong leaning of the law against their construction, but also the positive requirement of the statute that the devise shall be held to be in fee unless the testator plainly intended by his will that an estate of less dignity should pass to the beneficiary. An intention contrary to that implied by the statute must be gathered from the will, and the burden, of course, is upon the plaintiff to show that it exists. Instead of there being any evidence of such an intention in the will, we think that the terms of the devise plainly evince the purpose of the testator to have been to vest in Franklin Whitfield an estate in fee; or, at all events, the limitation that, if he died without heirs of his body, the property should go over to the ulterior heirs' devisees, does not rebut the intentment of the statute. The deviser must be presumed to have known the law which was in force at the time his will was written, and, acting upon this presumption, there must be inserted in the will the provision of the statute, so that it will read: 'I devise to my grandson, Franklin Whitfield, and his heirs, that part of my lands,' etc. He thereby acquired a fee simple estate, unless the words, 'in the event of his death, leaving no heirs of his body,' are sufficient to restrict the estate devised to one of less duration than a fee, or, in other words, to a life estate, and thereby prevent the insertion of inheritable words in the devise. Why should we assume that the testator was ignorant of the law, and therefore intended, by his failure to use words of inheritance, to devise only a life estate? Is not the provision for the estate to go over in the event of his death without heirs of his body fully explained and the intention executed by allowing his surviving children to take as heirs, that is, by descent from him; and is not this construction perfectly consistent and in harmony with the requirement of the statute that inheritable words shall not be necessary to create an estate in fee simple by will?"

The doctrine of Whitfield v. Garria, supra, was applied in Wilkinson v. Boyd, 136 N. C. 46, 48 S. E. 516, to a devise to a daughter with a proviso that if she should die without leaving lawful heirs begotten of her own body, the property should go to testator's other three children and their heirs.

In Moore v. Feig, 17 Ohio C. C. 27, 9 Ohio C. D. 660, testator, after devising the bulk of his property to his son John, provided: "Now, if my said son John shall have an heir of his own body, then all title and interest in and to my real estate with power to convey and sell shall vest in him. But if said John should die leaving no heir of his own body, then said estate shall pass to my son Thomas, subject to the same requirements, restrictions, and limitations pertaining to John. And in case Thomas should die and leave no heir of his own body, then it is my will that my said real estate pass absolutely to my son James and his heirs forever, with power to sell and convey. But in no case shall John or Thomas sell or dispose of said real estate, unless they shall have an heir of their own bodies." It was held that John did not take merely a life estate with remainder by implication to his descendants, but that, upon the birth of a child to him, he became the owner of the realty in fee; such construction being strengthened by the circumstance that John was required by the will to pay a considerable sum of money to other persons as a condition upon which he should hold whatever estate was granted to him in the will, and by the provision that in no case John or Thomas should sell or dispose of said estate unless they should have an heir of their own bodies.

In Thomson v. Peake, 38 S. C. 440, 17 S. E. 45, testator devised to his three sons certain real estate to be divided in the manner specified by him, adding: "And it is my will and desire that my three sons, H. H. Thomson Jr., J. S. Rowland Thomson, and William Waddy Thomson, shall have all my lands in York and Union districts, as above described and willed to them, to be held by them during their natural lives or life, and that my son, Richard Lewis Thomson, to whom I have willed Pacolet lands, as above described and willed, to him during his natural life. But should any of my four sons die without having any heir or heirs of their bodies, lawfully begotten by them, then the share or shares so willed to them shall be equally divided, share and share alike, among their brothers and sisters then alive, or should any of my children be dead, leaving lawful heirs of their bodies lawfully begotten, then the said child or children shall take the share amongst them which their deceased parent would take were he then living." It was held that the provision that if any one or more of the four sons should die without issue lawfully begotten, then their shares should go over, together with the statement that the sons should hold the land devised to them during their natural lives, did not reduce the estate of the sons to one for life, but to a defeasible fee.

In Shaw v. Erwin, 41 S. C. 209, 19 S. E. 499, testator gave to his wife "for her own separate use and behoof" certain lands, called in the opinion the "Saluda tract," and also gave and bequeathed to her "for and during her natural life" his home place, and further willed to his son lands on Turkey creek, adding: "And should my son R. P. Shaw die leaving no child or children and his mother being dead" then to others. "The property before willed to my wife, Mary Shaw, during her natural life, both real and personal, at her death shall return to my son Richard P. Shaw for and during his natural life, and then to his children, the issue of his body . . . and should my wife Mary Shaw die without making disposition by will or otherwise of the Saluda tract of land given to her by the 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) provisions of this will, and should my son R. P. be also dead leaving no issue, then I desire that the said tract of land should be sold and equally divided between" certain persons or the survivors of them. "And should my son Richard P. Shaw die without issue, then I desire that the property falling to him after the death of his mother shall be sold and equally divided between the nephews and nieces of my wife Mary and myself." It was held that there was no such necessity on the face of the will as would give rise to an implied gift to the son's children, either of the Saluda tract or the Turkey creek tract; but that the language of the will, so far from implying an intention to create an estate in remainder to the son's issue, rather implied the contrary. The court adduced in support of its conclusion the fact that whenever the testator intended to create a life estate he knew how to express such intention.

In Cowan v. Wells, 73 Tenn. 682, testator devised lands to a son by words which, taken alone, were sufficient to vest him with an absolute estate, but in a subsequent clause directed that should such son "die without heirs, then and in that case the property that I have hereby given to him shall be equally divided between my three daughters;" it was held that the son's children were not vested with an estate in remainder by implication, but that the son took an absolute title subject to an executory devise over upon the contingency of dying without children.

In Randall v. Josselyn, 59 Vt. 557, 10 Atl. 577, a testatrix gave all her estate to her son, who was her only child and heir, "subject to the following conditions and limitations." The first of these provided for the care of the estate until the son should attain the age of twenty-one, after which the will continued: "When my son has attained the age of twenty-one years, or at my decease if thereafter, he is to have the control and management of said property, which I give to him and heirs absolutely, provided he has children or their descendants who can inherit said property, or the avails of the same, from him at the time of his decease; but in the event of the death of my said son without having any child or children, or their descendants who can inherit from him, I then will and direct that all my said property or the avails of the same, if changed into other property or into money, go to and become the property of my nephew . . . and his heirs, or to his child or children and their descendants, in the event of his death before the death of my said son." It was held that if the son should leave children or their descendants they would take the estate given to him, not as an estate under the will, but by descent from him out of the fee devised to him.

In Daniel v. Lipscomb, 110 Va. 563, 66 S. E. 850, testator devised to a son the lands in question, "subject to said limitations and restrictions as the will of E. W. Spencer tion to give an absolute interest has been held to be rebutted by the implication drawn from the limitation over.³⁶

requires." E. W. Spencer had bequeathed to the same person, who was her grandson, and his brother, a share of her estate, to be equally divided between them, declaring that "if either of my grandsons should die leaving no child or descendants surviving him, the share he receives under this will is to go to his surviving brother; and if both of my grandsons die leaving no child or descendants surviving them, then the whole of what is herein given them shall be divided equally between" others. It was held that, as the devise, standing alone, would have invested the devisee with a fee simple estate, the effect of the qualifying language, "if he should die leaving no child or descendants surviving him," was to convert what would otherwise be a fee simple into a defeasible fee; and that in no event could the children of a grandson take as purchasers under the will.

In Close v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 195 N. Y. 92, 87 N. E. 1005, affirming 121 App. Div. 528, 106 N. Y. Supp. 329, a testator gave a third of his estate to his wife for life or until marriage, with remainder to his children, and directed the remaining two thirds to be divided into six equal parts "and then distributed among my (his) children in the manner following. . . . To my daughter Marie Ema Seward I also give one other equal sixth part of said remaining two thirds, the same also to be invested by my executors for her benefit in such securities as they may elect, and the interest arising therefrom to be paid to her semi-annually, and in the event of the said 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Where the primary devisee takes only an estate for life, by necessary construction³⁷ or the express provisions of

Marie Ema dying without issue, then the proceeds of such share to be divided among her brothers and sisters share and share alike." It was held, though by a divided court, that the daughter did not take a defeasible fee, but an equitable life estate with remainder to her children if any, otherwise to her brothers and sisters. The court said: "We now reach the question as to what disposition was made of the remainder upon the death of the daughters. Here we are aided by two presumptions of law, each founded on long experience and well settled, the presumption against intestacy and the presumption against disinheritance. Read in the light of these presumptions, what did the testator mean when he directed that if his daughter, Mrs. Seward, should die 'without issue,' the remainder should be divided among her brothers and sisters, without making any express provision for the contingency if she should die leaving issue? As he did not give the fee or the principal, for the clause in question covered both real and personal property, to his daughter, and he gave the remainder to her brothers and sisters only if she died 'without issue,' the necessary conclusion, in view of the presumptions mentioned above and the circumstances surrounding him when he made his will, is that he intended to give the remainder to her children, if she died 'with issue.'"

³⁷ In Nowland v. Welch, 88 Md. 48, 40 Atl. 875, where testator, after devising property in trust for the maintenance of a grandson, further provided: "If my said grandson shall attain to twenty-two years of age, then my will is that the trustee aforesaid shall convey and transfer all the estate and property, real and personal, so held by him in trust to my said grandson who shall manage and control the same, and if my said grandson should die without leaving children or the issue of such (if any have died), then" to a niece, it was held that the grandson took, at the age of twenty-two, an estate for life with remainder to his children or descendants. The court said: "The intent of the testator obviously was to provide for his grandson and his descendants, and upon his death, without issue, then one of the objects of his bounty was his niece, Mrs. Welch. The use of the language, 'who shall manage and control the same,' taken in connection with the other parts of the will, clearly indicates the character of the estate the testator had in view. There would have been no necessity for the use of such language if the testator had intended to devise a fee simple estate."

In Eldred v. Shaw, 112 Mich. 237, 70 N. W. 545, testator devised lands in trust for a grandson "up to the time the said grandson arrives to the age of twenty-one years," directing that the trustee "shall the will,²² most of the English and some of the American courts have been unwilling to imply a gift of the remainder from the terms of the gift over use and appropriate no more of the use or income from the said trust estate for the support, education, and maintenance of the said grandson than is made necessary by accident or misfortune, and such use and appropriation is to be entirely under the judgment and discretion of [the trustee]; and in the case of the death of my said grandson without heirs by his body begotten the lands and property above described with all its increase or accretions I give, devise, and bequeath to" sons and daughters of the testator. It was held that testator's intent was to convey an estate to his grandson for his use and benefit during his life, with the fee to the issue of his body if such were living at his death, and if not, then to his sons and daughters.

In Webel v. Kelly, 111 App. Div. 521, 97 N. Y. Supp. 1009, testator directed his executor to hold property in trust for the support of an adopted son during minority, giving to such son the total income of the property while he should be between twenty-one and twenty-five years of age, and directed that upon the arrival of such son at the age of twenty-five, the executor should convey the property to him "to be held by him as follows: In case of my said adopted son departing this life before me, or in case of his so departing this life after my death without leaving lawful issue, then I give all my property, real and personal, and of every kind to" a nephew and niece. The foregoing provision was held to give the adopted son a life estate in the property with remainder to his issue.

In Kreamer v. Showalter, 1 Pa. Co. Ct. 453, testatrix gave a share of personalty to be held in trust for the maintenance and support of a son, with power to expend any part of the principal for the son's support should it become necessary, and in case the said son "should die without leaving issue the principal sum I order to be paid to the heirs of the said" son. It was held that there was by implication a gift to the children of the son should he have any, the court saying: "A limitation over of personal estate in default of issue of the legatee for life, or if he die without issue or leaving no issue, is an implication of a bequest to the issue. The intent is that the ultimate legatee is not to take while there is issue of the legatee for life, and hence a gift to such issue is implied."

In Love v. Walker, 59 Or. 95, 115 Pac. 296, testator directed that his estate should be divided into six parts, which he apportioned among his living children and the offspring of deceased children, directing that it should be kept intact, and not distributed until a certain date. In the course of his will he stated that "it was always my purpose to distribute my property equally between my several children and to the heirs of those of my children who had died leaving children or grandchildren." At the time the will was made, one of the sons was a widower, and two children of a deceased daughter were his only living issue. He subsequently remarried. Testator by codicil to his will declared that the devise or legacy to a daughter shall be "for her sole and separate use independent of her husband at all times, and that at her death the said devise or legacy to her shall go to her children share and share alike." He similarly limited the share given to a son; and then, with reference to the share of the son in question, provided: "Third. I hereby will, decree and declare that the devise or legacy in my said will, to my son, Green C. Love, shall be for his sole and separate use, independent of his wife, at all times, and that in case of his death without lawful issue, born alive and living at the time of his death, then the said devise or legacy to him shall belong and go [to] the remaining devisees of my said will in proportion as they hold of the shares or parts of my said will." It was held that, in view of the employment of the term "use" in the codicil, and of its other provisions, it clearly evinced an intent to give the son a life estate only, which deduction was strengthened by the provision of the codicil which treats the premises to be partitioned to him as remaining undiminished at his death; and that his issue took by implication a remainder conditional on their surviving him, with an executory devise over if they should not.

In Scale v. Rawlins [1892] A. C. 342, 66 L. T. N. S. 542, affirming L. R. 45 Ch. Div. 299, a testator gave three houses upon trust to pay the rents and interest to his niece during her life for her separate use, and after her decease, "she leaving no child or children," he gave one of the houses to one nephew and the two others to another. The two nephews were made residuary devisees, so that unless the will was construed either as giving the niece a fee defeasible in event of her dying without children, or as giving her children a remainder by implication, they would, in event of her death leaving children, share equally what, in event of her death without children, was divided between them unequally. It was held that, although such absurdity would follow the construction given, the intention was not sufficiently expressed by the will which would enable the court to give it any other construction.

In Ranelagh v. Ranelagh, 12 Beav. 200, testator gave certain sums of money to his daughters and to his sons during their natural lives, adding: "In case of the decease of any of the above parties without legitimate issue, their, his or her proportions to be divided equally amongst the survivors." In discussing the question whether a gift to the children of the first takers might be implied, Lord Langdale, M. R., said: "The question therefore is whether, as against the residuary legatee, a gift to the children of the particular legatee for life is, in the absence of any expressed gift, to be implied from the circumstance of the gift over being made dependent upon the legatee for life dying without issue living at his death. If the legacy had not been expressly limited to the legatee for life, I apprehend that, in the event which has taken place of the gift over not taking effect, the legatee would have taken the legacy absolutely; the gift to him would not have been defeated, and a gift to the children would not have been implied. In this case the legatee, by the express words of the codicil, takes no interest beyond his life; and if there be no further gift of the legacy, the residuary legatee, who takes subject to all that is not otherwise well given, must be held entitled. The issue of the legatee is named in the codicil only in the description of contingency on which the legacy is given over (Doe ex dem. Barnfield v. Wetton) 2 Bos. & P. 328; and I am unable to find anything which assists in collecting an intention to give to the children. I can collect no particular intention to give this legacy to the residuary legatee, and I cannot answer the question proposed by Sir Thomas Plumer in Ex parte Rogers, 2 Madd. Ch. 449, 17 Revised Rep. 239, why the children were named on the occasion of the gift over. But in that case there seems to have been found some further reason which does not here exist, for inferring an implied gift; and on the whole, my opinion is that the legacy falls into the residue. I think it extremely probable that the testator did mean a benefit to the children; but si voluit non dixit. I think that there is not sufficient to raise the implication, and that the legacy falls into the residue."

In Sparks v. Restal, 24 Beav. 218, it was held that under a bequest to testator's son of an annuity during his natural life, and in case he should die without child or children lawfully begotten, and from and after his decease that being the case, to others, it was held that the son's children took no interest by implication.

In Neighbour v. Thurlow, 28 Beav. 33, testator gave the residue of his property to certain daughters and sons "for their natural lives, namely: They to have the interest during their natural lives, and if any die without leaving issue, in that case to return again for the benefit of my grandchildren to share and share alike." It was held by Sir John Romilly that there was no implied gift to the issue of the testator's three children.

In Bodens v. Watson, Amb. 478, testatrix directed moneys to be laid out in the funds for A during his life, "and if he has no heirs," then to his sister. The lord chancellor held that he could not imply a gift to the issue of A as purchasers, as such an implication was not a necessary one.

In Greene v. Ward, 1 Russ. Ch. 262, testator devised a sum in trust to pay the interest thereof to his son for and during his natural life, "and in case he should marry any woman with £1,000 fortune, then my will and mind is that the said £5,500 be settled upon his wife and the issue of such marriage; but in case of my said son's decease leaving no issue of his body lawfully begotten, then" to others. It was held that no gift to the issue of the son could be implied, Lord Gifford, M. R., saying: "If a sum of money is bequeathed to A B for life, and if he dies leaving no issue, then to another, that does not raise any implication in favor of the issue of A B; though if he dies leaving issue, the gift over does not take effect."

In Re Hayton, 10 L. T. N. S. 336, 4 New Reports, 55, a testatrix gave a sum of money upon trust to pay the interest to her step-daughter during her life, for her separate use, and after her death to pay the said sum to such persons as she should by will appoint, and, in default of such appointment, to the next of kin of the testatrix living at the step-daughter's death. She further directed that in case the step-daughter should die without issue living to attain the age of twenty-one years, the trustee should divide the sum between certain persons. The step-daughter died leaving a son who attained twenty-one, without having exercised the power of appointment. Wood, V. C., said that where a gift is made to a parent absolutely, followed by a gift over in case of his dying without issue, there can be no reason for implying a gift to the children, as the parent has full power over the property and can dispose of it as he pleases; and that even where the parent has only a life estate, he must now hold, on the authority of Cooper v. Pitcher, 16 L. J. Ch. N. S. 24, 4 Hare, 485, 9 Jur. 202, and Greene v. Ward, 1 Russ. Ch. 262, 4 L. J. Ch. 99, 25 Revised Rep. 38, that no gift can be implied in favor of the children. He further remarked that the case more nearly resembled that of a gift to the parent absolutely, inasmuch as the step-daughter had an absolute power of appointment by will; her son therefore could take nothing.

In Seymour v. Kilbee, Ir. L. R. 3 Eq. 33, testator gave annuities to two of his sons "for and during the term of their respective lives," adding, "and in case either of my said sons . . . die without lawful issue in the lifetime of the other, then my will is, and I hereby direct, that the said annuity of £25 shall go to, and be received by, his surviving brother; . . . provided always, and I hereby direct, and my will is, that such of my said sons [names] as shall so become the survivor and entitled to his said brother's annuity of £25 sterling as aforesaid shall and do pay unto my daughter [name] the yearly sum of £20 for and during the term of her natural life; and in case both my said sons [names] should die without leaving any lawful issue them surviving, then I leave and bequeath the said two annuities" to two other sons with benefit of survivorship, provided the one first dying should leave no lawful issue him surviving; the survivor also to pay the yearly sum of £20 to the daughter before mentioned. It was held that no gift to the issue of a son leaving issue surviving could be implied from the gift over only, and that there was nothing else in the will to raise an inference in favor of the issue.

In Bond v. Moore, 236 Ill. 576, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 540, 86 N. E. 386, it was held that a devise to the children of the testatrix's son could not be implied from a gift to him of all the estate during his lifetime, with power of sale over the real estate, "but should he die without children, then the estate, or so much of it as may remain after his reasonable expenses for living, etc., shall go to my nearest relatives, in such proportions as the law in such cases does provide." The position of the majority seems to be that a devise for life, with a gift over on the death of the life tenant without issue, is not of itself sufficient to create a gift by implication to the children of the life tenant, even though aided by the presumption against intestacy; but that such implication can arise only when supported by some other matter appearing in the will raising an inference in favor of the children. In the majority opinion it was said: "When we undertake by construction to arrive at Mrs. Walker's intention in regard to the disposition of her property at her son's death in case he should happen to leave children, we are left entirely without aid from the will itself. It is a case for which she has not provided,—whether unintentionally or purposely we have no means of determining. We may speculate or conjecture as to what may have been in her mind, but we can find no indication in the will itself to enable us to say that she intended her son's children to take the remainder. It is clear that the testatrix intended her son to have the use and benefit of the property during his lifetime, with a certain power of disposition. It is clear that she intended, if he died without children, that her nearest relatives at the time of his death should have what was left of the property. It is equally clear that it is impossible to determine her intention as to the disposition of the property if he had children. She had confidence in him, and did not refuse to give him the fee and limit his interest to a life estate because she feared he would squander the property; for she made him executor of her will without bond, and authorized him alone, and not in conjunction with his coexecutor, to sell the real estate. She is presumed to have known that her son was her only heir, and that, as such, the property would all descend to him after the termination of the life estate, unless she disposed of it by her will. She may have believed that he would use the property for the benefit of his children, should he have any. She knew the property would naturally descend to them as his heirs. The children yet to be born might be deserving or not deserving. Circumstances, as developed by the future, might make an unequal division of the property among the children just and proper, or a diversion of a part of it in another direction desirable. It may be that, upon a consideration of all the circumstances of the situation, the testatrix wished to leave to the discretion of her son the disposition of her property, except in the one event of his dying without children. The will shows that in such contingency she wished to control the disposition of such part of the property as might remain after his reasonable expenses for living were satisfied, and she did so by directing it to go to her nearest relatives. There is no word in the will indicating a desire to interfere with the statutory disposition of the property in the alternative of her son's death having children. She may have desired him to have the use of the property during his life, and, in case of his having children, the power to dispose of it as he might in his own discretion think best for the interest of his family, but have also wished the property, in case he had no children, to go to her relatives. It is possible that the testatrix, in case of her son's death having children, desired them to take the property directly from her, but the will expresses no such wish. It is equally consistent with the will that she desired her son to inherit the fee in such event. Being content with the statutory rule of descent, she made no provision to the contrary. It may be said that it will be presumed that the testatrix intended to dispose of her entire estate, and that the will should be so construed, unless this presumption is rebutted by its provisions. It is true that any reasonable construction of a will, consistent with its terms, will be adopted so as to give it effect to dispose of all the testator's property, and not to leave a part intestate, but this rule cannot be carried to the extent of inserting provisions in the will which the testator failed to insert. Clear words are necessary to disinherit an heir; and, even where the intention is clearly manifested, the heir will take, unless the testator devises the property to someone else. Parsons v. Millar, 189 Ill. 107, 59 N. E. 606; Lawrence v. Smith, 163 Ill. 149, 45 N. E. 259. The court cannot presume a will for a testatrix on mere speculation as to what might have been her intention. It is the intention of the testatrix only so far as she has communicated that intention by her will which is to govern the descent of her estate. The omission to make any gift, in the one case, may have been the intention of the testator as fully as the gift over in the alternative." Carter, J., however, in a vigorous dissenting opinion in which Hand and Farmer, JJ., concurred, criticized the conclusion reached by the majority as manifestly contrary to the plain intent of the testatrix as expressed in the will; as applying to the will a rule of construction which, though supported by English decisions, is opposed by the great weight of authority in this country; and as at variance with earlier utterances of the Illinois supreme court.

In Addison v. Addison, 9 Rich. Eq. 58,

testator gave certain real and personal property to trustees for the sole benefit of a son during his natural life, adding: "But if my said son [name] should die without leaving any child or children or representatives of child or children, in that case my will is that the above property be equally divided between" another son and a daughter "or their children or descendants of child or children." It was held upon the authority of Carr v. Porter, 1 M'Cord, Eq. 78, and M'Lure v. Young, 3 Rich. Eq. 578, that a son of the son took nothing by implication, the court saying, however: "If the testator here, who died before the son Joseph had a child, had foreseen the state of things existing at the son's death, it is probable that he would have expressly provided for that state of things. But the court has no authority to make a will for him, nor to conjecture his intention not expressed, and is limited to the expounding of his will according to the words he has used. Where he designed the issue of his children to take by his gift, as in the case of Mrs. Mims's children, he has endeavored to express his purpose, and has not left the matter to implication. I am unable to find the grounds upon which an estate must be necessarily implied in favor of the son of Joseph." But as it was held that the testator's son Joseph took, under the provision above set forth, a fee conditional in the realty by implication, which would pass to his son, the effect of the decision was not wholly to exclude grandchildren.

In Woodliff v. Duckwall, 19 Ohio C. C. 564, 10 Ohio C. D. 686, testator devised to his daughter, an only child, all his property "during her natural life . . . and if my said daughter dies without living issue then all the property devised by this will, I desire to revert to my brothers and sisters or their heirs equally." It was held (Swing, J., dissenting) that there was no devise by implication of the remainder to the daughter's children, but that she took the remainder by descent, subject to be divested thereof if she died leaving no issue.

A case which, from the nature of the provision involved, is not exactly in point, but which may profitably be noticed, is Barlow v. Barnard, 51 N. J. Eq. 620, 28 Atl. 597, where testator disposed of his property as follows: After giving his wife an estate for life in all his property, with power to use the principal for her support, he provided: "At her death I will it to be kept in the same shape or form, for the support of the children, not of age or married; on the marriage of my four daughters, I will it to be equally divided between the said four girls and the share settled on each of them for their lifetime; all and except one dollar each to my two sons, trusting that they will follow my example of industry to gain what they may require." It was held that, as there was no probability of an intention to give a remainder by implication to the issue of the daughters so strong that an intention contrary to that thus imputed to the testator could not be supposed to have existed in his mind, there was no such implied disposition of the remainder. The court said: "What was the intention of the testator as to this remainder? It can be reached by adopting the view that he did not attempt to make any disposition of his estate beyond the lives of his wife and daughters. It is a fair inference from his will and the circumstances surrounding its execution, that his first care was for his wife for her life; next, to take care of all his children during their minority unless they were provided for by marriage; then to care for his daughters during their lives, providing first for ample support for his unmarried daughter out of the income of his estate. He took better care of his daughters than of his sons during their lives, because he thought it to be wise to make provision so that his sons should follow his example of industry to gain what they might require, but this did not necessarily involve an intention to disinherit them entirely after the primary purposes in his mind had been fully accomplished. That part of the will which gives the sons $1 each was where he was dealing with the income of the estate to be divided in four parts among his four daughters for their lifetime. In disposing of this income he first gives $1 to each of his sons, which is to be all that they are to receive of said income during the life of his daughters. He does not seem to have cared or provided for anything after his daughters had been taken care of during their lives. As between his daughters, he evidently thought that the married ones would have husbands to provide for them primarily, and that if any of them were unmarried, such would have no other source to maintain them except from the income of his estate, so he provided that all of his income necessary for the support of the unmarried daughter should be used for that purpose, and if any was left, that it should be equally divided among his daughters during their lives. There was no reason why he should totally disinherit his sons; such intention is not shown either in the will or by the evidence in the case. He thought his sons were primarily able to take care of themselves, and that they should do so as long as any of his daughters lived. When they were all dead, he no longer had any will as to what was left; he was content to leave that undisposed of,—to be distributed under the intestate laws of the state. This view would not require the court to raise a gift by implication, and it would not require us to find that the father intended to disinherit his sons for the benefit not of his daughters, but for his daughters' children, who might be equally able to gain what they might require by their own industry, as his sons in their old age, or their children."

Decisions affirming the existence of a gift.

See also, in this connection, cases set forth in note 26, supra.

In the much criticized case of Ex parte Rogers, 2 Madd. Ch. 449, testator, who by his will had given a legacy to a niece, made the following codicil: "Whereas by my last will and testament before mentioned, I have bequeathed to my niece Mary Dudley Rogers of Mile End, £1,000, but she having since indiscreetly married, I mean to withdraw that legacy out of her power to dispose of it, or out of the power of her husband to do so; and therefore I order and direct my executors do secure to her my said niece the annual interest of the said £1,000 independently of her said husband, by placing out that said sum in the public fund or government securities, in trust for her my said niece, she to enjoy the interest or dividends during her natural life; and at her decease without child or children, the principal sum with all interest due thereon, to go and be divided between such of her sisters as may be living at the time of her decease, share and share equally alike." The vice chancellor, in holding that the principal was given to the children of the niece by necessary implication, said: "The £1,000, on the death of M. D. Rogers, must belong either,—firstly, to her personal representatives, which these petitioners, her children, are; or, secondly, to the children as such; or thirdly, it must fall in as part of the residue. The question, therefore, is between the children and the residuary legatees. The residuary legatees cannot take, because the residue only after the payment of this legacy was given to them. It could not go to Hester Chambers, because she was only to take if M. D. Rogers died without children. As the testator did not mean to give it to the residuary legatees, and as he did not mean to die intestate as to any part of his property, to whom could it go but to M. D. Rogers or her children? Why mention children if he did not mean them to take? The existence of children was considered as material; so much so that, if there were any, the legacy was not to go over. By necessary implication, the children must be considered as entitled to the £1,000." Other judges have refused to follow this decision. See Dowling v. Dowling, L. R. 1 Ch. 612, 12 Jur. N. S. 720, 15 L. T. N. S. 152, 14 Week. Rep. 1003; Neighbour v. Thurlow, 28 Beav. 33. And Mr. Theobald says that this case probably went too far. Theobald, Wills, p. 737.

In Lethieullier v. Tracy, 3 Atk. 785, it was held that under a testamentary provision that "in case my daughter (to whom testator had in a former part of the will expressly limited an estate for life) shall depart this life without issue of her body living at her decease," such issue took an estate by purchase.

In Wetherell v. Wetherell, 4 Giff. 51, testator directed the annual interest only of his residuary estate to be divided into as many equal parts or shares as there might be children living of certain persons, "share and share alike, as each of the said children come of age," adding: "And in case any one of the said children shall die without any children of their own lawfully begotten, then in that case his or her share of the said annual interest (as the case may be) shall devolve to the surviving children, share and share alike, and so on successively until the whole amount of the said interest of the said residue comes into the hands of the grandchildren and great-grandchildren of" the parents. It was held that there was clearly involved in the provision above quoted a gift by implication to the children of a child.

In Kinsella v. Caffrey, 11 Ir. Ch. Rep. 154, testator gave annuities to two grandnephews to be paid and payable to them for and during their natural lives, and, in case of the death of either of them leaving issue lawfully begotten, to such issue during their respective natural lives, and in case of the death of either of them without lawful issue living at his death, then the annuity of him so dying to go to the survivor for and during the term of his natural life. The question having arisen as to whether there was a gift by implication of the annuity of the one who died without children to the children of the one who died leaving children, it was held that the fact the testator had directed that, in the event of neither of them leaving issue, the bequest should form part of the residuary fund, and the fact that the limitation over was not merely contingent upon dying without children living at his death, but upon the death of such children before attaining the age of twenty-one, there were circumstances in the case sufficient, taken in connection with the gift over, to justify the court in holding that the children of the one who died leaving children were to take the same interest in the annuity of the other on their father's death as was given to them by the will in their father's annuity.

In Champ v. Champ, Ir. L. R. 30 C. L. 72, a marriage settlement was to the use of the intended husband for life, with remainder to his wife for her life, and in case they should both die "without leaving any child or children of the said intended marriage, and they having such, and that all of them should die before they should attain their respective age or ages of twenty-one years or be married," then to others. It was held, upon the authority of Kinsella v. Caffrey, supra, that, as the settlement contained a specific provision for revesting the premises in the grantor upon the happening of certain events, which were wholly different from the events which had taken place, and as the gift over was not confined simply to the dying of the first takers without leaving children, but also to their leaving children and all such children dying before the age of twenty-one or marriage, there was sufficient to raise an implication of a gift to children of the marriage attaining the age of twenty-one.

In Stone v. Franklin, 89 Ga. 195, 15 S. E. 47, the testator directed that certain of his lands should continue in possession of his wife for and during her life, and at her death be equally divided between his two daughters, to be conveyed to them by his executors "for and during their natural lives each, and if they or either of them should die leaving no lawful issue, then the said lands are to go to the rest of my children or their legal representatives." It was held that under this clause of the will, whether construed by itself or in the light of the testamentary scheme disclosed by the whole will, the testator most probably intended the surviving children, if any, of a daughter, to take the fee at her death; the court distinguishing Burton v. Black, 30 Ga. 638; Matthews v. Hudson, 81 Ga. 120, 12 Am. St. Rep. 305, 7 S. E. 286, and other like cases, on the ground that as the estate in each daughter was expressly limited to the duration of her life, she took no fee of any kind, qualified or unqualified; and that as under the statute the words of the limitation over must be taken to import a definite failure of issue, no estate tail could be implied and enlarged into a fee simple.

In Ball v. Phelan, 94 Miss. 293, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 895, 49 So. 956, testator gave to his wife half of his property "to be hers during her natural life, then to go to my daughter, Julia T. Hunt." By the second item of his will he gave his daughter "during the time of her natural life, the other half of my property, both real and personal, to be hers, free from the control of any future husband, and also free from the debts of any future husband, he is to have no title by curtesy, or any other title by reason of her death, or is to inherit it through the death of any child or children they may have or in any other manner whatever." By the third item of his will he provided: "In case my daughter Julia should die without child, or in case the child or children should die before marrying or become of age, then the whole property given to my daughter Julia, all for her life should go" over. The court, after an extensive review of cases bearing on the question, held that there was a devise by implication to the children of the daughter, saying in part: "What, now, are the considerations or circumstances which the court in this case should look to as showing, since Julia's estate was limited strictly to life, a remainder in fee by implication in the children of Julia? Some of them are as follows: First and chiefly, that Julia's interest was limited strictly to her life. This we regard as controlling in the construction of this will. Second, there was an exclusion, by the terms of this will, of all the marital rights of any husband that Julia might have, and especially an exclusion of any right he might have to inherit through the death of any child of his and Julia's. It would have been far more likely, on the doctrine of probabilities, that such husband might inherit from such child if Julia should be held to take a fee in any view, than if she should be limited strictly to a life estate, and the children should only take the fee absolutely after they became of age or married. The father would be much more likely to have died when this latter period came around than while Julia herself might live. Again, the fact that Hunt, by his will, provided that Bettie Hunt Selden, if Julia died without child, or if such child died before marriage or before coming of age, should take the limitation over; and he made the same sort of ulterior limitation as regards Julia Moore Driver, the other ulterior limittee. The carefulness and solicitude and anxiety manifested by Hunt to dispose of his estate, not only for life to Julia, but to provide three ulterior destinations in certain contingencies named, signalize his set purpose not to die intestate as to any part of his estate, and, consequently, his necessarily involved purpose that Julia should never take a fee of any sort of inheritance or purchase from him. And unless there was a limitation by implication to the children of Julia, then upon the coming of age or marrying of any such child, which would cut off the ulterior limitation to others, there would result necessarily an intestacy as to the remainder in fee, and Julia would, of course, take that by descent, and not as a purchaser under the will. This cannot possibly be the proper construction of this will; for in that case there would be nothing to prevent the husband from inheriting from Julia, which was most sedulously and stringently guarded against by this testator. . . . Again, it is impossible to read this will without seeing that it was the manifest purpose of the testator to dispose of his whole estate, and not die intestate as to any part thereof. He did not intend that Julia should take anything by inheritance from him arising out of any partial intestacy. It is to be remembered that the rule laid down by Judge Andrews in Re Vowers, 113 N. Y. 569, 21 N. E. 690, is strong to show that, where the limitation is over to a third person not related to the testator in blood, it is safely to be assumed that he did intend to preserve his bounty for his own blood, if that construction can reasonably be indulged. If the children of Julia were not intended to take a fee in remainder by implication, manifestly this estate went to strangers to the blood of Hunt, the testator. It must also be kept carefully in mind here that the limitation is not simply over to third persons on the default of children, but on that default plus the other contingency, that such children should die under twenty-one years of age or before they marry,—two contingencies in fact. Less than this was held in Kinsella v. Caffrey, 11 Ir. Ch. Rep. 154, to raise the estate by implication."

In Kendall v. Kendall, 36 N. J. Eq. 91, testator gave his residuary estate upon trust to pay to his son and daughters "such sums from time to time as in the judgment of the said trustees shall minister to the wants, necessities and comforts of them severally; and in the case of the death of my said son [name] and of my said daughters [names] and their children without leaving any child or children then surviving, then I give, devise and bequeath all said residue or remainder of my estate real and personal after the death of my wife to my heirs at law bearing the Kendall name." It was held that, as testator evidently did not intend that the property after the death of his children should go to his heirs generally bearing the name of Kendall, unless neither his children's children nor any children of the latter should be living to take the property, but unquestionably intended that at his children's death their children should take the fee in their parents' shares, and if his grandchildren should not be alive, that his great-grand children should take, a devise to them would be implied.

In Lytle v. Beveridge, 58 N. Y. 592, testator by a will, very inartificially expressed, and by which he evidently meant completely to dispose of his property, provided: "I allow my son Joseph to possess by devise of will the farm I now live on [describing it] with all the rights and privileges thereunto belonging as fully and freely as if I had made him a lawful conveyance by full covenant during his natural life, but if he leaves no legitimate heirs then in that case the property according to my will I allow to revert back to my son David, his heirs or assigns forever without hindrance of any person whatsoever as freely and fully as if I had given him a lawful conveyance." He also made provision for Joseph's wife in case she should outlive her husband. At the time the will was made Joseph had been married for several years, but had no children. It was contended that Joseph took the fee by operation of the rule in Shelley's Case, but the court, in holding the phrase "legitimate heirs" to refer to children, and not to heirs generally or issue in indefinite succession, said: "Construing and giving effect to the words 'leaving no legitimate heir' as a definite limitation, and the last two words, 'legitimate heir,' as words of purchase, there is no difficulty in giving full effect to the 'mind and will' of the testator. The law would imply a devise in fee to the children of Joseph living at the time of his death, and thus give effect to the intent to provide for them in case any should be left by, that is, who should survive, Joseph, the first taker, and to limit the estate of Joseph to a life estate, and carry the remainder to David upon the happening of the contingency, which did actually happen, that Joseph died leaving no surviving child. It may be that this construction of the will is subject to criticism, and cases apparently in conflict with it may be found, but the same may be said of any construction which could be put upon a will inartificially drawn, regardless or in ignorance of technical rules, or of the artificial and technical meaning of terms. We believe the construction given is required by the terms and general scope of the will, and the manifested and express intent of the testator."

S. R. 876, 34 N. Y. Supp. 1144, which affirms without opinion, Re Stafford, 11 Misc. 436, 33 N. Y. Supp. 419, testator gave to his two sons, who were his only children and then unmarried, the use and occupancy during their lives of all his real and personal estate, and in case of the death of one of the sons, he gave to the survivor during life the use and occupancy of the whole of the property. He then provided as follows: "After the death of my two sons and their heirs, if they have any, I give my real and personal estate to" sisters and a brother. It was held that as, had the sons died without children, the brother and sisters of the testator would have been their heirs, the heirs of the sons referred to were intended to be the heirs of their body, their lineal descendants; and that as it was not the intention of the testator that his brother and sisters should take until after the death of such descendants, it would seem to follow that such lineal descendants took an estate by implication.

In Clark v. Kittenplan, 63 Misc. 122, 118 N. Y. Supp. 404, testator declared: "I give to my said daughter Charlotte during her natural life [certain premises], and in case of her death before my said daughter Nancy, she leaving no issue or children living to the age of twenty-one years, the said property bequeathed to her to go to my said daughter Nancy during her natural life and after her death to her children living to the age of twenty-one years." It was held that, although an estate was not directly devised to the daughter's children, such a devise must be implied from the language of the provision above quoted.

In Hauser v. Craft, 134 N. C. 319, 46 S. E. 756, where testator devised to a granddaughter a tract of land, "which is to be hers during her natural life only," adding: "And should the said [granddaughter] die without leaving any child or children, then the property which I have given to her to be divided among the rest of my heirs," it was held that the children of the granddaughter took an estate in remainder by implication, the court saying: "It will be observed that Katherine had only a life estate, and therefore at her death all of her interest ceased and determined. The heirs of the testator could not take unless she died without children, because it is expressly provided by the will that they should take only upon the contingency of her dying without leaving children, and the fact that she died leaving children completely devastated the testator's heirs of all right or title in the land. The presumption is that he did not intend to die intestate as to any of his property, and this presumption is strengthened by the very language of the will, which on its face shows that he intended to dispose of all of it. If the estate of Katherine expired at her death, and the heirs cannot take because she left children, who then can take unless it be the children? Holton v. White, 23 N. J. L. 330; Theobald, Wills, p. 569. The implication is not only alone;²⁹ though in such a case they are inclined to do so where the implication is strengthened by other indications,³⁰ such as the fact that the property would pass by descent or by the operation of the residuary clause of the will to the same person who would have been entitled under the limitation over had there been no descendants,³¹ or the addition of other descriptive terms in expressing the con-necessary, but irresistible, that in the situation of the parties as now presented to us, and giving to the will of the testator a natural and reasonable construction, it was intended by him that the plaintiffs should be the objects of his bounty and should take the property in remainder after the death of their mother."

In Bentley v. Kaufman, 12 Phila. 435, testatrix directed her estate to be converted into money and invested, "the interest to be paid to my son Leon Kaufman during his natural life in half-yearly payments for his sole benefit. If my son Leon Kaufman should die without issue it is my desire that the whole amount of my investment be given to the Children's Orphan Asylum." It was held that the foregoing bequest was a gift of the interest to the son for life, and of the principal by necessary implication to his children, and in default of children to the orphan asylum.

In Harkey v. Neville, 70 S. C. 125, 49 S. E. 218, in construing a will by which testator devised property to the widow of his deceased son "for and during her natural life, and in case of her death without issue, then" to others, it was said by Chief Justice Pope, in the course of his discussion of the question whether the first taker's estate for life was enlarged into a conditional fee, that she took only a life estate, unless her issue should be living at her death; in which event the issue of her body then living would receive the estate. But of the three remaining members of the court two merely concurred in the result, while the third expressly dissented from the foregoing statement.

In Conrad v. Quinn, 111 Va. 607, 69 S. E. 952, testator directed the remainder of his estate to be equally divided between his three daughters, to be held in trust for their benefit "to collect the income arising from the same and pay it over to them as their necessities may require and their interest shall appear as long as they shall live. In the event of the death of either of said daughters Ella V. and Sallie M., or both, without issue, then I direct that her or their portion of my estate be distributed equally between my four sons [naming them] or their legal heirs, and in the event of the death of my daughter, Mary L. Gentry, I direct her portion to go to her children." At the time of the death of testator, his daughter Mary L. Gentry was a married woman with children, while his daughters Ella V. and Sallie M. were unmarried. It was held that, as it was manifest from the will that it was the purpose of the testator to make his three daughters equal, and to put them on the same footing as to the character of the estate each was to have, each of them took a life estate 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) which, as to the two unmarried ones, was followed by two remainders in a double aspect, the first to the issue of each living at the date of her death, and the second, failing such issue, to the four sons of the testator.

In Kinsella v. Caffrey, 11 Ir. Ch. Rep. 154, it was said that the authorities may be classed under three heads: First, where there is an indefinite bequest to the parent, and if he die without having or leaving children, to B. In that case it is clear that the children do not take any interest by implication. Secondly, if there is a bequest to the parent for life, and if he die without having or leaving children to B. If the parent dies leaving children, they are not entitled by implication. Thirdly, if, however, in a case such as last mentioned, there are matters on the face of the will to raise an inference in favor of the children, the court is at liberty to consider these circumstances in connection with the bequest over in the event of the parent dying without having or leaving children, although such bequest over by itself is not sufficient to justify the court inferring a gift in favor of the children.

In Devecmon v. Shaw, 70 Md. 219, 16 Atl. 645, it is said that where the children are merely mentioned in the description of the contingency on which the property shall go over, they take nothing by implication. For citation of cases contra, see note 34.

³⁰ In Re Blake, 157 Cal. 448, 108 Pac. 287, it is said that even if it is assumed that the words of limitation over on death "without issue" are insufficient of themselves to raise a gift by implication to the issue, yet that this implication may be drawn from slight circumstances appearing from the will.

tingency, such as "legally to inherit"³³ or the attainment by the issue of the age of twenty-one.³³

In other cases, however, the implication of an intention to give descendants, if any, the remainder, seems to have been drawn from the terms of the contingency alone,³⁴—the argument being, "why mention them if they are not meant to take?" The reply made to this argument is that the courts undertake to give effect only to such intentions as the testator has clearly expressed, and will not enter upon the field of conjecture solely for the purpose of preventing an intestacy,³⁵ even though an intestacy will give the remainder to the tenant for life;³⁶ or even for the purpose of preventing an absurdity.³⁷

The circumstance that a different construction will produce an intestacy is, however, treated in several of the American cases as an important factor.³⁸

Other circumstances which the courts have taken into consideration are whether the denial of a gift by implication will bring about an inequality of distribution among those whom the testator, by his scheme of distribution, appears to have intended to take equally;³⁹ and whether its effect would be, by bringing the remainder within the operation of the residuary clause, to work a disherison of the blood of the testator.⁴⁰

The implication of an intention to give the first taker's children a remainder seems in some cases to have been supported by a reference to them in the primary gift.⁴¹

In Tyler v. Tyler, 5 Ky. L. Rep. 936, it was held that under a devise by a testator to his daughter N. "and her children," and to his daughter F. "and her children," with the proviso that if either of the two daughters should die without children or grandchildren, the property devised to her should go to his surviving daughter and her children, and if both should die and either of them have no children, that the property devised to her should go to the children of his other daughter, the two daughters took a life estate and the children the remainder.

In Cross v. Hoch, 149 Mo. 325, 50 S. W. 786, the testator bequeathed his whole estate to his wife during her natural life, and provided that after her death it should be divided among his children, as to one of whom he made the following provision: "To my daughter Sarah Cross and her heirs I give [certain realty and a negro], provided that the property here devised to Sarah Cross be subject to the trust, care and control of my son, Turner Maddox, for her use, and should the said Sarah Cross given a remainder in the share of their parent, a like gift in a share accruing to survivors upon the death of another member of the class without leaving issue may be implied.⁴² die without children, then said property shall be divided among my other daughters, and if any of—be dead, to their children such portion as their mother would have been entitled to agreeably to this provision. And should any others of my daughters die without children, then their portion is to be divided as provided for in case of my daughter, Sarah Cross." Having thus provided for his daughters, he made provision for his sons, taking similar precautions to keep the share left to each in the family in the event any of them should die without issue. It was held that, construing the will as a whole, testator's daughter Sarah Cross took an estate for life with remainder to her children absolutely, if she left any surviving her, and if not, then to his other daughters or their children, the context showing that the testator used the terms "her heirs" as synonymous with children, and that he did not use the term as one of limitation, as in every other instance in the will where he intended to give any absolute fee simple estate or property to any of his beneficiaries, he simply employed the term "I give" without any words of inheritance or qualification or limitation.

In Myrick v. Heard, 31 Fed. 241, testatrix gave and bequeathed certain real estate "to hold in trust to my niece Abigail Nelson, the daughter of my sister Elizabeth Nelson, and her heirs, and if she, the said Abigail, should die without issue living at her death, then, in default of such issue, to my sister Elizabeth Nelson, the mother of the said Abigail, for life [and] remainder in fee simple to my nephews [naming them]." It was held that the word "heirs" was used as meaning issue; and therefore that the intention of the testatrix was that the niece should take an estate for life, with remainder to her children. This decision seems to have been largely influenced by the consideration that, had the niece been held to take absolutely, her husband, by the law as it then stood, would have been the sole heir, by virtue of his marital rights, to the exclusion of her children.

Where the parent takes, not by words of direct gift, but through a devise to trustees, the courts have manifested the same disposition as where the gift is direct, to construe the gift to the first taker as absolute wherever possible, rather than as one of a life estate with remainder to children.⁴⁴ But a gift of the remainder to children has been any such issue or descendants of issue, then said one-third ($\frac{1}{3}$) share of my said residue estate shall go to the survivor or survivors of said last-named three grandchildren; and I further provide and direct that in case of the death of all three of said last-named grandchildren without either of them leaving such issue or descendants of issue then surviving, then all of said estate hereby provided for such last-named three grandchildren shall descend to my son John H. Witbeck and his heirs at law." One of the grandchildren having died without issue, the question arose as to whether the survivors were absolutely entitled to his share. It was held that, although ordinarily the language used in the will would lead to the conclusion that the surviving grandchildren took an estate in fee determinable upon both dying leaving no issue or descendants of issue, yet, in order to give practical effect to the clearly expressed intention that, in case of the death of all three without either of them leaving such issue or descendants of issue then surviving, the estate should go over, the interest of the survivors in the accruing share should be owned and enjoyed subject to the same restrictions and conditions upon which the original shares were given. This construction was strengthened by a further provision of the will that "in no case shall any part of the real estate left by me for their use and benefit, or the proceeds thereof if sold, be advanced or conveyed to said grandchildren or any one of them during their lifetime."

⁴⁴ In Owen v. Hancock, 1 Head, 563, testator gave to his daughter a negro girl "during her lifetime, and if she should die without any heirs born of her body the said negro girl and her increase to return to my estate and be equally divided among the rest of my children." It was held that the remainder was not given to the daughter's children by implication, but that her life estate became enlarged into a fee upon the birth of a child. In view of the fact that in some cases the circumstance that the husband of the primary legatee would take, by virtue of his marital rights, to the exclusion of her children, has been relied on as ground for implying a gift to the children, it may be noted that such a situation existed in the present case, though it played no part in the discussion.

or children, the trustee should sell the land and make an equal distribution of the proceeds, to be placed in the hands of a trustee of her other children. It was held that the implication of a remainder in behalf of the son's children, while a possible, was not a necessary one, the terms of the will being quite as consistent with an intention on the part of the testatrix to give the absolute fee to her son in case he had children, as to give a life estate only with remainder to such children. The court also pointed out, as indicative of an intention on the part of the testatrix not to diminish the gift to her son in order to provide for his children, the fact that the testatrix made an absolute gift to him of slaves and other personalty; the fact that he was appointed trustee for the other children, showing that there was on her part no want of confidence in his intelligence, discretion, and virtue; and the fact that the gift over was not of the land, but of the proceeds of its sale, showing that she was not swayed by a desire to keep this particular land in the family.

In McCord v. Whitehead, 98 Ga. 381, 25 S. E. 767, testatrix devised her entire estate in trust "that that part or portion that may be set apart for each of my daughters may be made over to trustee or trustees for each of them and their children, and not subject to the debts or contracts of said trustee or any husband with which any of them now have or may hereafter intermarry, and in the event of having no children, such as have none are authorized to devise it in any manner they think proper." It was contended that the superadded words defining what was to become of the property if there were no children implied a fee in remainder in the children, if any. In ruling adversely to this contention, the court said: "Estates by implication are not favored, and every conveyance should be construed to convey the fee unless a less estate is mentioned and limited. 'The law inhibits the construction of lesser estates where no words of limitation are used, . . . and where no such intent appears by clear and necessary words in the instrument.' Here we have a will providing for a daughter and her child in terms which, in the absence of anything further, would create in them a fee simple estate in common; and this is followed by the grant of power to such as have no children to dispose of their portions by will. Why this should reduce the estate of the daughter who had a child, and that of the child, to a life estate in the daughter with remainder to the child, we are unable to see."

In Daniel v. McManama, 1 Bush, 544, where a devise of land in trust for a son was qualified by a provision that "should he not have a legitimate heir from his body living at his death," the estate should be divided between certain trustees for other children of the testator, it was held that the contingent devise over did not operate to reduce his interest to a life estate (with remainder to his children), but that it was a conditional defeasance of the title only, depending on the contingency stated.

In Wurts v. Page, 19 N. J. Eq. 365, testator gave and devised to trustees all his real and personal estate for the use of his eight living children, share and share alike, and of the two children of a deceased daughter, and after providing for the education and maintenance of children during their minority, directed the payment of their portions to the sons and grandson upon attaining a certain age, but directed the portions of his five daughters to be held in trust for their sole use and benefit, and that they should not be in the power of or subject to the debts, control, or management of their husbands. He then provided as follows: "In case of the decease of any of my said children without issue, the share or shares of such so dying is to be merged in the general fund and to be divided as above directed among my said heirs and subject to the aforesaid conditions and restrictions. In case of the decease of either of my grandchildren [naming them] without issue, his or her portion to go to the survivor subject in all respects to the foregoing restrictions and conditions in regard to each. In the case of the decease of both my said grandchildren without issue . . . the share to pass into the general fund of my estate for the joint and equal benefit of my heirs as above directed." It was held that the provision that the share of any child which may die without issue shall merge did not create a limitation over to the issue by implication, such a construction not being necessary to give effect to the intention and object of the testator manifested by his will; but that each daughter took her share absolutely, with two restrictions, that during her life she should have the interest only to her separate use, and that if she died without issue, it should merge in the general fund.

In Ramsay v. DeRemer, 65 Hun, 212, 20 N. Y. Supp. 143, which involved the validity of a bequest in trust for a granddaughter "to be used especially for her interest, and in case she should die without issue, then all such property and interests are to be equally divided among my living children or their heirs," the court said that the provision quoted indicated an intention on the part of the testator that, in case the plaintiff had issue, such issue should take the property, but the context shows that the court did not mean to hold that they would take as purchasers under the will, but by inheritance from their mother, who, it was held, took a fee subject only to be defeated by her dying without issue.

In Williamson v. Tunia, 107 Tenn. 83, 64 S. W. 10, it was held that under a will providing that upon the decease of either of testator's daughters, or his grandson, "without leaving living child or children or descendants of such, then the portion allowed for such child or children or grandchildren so dying without leaving child or living descendants of such, to go in equal implied where the estate of the first taker was incapable of enlargement.⁴⁵

Cases in which the contention that there was a gift of a remainder by implication to the descendants of the first taker has been denied, on the ground that phrase used by the testator in the limitation over imported an indefinite succession, do not, for proportion to the survivors," the daughter took an absolute estate, subject only to the contingency stated, and not merely a life estate with remainder to her children, notwithstanding some expressions in the will (which are not specified in the report of the case) which were relied upon as indicating an intention upon the part of the testator to limit the estate of the daughters, but which the court considered as going only to the extent of vesting the estate in trustees for the use of the daughters, and in trust for the support and maintenance of their children.

Instances in which a gift made directly has been subsequently directed by the testator to be held in trust are not in point here. Some cases of this sort are set forth in other footnotes.

⁴⁵ In King v. King, 168 Ill. 273, 48 N. E. 582, testator gave his residuary estate to his children to be equally divided among those living and the representatives of those deceased, with the exception of the son of a deceased daughter, as to whom the testator provided: "It is my will and desire to vest his portion that he otherwise would receive under this will, in trustees, who shall hold such portion . . . in trust for said William Jones King, and for his wife and child or children, to be paid over to said William Jones King or his wife or children, or such of them as the said trustees, in their discretion, may think proper, so that the said William Jones King and his wife and children may, each of them, at all times have a comfortable support provided for them out of said property so hereby bequeathed to said trustees: Provided, that said property shall not be subject to any debt or debts which may hereafter exist or be created against said William Jones King. And it is my will that in the event of the death of the wife of said William Jones King, and of his leaving no children surviving him, that then and in such case the said trustees, after the death of said William Jones King, shall convey and transfer to my children and their descendants all the estate, both real and personal, then in their hands or remaining undisposed of, to be held by my children in fee and forever, for their own use and benefit." It was held that no equitable fee was vested in William Jones King, his wife and children, but that the plain intention of the testator, evidenced by the general plan of the will, was to devise the trust property after the expiration of the trust to the children of William Jones King should they survive him, the court saying: "Many authorities have been cited and cases commented upon by counsel for appellants upon the question of estates arising by implication under a devise, but an examination of them has shown that they throw but little light upon the question under consideration. Whether a devise to one with a limitation over in case of the death of the first taker without issue conferred an estate tail by implication at common law, so that the entail and remainder could be barred and the estate turned into a fee simple, or whether issue would take as purchasers by implication, affords little aid in the decision of this case. Here there was no estate for life or any other estate vested in William Jones King or his wife or children, but only a right to maintenance. Having no estate, he could not make provision for his issue, and the motive for implying an estate tail in such cases, even if estates tail existed in this state, is wholly absent. It is not denied that the clear intent of the testator, as gathered from the entire scope of his will, must prevail. If there is on the face of the will a plain intention of the testator that the estate should go to the children, it should be so held. Kinsella v. Caffrey, 11 Ir. Ch. Rep. 154. We think the intention of the testator was that the estate should go to the issue of William Jones King, if he left any. The effect of rejecting this construction would be to leave the property undisposed of, which would be against the presumption of law, and to practically disinherit the issue of Mrs. King, daughter of the testator, which we think would utterly defeat his intention."

In Orr v. Yates, 209 Ill. 222, 70 N. E. 731, a testator provided as follows: "I being desirous of providing a competency for my daughter, Mary Maria Yates, and to create a fund that will not be liable for her debts in any manner whatever, and that will secure to her a living, I devise to Jefferson Orr, trustee, [describing the land] said above described tract of land constituting what is commonly known and called the Putz farm, to have and to hold in trust for the sole use and benefit of Mary Maria Yates for and during her natural life; and in the event of the death of the said Mary Maria Yates without child or children or descendants of child, then to have and to hold for the sole use and benefit of Lydia Yates, my wife, if she shall be living, during her natural life, and at the death of Lydia Yates, my wife, and Mary Maria Yates, my daughter (if said Mary Maria Yates dies without child or descendants of child,) the fee to the said last described tract of land known as the Putz place shall be equally divided between my brothers and sisters and their heirs and assigns, as herein provided for the division of my other real estate herein devised, that is to say, in equal parts." The question being raised as to whether a valid trust was constituted by the foregoing provision, the court, in construing the will, said: "The only uncertainty is as to what shall be done with the trust property in case Mary Maria Yates reasons hereinbefore pointed out (note 17, supra), really involve the point under discussion, and are here noted only for the purpose of explaining their bearing, or rather their lack of bearing, upon the subject.⁴⁶

III. Implied gift of contingent remainder, or by way of executory devise.

As above stated, where the parent dies after the testator, but before the gift to him vests in possession, the question may arise whether a gift to his children may be implied from the fact that the property is limited over in default of children, the gift to them in such case taking effect as an alternative contingent remainder or executory devise. The effect of the decisions seems to be that where the gift to the parent is contingent upon survival until the time of distribution, the children will take by implication;⁴⁷ otherwise where the gift dies leaving issue. Will it go to such issue in fee, or will it fall back into the estate as intestate property and descend to the heirs of William H. Yates? Our opinion is that it will vest in the issue of Mary Maria Yates. That seems to be the fair inference from the language used. If she dies without issue, then the trust continues during the life of Lydia Yates and the fee vests in the brothers and sisters. If Mary Maria Yates dies leaving issue, that is clearly the end of the trust, and it seems to be the intention of the testator that the fee shall vest in her issue. This construction is in harmony with the rule of law that where a party disposes of his estate, the presumption is that he intended to dispose of all of it, and courts will so construe the will as to leave no part of the estate as intestate property." But as all persons entitled to be heard on the question had not been made parties, the court declined to decide the question as to where the fee would go in case the first taker should die leaving issue.

⁴⁶In Seybert v. Hibbert, 5 Pa. Super. Ct. 537, it was held that under a devise to the four younger sons of testator "during their natural lifetime to be equally divided amongst them in quantity and quality and providing any of them dies without heirs the share of the deceased shall be divided amongst the surviving ones and at their death to be divided amongst their children and so on from one generation to another," a son took, not an estate for life with remainder to his children by implication, but a fee tail, since the language of the limitation embraces the entire line of descent or lineal succession to the remotest generation.

In Den ex dem. Emans v. Emans, 3 N. J. L. 967, where a testator provided that his daughter Mary "shall be partaker of my whole estate, both real and personal,—provided she leaving an issue, male or female; that is to say, my dear and loving wife is to have full possession as long as she lives. . . . Item—my will is that if my daughter Mary should happen to die leaving no issue, then my loving wife shall have my whole estate, both real and personal. Item,—my will is that the issue, male or female, from the body of my daughter Mary shall be next partaker," it was held that Mary took an estate tail general, and not an estate for life only, with contingent remainder to her issue.

In Nott v. Fitzgibbon, 107 Tenn. 54, 64 S. W. 26, testator devised three tracts of land to his wife and son jointly for life, and provided, as to two of them, that in case the son should die without issue, "or my wife should die," the property should go over; and as to the third tract, that it should go to certain persons after the death of the wife and son. It was held that no estate in the two tracts first mentioned was given by implication to the issue of the son, but that he took what at common law would be an estate tail, which the statute converted into a fee; but that in view of the statute providing that the phrase, "die without issue," shall be presumed to mean a definite failure of issue, the fee taken by the son would be determinable or conditional upon his dying without issue. The reasoning of the court in this case in treating the phrase, "die without issue" as importing an indefinite failure of issue, for the purpose of turning an express life estate into an estate tail by implication, and then applying the statute which provides that such phrase shall be taken to mean a definite failure of issue, for the purpose of turning the fee into a conditional one, seems to be unjustifiable. See discussion of this point in Yocum v. Parker, 67 C. C. A. 227, 134 Fed. 205.

⁴⁷In Re Blake, 157 Cal. 448, 108 Pac. 287, a testator who left as his heirs at law two daughters and a granddaughter, the child of a deceased daughter, gave the residue of his estate in trust to pay over the net income therefrom in equal proportions to his daughters and granddaughter until they should respectively arrive at the age of thirty years, adding: "And as each of my said daughters and granddaughter arrives at the age of thirty years she shall have the right to demand and receive one third of the rest and residue of my said estate as her distributive share thereof, and to have and hold the same to her and her heirs forever, and if either of my said daughters or granddaughter shall die without issue and before she receives her distributive share of my estate, it is my desire that her share of my said estate shall go to the surviving daughter, daughters or granddaughter as the case may be, share and share alike." The two daughters each attained the age of thirty, but the granddaughter died before reaching that age, leaving issue, so that the happening of the event upon which her share of the corpus to the parent is vested in præsenti, enjoyment only being postponed,⁴⁸—in which case the issue take by inheritance.

IV. Substitutional gifts by implication.

Where, the parent having died in the

was given over became impossible. It was contended on behalf of the daughters that the granddaughter was given a contingent remainder only in the corpus of the trust property, which would not vest until she reached the age of thirty years; that, as she never attained that age, the remainder never vested; that no provision was made in the will for the disposition of the corpus of the trust property in the event which actually occurred, and hence that the testator died intestate as to such property, and it descended and should be distributed to his heirs at law. On behalf of the children of the granddaughter, it was contended either that the granddaughter took a vested remainder in fee, defeasible only upon a condition subsequent, namely, her death without issue and before she received her distributive share, the happening of which had now become impossible, and that on her death the corpus of the trust property passed to her heirs; or, if the gift to her was contingent, that there was a devise of such corpus by implication to them as her issue, so that they would take the property as donees or purchasers under the will itself. The court held that the granddaughter took a contingent and not a vested remainder; but that there was a gift to her issue by implication, saying: "While, of course, conjecture and speculation cannot be indulged in to import into the will of a testator something which no language used by him warrants, simply because he seems to have omitted something which it is reasonable to assume should have been provided for, still, when he has used language which can be reasonably interpreted to raise a devise, it should be so construed. Looking at this devise over, it would appear to be absurd to say that while the testator provided that in the event of death 'without issue' of a contingent devisee, a remainder over is to take effect, yet if the contingent devisee leave issue the devise over shall be defeated and without benefit to either parent or child. To defeat attributing to the phrase such a purposeless effect, courts, as said in 1 Jarman on Wills, 'will lay hold of slight circumstances to raise a gift in the child and thereby avoid imputing to the testator so extraordinary an intention as that the devisee or legatee over is to become entitled if the first taker have no child, but that the property is not to go to the child, if there be one, or its parents.' And, as said in Underhill on Wills, § 463: 'The court accordingly will raise an estate by implication in favor of a surviving child upon slight indication of an intention to that effect.' " The arguments employed by the court in support of this conclusion were that such a construction would prevent an lifetime of testator, the question takes the form of whether his issue are substituted by implication, the same difference of opinion as to what will give rise to the implication exists as where the question is whether intestacy; that in the preceding portion of his will, the testator, in providing for the payment of legacies to relatives and friends, specified that (except in two instances) if any of the legatees should die before the testator, the legacies should go to the lineal descendants of such legatees, and that lapsed legacies should revert to his estate,—the inference drawn therefrom being that the testator would be more solicitous for the welfare of his lineal descendants than for the lineal descendants of his friends; that a different construction would produce a gross inequality among his lineal descendants, who by the trust devise are treated with equal favor, the shares taken by the daughters being increased at the expense of the children of the granddaughter; and that it might result in diverting the greater part of the testator's estate away from his line into the hands of strangers.

In Burch v. Burch, 20 Ga. 834, testator gave the whole of his estate to his wife during life or widowhood, and directed that at her death or marriage the whole of the estate should be sold and one-third part thereof divided between his brothers and sisters, to be "to them my said brothers and sisters, share and share alike, forever," adding: "But if either of my said brothers or sisters should decessae leaving no child or children then and in that case my will is that their part of said legacy be equally divided betwixt the whole of my brothers and sisters above named and is to each of them forever." It was held that, as the testator clearly meant to dispose of the whole of his property, and as the limitation over did not take effect where a brother or sister died leaving children, it followed that the child or children of brothers and sisters who died prior to the time when the estate was divided were under the circumstances of the case the manifest objects of the testator's bounty, and took, by necessary implication, the share which their parents would have taken if living. The court said that though legacies by implication are not favored as against the heir at law and residuary legatees, there was no residuary legatee in this case, and that the implication was in favor of the equal provision that the testator intended to make for his heirs at law.

there is an implied gift of a remainder. The English and Canadian cases⁴⁹ hold that no substitutional gift can be implied from the terms of the limitation alone; while the American courts appear to have been more liberally inclined.⁵⁰ And in the share of a son dying after the decease of the testator, but before the termination of the life estate, leaving children, would not vest in such children by implication of law, but that the parent was vested within an immediate absolute interest liable to be devised only upon the contingency of his dying without children.

⁴⁹ In Addison v. Busk, 14 Beav. 459, testatrix gave her residuary personal estate upon trust for J. L., but if he should die in her lifetime without leaving any child or children him surviving, then to another. J. L. died in the lifetime of the testatrix, leaving children, who claimed to be entitled by implication to the bequest, but Sir John Romilly, M. R., said: "I think this case is expressly decided by the authorities, and which render it impossible for me to hold that the children take anything by implication. I cannot give to the same words a different construction when used in relation to a residue from that which I should when applied to a simple legacy. Here the testatrix knew how to express a gift to the children, for she has done it in the case of the real estate. It is possible that some words have been left out, but it is not the province of the court to supply them, and thus make a will for a testator." And this decision was affirmed on appeal, sub nom. Lee v. Busk, 2 De G. M. & G. 810, 22 L. J. Ch. N. S. 97, 16 Jur. 1057.

In Cooper v. Pitcher, 4 Hare, 485, affirmed in 16 L. J. Ch. N. S. 24, testator, who had given a share of a fund to his wife's nephew, afterward made a codicil in which he declared that "in the case of the death of any one or more of my said wife's nephews and nieces in my lifetime without issue the share or shares of and in the said sum of £4,200 of such one or more of them as shall so die in my lifetime without issue shall go and be paid to the survivors or survivor of them in equal proportions." It was held that there was no gift by implication to the issue of the nephew.

In Heron v. Walsh, 3 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 606, it was held that under a devise to sons and daughters, their heirs and assigns lawfully begotten, "and in case of failure of issue then the said property, either real or personal, moneys, goods and chattels, to descend to (another son) his heirs and assigns; and in case of failure of issue of him then unto" testator's brother, those next entitled under the will took the share of a child who died in the lifetime of the testator, to the exclusion of his issue.

⁵⁰ In Burch v. Burch, 20 Ga. 834, testator gave the whole of his estate to his wife during life or widowhood, and directed that at her death or marriage the whole of the estate should be sold and one-third part thereof divided between his brothers and sisters, to be "to them my said brothers and sisters, share and share alike, forever," adding: "But if either of my said brothers and sisters should decease leaving no child or children then and in that case my will is that their part of said legacy be equally divided betwixt the whole of my brothers and sisters above named and is to each of them forever." One of the brothers had died before the will was made leaving children. It was held that, as a different construction would result in an intestacy, the limitation over not taking effect under such circumstances, the children were by necessary implication substituted for their father.

In Denise v. Denise, 37 N. J. Eq. 163, in which the testator gave to each of his seven children an equal share of his residuary estate, further providing: "In case any of my said seven children last named should die without leaving lawful issue, then, in that case, I order that the share of such as may die without issue, to be divided amongst the survivors of the above-named seven of my children, share and share alike," the court, after holding that under such a bequest the legatees take absolutely if they survive to the time of distribution, and that the gift over will take effect only in the event of the death of the legatee before distribution, said: "No bequest, it will be observed, is made to the survivors unless the first legatee dies without leaving lawful issue. It is clear, then, the survivors do not take. The contingency on which they were to take has not happened. Where, then, did the testator intend the shares of such of his children as should die before distribution, leaving issue, should go? It is plain that he did not intend to die intestate as to any part of his estate. He made careful provision for the disposition of the whole of it, and even attempted to provide for contingencies which seemed possible to his mind. A devise or bequest may arise from implication. Any words in a will which manifest an intention to create or give a legacy are sufficient for that purpose. In deciding whether a legacy is given by implication or not, conjecture must not be taken for implication. To create a bequest in that way, the implication on which it is founded must be a necessary one; not natural necessity, but so strong a probability of an intention to give must appear that an intention contrary to that which is imputed to the testator cannot be supposed to have existed in his mind. A construction in favor of a bequest by implication should never be adopted except in cases where, after a careful and full consideration of the whole will, the mind of the judge is convinced that the testator intended to make the bequest. . . . Applying this test to the case in hand, I think it is quite apparent the testator intended that the issue of any of his children who should die before distribution should take that share of his residuary estate which his will gave to their parent. Indeed, the implication in that subjoined case⁵¹ other support for the implication was found.

Instances where the parent, by reason of his death in testator's lifetime, cannot be considered as a member of a class to whom the gift is made⁵² (as in the case of a gift to "surviving children"), appear to turn on that special circumstance, and so to be without bearing on the general question.

regard is not only highly probable, but comes very near absolute certainty."

But in Howell v. Gifford, 64 N. J. Eq. 180, 53 Atl. 1074, it is said of the foregoing case that it appears to go to the verge of the law, and to rest upon no other foundation than the assumption that testator did not intend to die intestate.

In King v. Barker, 3 Bradf. 126, the testator devised the residue of his estate to the children of his deceased brothers, adding: "And should either of the said seven children die before me without leaving any child or other descendant, I hereby give, devise and bequeath the residuary share or portion of the one so dying to her or his surviving brothers or sisters." One of the residuary legatees having died before the testator, leaving children, it was held that there was a substitutional gift by implication to such children.

In Re Disney, 118 App. Div. 378, 103 N. Y. Supp. 391, reversed on another ground in 190 N. Y. 128, 82 N. E. 1093, testator gave his residuary estate to his mother and sister "in equal shares or portions to have and to hold the same absolutely and forever; and in the event of either dying without issue surviving I give, devise and bequeath the share or portion of the one so dying to the survivor." The mother having died in the lifetime of the testator, the question arose whether a moiety of the residue became intestate property. The court expressed the opinion that there was a substitutional gift by implication to the issue of the mother, but found it unnecessary to decide the question.

⁵¹In McClean v. Simpson, Ir. L. R. 19 Eq. 528, testator gave his estate to be divided among nephews and nieces, naming them, adding: "Now if any of the persons named should die before this will takes effect without leaving any children legally to inherit, then his or her share must lapse to the general fund." One of the legatees died in testator's lifetime, leaving children. It was held, although no implication in favor of the children could arise merely from a gift over if one should die without children, that the introduction of the words "legally to inherit," was sufficient to show that the testator contemplated not only that if a legatee should leave children who should also survive the testator, his share was not to go over to the other legatees, but also that such children would "legally inherit," which they could do only by being

V. Summary.

Taking the cases as a whole, it may be said of them that wherever it is possible to construe the gift so as to give the parent an absolute interest, the courts will do so, rather than imply a gift to descendants; but that where the interest taken by the parent is expressly, or by necessary construction, limited to an estate for life, they will be astute to imply a gift of the remainder to his descendants. E. S. O.

substituted for their father so as to prevent the contemplated lapse.

⁵²In Roundtree v. Roundtree, 26 S. C. 450, 2 S. E. 474, testator gave to his wife certain land, slaves, live stock, and tools, "for her own use during her natural life; and at her death it is my will and desire that it all shall be equally divided share, and share alike between my surviving children." It was held that, as a son who died in the lifetime of the testator was not embraced in the term, "surviving children," an intention that his children should take his share by substitution was not shown by a provision that "it is my will and desire that if any of my children should die leaving no issue the property shall revert back and be equally divided between my surviving children."

In Re Coleman, L. R. 4 Ch. Div. 165, the testator devised five houses "unto and to the use of all and every the children of my late brother Joseph Coleman who shall be living at my decease or who shall have died in my lifetime leaving issue living at my death in equal shares as tenants in common in fee simple." He subsequently executed a codicil by which, after reciting that some of the children of Joseph Coleman had lately died without issue, he altered the disposition of one of the houses in question, giving the four remaining houses in the same language employed in the will. Jessel, M. R., said that while it would seem that testator intended to provide somehow for a child who died leaving issue, without knowing how to do it, no gift to the issue of a child dying in the testator's lifetime might be presumed, because the law does not allow that child to be a member of the class comprised in a gift to children.

In Ritter v. Fox, 6 Whart. 99, testator provided: "I also give to every nephew and niece of mine an equal share of my estate. And that if any nephew or niece of mine die, leaving no heir before the division of my estate, then his or her portion shall not be divided among his or her friends, but shall be divided equally among my surviving nephews and nieces. And whereas, there is a suit against Peter Weimer's estate, I pledge the portion of Elizabeth Stichter, formerly Elizabeth Kast, to make good any loss Peter Weimer's estate may sustain by the said lawsuit so far as her portion goes, because I think it unjust that such a suit should have been commenced." Elizabeth Stichter was dead at the time of the making of the will, leaving children. It was held that such children were not entitled to the portion of the estate which would have been coming to their mother had she been living at the death of the testator, the court saying: "It is argued, as he knew the fact of Elizabeth Stichter's death at the time of making his will, he must have supposed that her children would take the share that she would have been entitled to if living, under the following devise and bequest; I also give to every nephew and niece of mine an equal share of my estate; and that if any nephew or niece of mine die, leaving no heir, (no child or issue doubtless was meant) 'before the division of my estate, then his or her portion shall not be divided among his or her friends, but shall be divided equally among my surviving nephews and nieces;' because, unless such was his notion, it is impossible almost to account for the pledge contained in the immediately following sentence, in which, after mentioning that 'there is a suit against Peter Weimer's estate,' he pledges 'the portion of Elizabeth Stichter, formerly Kast, so far as it will go, to make good any loss Peter Weimer's estate may sustain by the said lawsuit, because he thought it unjust that such suit should have been commenced.' If, however, it were possible to imagine that the testator really entertained such an idea, and proof could be made of the fact, it would go to overturn the established rules of law, as also the meaning of the language employed by the testator, which cannot be done. When the testator pledged by his will 'the portion of Elizabeth Stichter,' knowing that she was dead, he pledged what he had and could not give her; though it was competent for him to pledge, as he did, that portion of his estate which she would have taken had she been living; but still that would not show, with any certainty, that he intended her children should take it. There is, therefore no gift either to the mother or the children; and without this, the pledging of the mother's portion, in the manner he has, cannot operate as a gift to the children of so much of the testator's estate. . . . Besides, to allow the plaintiff's claim in the case before us would militate against the intention of the testator, as disclosed by the next clause immediately following that giving to every nephew and niece an equal portion of his estate, whereby he has, in language the meaning of which is free from all ambiguity, and cannot be mistaken, excluded the children of such of his nephews or nieces as were dead at the time of the making his will, from participating as legatees in his estate, unless, as it would seem, expressly designated for that purpose in some part of the sequel. For by that clause he explicitly declares, 'that if any nephew or niece die, leaving no heir (meaning no child or issue) before the division of my estate, then his or her portion shall not be divided among his or her friends, but shall be divided equally among my surviving nephews and nieces,' thus excluding most clearly the children of Elizabeth Stichter, as also those of his nephews or other nieces who were dead at the time of making his will."

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

ISAAC MONTGOMERY et al., Admr., etc., of Isaac Montgomery, Deceased, et al., Appts.,

v.

SOUTHERN MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY.

(242 Pa. 86, 88 Atl. 924.)

Insurance — exemption — locomotive engine.

A clause in a fire insurance policy exempting the insurer from loss by fire from or occasioned by locomotive engines does not exempt from loss from fire communicated by buildings burning on the railroad right of way which were ignited by the sparks from a locomotive engine.

(June 27, 1913.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Lancaster County in favor of defendant non obstante veredicto in an action on a fire insurance policy. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William H. Keller and John A. Coyle, for appellants:

A policy of insurance is a contract to indemnify the assured against loss by fire;

Note. — Scope and effect of clause in fire insurance policy exempting insurer from liability for loss by fire from or occasioned by locomotive engines.

Probably the reason for the insertion in policies of fire insurance of provisions similar to that involved in MONTGOMERY v. SOUTHERN MUT. INS. CO., exempting the insurer from liability for loss sustained by reason of fires started by locomotive engines, is attributable to the enactment of statutes in a number of states taking away the insurer's right of subrogation to the insured's action against railroad companies responsible for fires set by locomotives, causing him loss, and giving to railroads which have paid damages resulting from such fires a right to recover on policies covering the property destroyed. As to the constitutionality of such statutes, see the note accompanying British America Assur. Co. v. Colorado & S. R. Co. 41 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1202, and the later case of Boston Ice Co. v. Boston & M. R. Co. 45 L.R.A. (N.S.) 835.

Whatever may have been the cause of the insertion of these provisions, they appear to be of recent origin, and to have resulted in little litigation.

Their effect being to create an exception in favor of the insurer, the burden, accord-and, as the policy is prepared by the insurance company, it is the rule of law that it shall be most strongly construed against the insurer and in favor of the assured, so as not to defeat without a plain necessity his claim to indemnity, which, it was his object to secure.

It is incumbent on the assured only to prove a loss by fire, and the burden is on the insurance company to prove that it is exempted by the special terms or provisions of the policy.

ing to the general rule applicable to exceptions, rests with the insurer to prove that a particular loss was within the exception (The question as to the burden of proof as to excepted causes is discussed in its relation to life and accident insurance in note to Red Men's Fraternal Acci. Asso. v. Rippey, 50 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1006.)

The elementary rule that where provisions of an insurance policy are ambiguous they are to be construed most strongly against the insurer is clearly applicable to such provisions as those under consideration, by which the insurer seeks, by language of its own choosing, to escape liability.

The decision in MONTGOMERY v. SOUTHERN MUT. INS. CO., holding that a clause exempting the insurer from liability in case of "fire from, or occasioned by, locomotive engines," does not relieve the insurer from liability for a loss from fire communicated to the insured's property by buildings burning on the railroad's right of way, which were ignited by sparks from a locomotive, seems sound.

The insurer, in framing its exclusion, might easily have broadened it in such a manner as to exclude losses resulting directly as well as indirectly from fires started by locomotives; and, not having clearly excepted such risks, it should be held to its contract.

A similar question to that presented in MONTGOMERY v. SOUTHERN MUT. INS. CO. has been involved in cases construing other clauses of fire insurance policies by which the insurer has attempted to reduce its liability, and where a loss has indirectly resulted from the excepted cause.

For such cases involving the liability of the insurer for fire caused by an earthquake, see note to Williamsburgh City F. Ins. Co. v. Willard, 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 103, and the later case of McEvoy v. Security F. Ins. Co. 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 964.

J. T. W.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Isaac Montgomery was the owner of a farm in Eden township, Lancaster county. He died February 27, 1904. On July 1, 1903, the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, under its right of eminent domain, appropriated for a roadbed for its low-grade road a strip of land extending through the said farm for a distance of about 1,500 feet and of a width of about 180 feet. The south line of the right of way passed through a tobacco shed, leaving a portion of it on the company's right of way and the balance on Montgomery's land. In 1905 the railroad company was engaged in constructing its new roadbed; the contractor doing the work being the John Shields Construction Company. Dinkey engines were operated on temporary tracks which ran past the tobacco shed. On August 1, 1905, a fire broke out on the north peak of this building, on the right of way of the railroad company, caused by a spark from one of the dinkey engines. Sparks from the shed set fire to a frame barn and wagon shed located on the land of the plaintiffs, and they were entirely destroyed. In 1865 the Southern Mutual Insurance Company of Lancaster county issued a policy of insurance to Isaac Montgomery, insuring the said buildings. The plaintiffs brought suit against the John Shields Construction Company, alleging that its negligence had caused the fire, and instituted this action against the appellee upon the policy of insurance. The case against the construction company was tried first and a verdict rendered in favor of the plaintiffs. That company was insolvent and a dividend of only $168 was received on the judgment recovered against it, which sum has been credited on the present claim of the appellants. The defense set up in this action was the following section of the by-laws attached to the policy of insurance: "This policy shall cover any direct loss or damage caused by lightning, . . . but will not cover loss or damage by fire happening by means of insurrection of any military or usurped power, or fire from, or occasioned by, locomotive engine or engines." A verdict was returned for the plaintiffs under undisputed facts, but the court subsequently entered judgment for the defendant non obstante veredicto, on the ground that the fire was within the exempting clause.

In the opinion of the court below, directing judgment to be entered for the defendant, the learned president judge said that the question of the plaintiffs' right to judgment on the verdict was not "without difficulty." We were at first of the same impression; but, after due consideration, have concluded that the policy covers the loss sustained, and that judgment should therefore be entered on the verdict.

The exemption of the appellee from liability is not, in express words, for loss by fire directly or indirectly from or occasioned by a locomotive engine or engines, and in determining whether the appellants are entitled to recover it is first important to ascertain what was the intention of the parties to the contract of insurance, as gathered from a reasonable construction of the words used in the exempting clause in the by-laws. These words are to be construed most strongly against the insurer and in favor of the insured, and, in so construing them, reasonable effect is to be given to them so as not to defeat—unless there be an imperative necessity to do so—the indemnity which the insured sought and thought he had secured through the policy of insurance. Franklin F. Ins. Co. v. Updegraff, 43 Pa. 350; Mears v. Humboldt F. Ins. Co. 92 Pa. 15, 37 Am. Rep. 647; Lancaster Silver Plate Co. v. National F. Ins. Co. 170 Pa. 151, 50 Am. St. Rep. 753, 32 Atl. 613; McClure v. Mutual F. Ins. Co. 242 Pa. 59, 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1221, 88 Atl. 921. In so construing the words of the exempting clause the conclusion to be reached from them is that the fire contemplated by them was one directly from or directly occasioned or caused by a locomotive engine or engines.

Instead of a fire caused directly by a locomotive engine, the fire in the present case was caused directly by sparks from a burning building 100 feet distant and entirely disconnected from those that were burned. The proximate and direct cause of the burning of the first building was a spark from an engine, and, if that building had been insured by the appellee under a policy of insurance similar in terms to the one in suit, the owner of the building could, of course, have recovered nothing in an action against the insurance company; but, if buildings hundreds of yards away, located on another farm, had been burned by a spark carried by the winds from the burning building, the owner of such burned buildings could not be denied a recovery in an action against an insurance company, if it had insured the buildings under a policy similar in terms to the one issued by the appellee to Montgomery, for the clause exempting the insurer from liability could not be reasonably so read or understood by anyone as being expressive of any such intention by either party to the contract of insurance. Under the view entertained by the learned court below, the owner of the burned buildings could not recover; nor could there be a recovery by an owner of a house in a town entirely wiped out by fire caused by sparks from a building outside the municipal limits, if such building was set on fire by a spark from a locomotive. If the principle announced by the learned court below—not, however, without some misgiving—be correct, there can be no distinction made between the supposed cases and the one at bar. That the exempting clause in the Montgomery policy should have such an effect as has been given to it by the judgment in the court below could never have been contemplated by insurer or insured, and there is nothing in the clause that requires it to be so construed. On the contrary, as just stated, it contemplates a fire directly from or occasioned directly by an engine.

The case upon which the learned court below seems to have mainly relied in directing judgment for the defendant is Louisiana Mut. Ins. Co. v. Tweed, 7 Wall. 44, 19 L. ed. 65. It must be admitted that what was there held sustained the learned president judge in his view as to what ought to be regarded as the proximate cause of the fire. Tweed brought suit against the insurance company on a policy of insurance against fire which covered certain bales of cotton in a building in Mobile known as the Alabama warehouse. The policy contained a proviso that the insurer should not be liable to make good any loss or damage by fire which might happen or take place "by means of any invasion, insurrection, riot, or civil commotion, or any military or usurped power, explosion, earthquake, or hurricane." During the period covered by the policy an explosion took place in a building known as the Marshall warehouse, situated directly across the street. This explosion threw down the walls of the Alabama warehouse, scattered combustible materials in the street, resulting in an extensive conflagration, embracing several squares of buildings, among which the Alabama warehouse and the cotton stored in it were wholly destroyed. The fire was not communicated directly to the Alabama warehouse from the Marshall warehouse, in which the explosion occurred, but came more immediately from a third building—the Eagle mill—which was itself fired by the explosion. The wind was blowing in a direction from the Eagle mill to the Alabama warehouse, and the whole fire was a continuous one from the explosion. Upon this state of facts the court below held that the principle causa proxima, non remota, spectatur, applied, and that the fire which consumed the cotton did not "happen or take place by means of an explosion." Judgment for the plaintiff was reversed, the Supreme Court of the United States holding that the explosion was the cause of the fire, 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) within the meaning of the policy. Some years afterwards Mr. Justice Miller, who wrote the opinion, in commenting upon it in Scheffer v. Washington City, V. M. & G. S. R. Co. 105 U. S. 249, 26 L. ed. 1070, said: "This case went to the verge of the sound doctrine in holding the explosion to be the proximate cause of the loss of the Alabama warehouse; but it rested on the ground that no other proximate cause was found."

In Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Kerr, 62 Pa. 353, 1 Am. Rep. 431, reference is made to the Tweed Case, not, however, by way of approval, but rather in disapproval of it. In the Kerr Case a warehouse belonging to one Simpson, situated very near the track of the company's road, was set on fire by sparks emitted from a locomotive belonging to the defendant. The burning of the warehouse communicated fire to a hotel situated 39 feet distant, which, at the time, was occupied by the plaintiff. It, with its furniture, stock of liquors and provisions, was consumed, and for this the plaintiff sued and recovered in the court below; the trial judge charging that the defendant was liable by reason of the burning of the hotel, although by fire communicated from the warehouse, if the latter was set on fire by the negligence of the defendant's servants. In holding that this was error and reversing the judgment, we said: "It cannot be denied but that the plaintiff's property was destroyed, but by a secondary cause, namely, the burning of the warehouse. The sparks from the locomotive did not ignite the hotel. They fired the warehouse and the warehouse fired the hotel. They were the remote cause—the cause of the cause of the hotel being burned. As there was an intermediate agent or cause of destruction between the sparks and the destruction of the hotel, it is obvious that that was the proximate cause of its destruction, and the negligent emission of sparks the remote cause. To hold that the act of negligence which destroyed the warehouse destroyed the hotel is to disregard the order of sequences entirely, and would hold good if a row of buildings, a mile long had been destroyed. The cause of destruction of the last, in that case, would be no more remote, within the meaning of the maxim, than that of the first, and yet how many concurring elements of destruction there might be in all of these houses, and no doubt would be, no one can tell. . . . According to the principle asserted, a spark from a steamboat on the Delaware might occasion the destruction of a whole square, although it touched but a single separate structure. . . . A railroad terminating in a city might, by the slightest omission on the part of one of its numerous servants, be made to account for squares burned, the consequence of a spark communicating to a single building." In support of the foregoing Mr. Chief Justice Thompson, who wrote the opinion, cited with approval Ryan v. New York C. R. Co. 35 N. Y. 210, 91 Am. Dec. 49. In that case the defendant, through the carelessness of its servants or through the insufficient conditions of one of its locomotive engines, set fire to its own woodshed, with a large quantity of wood therein. The plaintiff's house, situated some 130 feet from the shed, took fire from the heat and sparks of the burning shed and wood and was entirely consumed. The plaintiff brought suit against the company for his loss. Judgment of nonsuit was affirmed by the court of appeals in an elaborate and exhaustive opinion by Mr. Justice Hunt. After referring to that case, Mr. Chief Justice Thompson, proceeded to say: "But it seems to have been thought that Louisiana Mut. Ins. Co. v. Tweed, 7 Wall. 44, 19 L. ed. 65, conflicts with the above case. I do not think it does, when understood. It was an action on a policy of insurance against fire, in which there was an exception of several matters, viz., invasion, insurrection, military and usurped power, explosion, earthquakes, etc. An explosion took place in a warehouse on the opposite side of the street from the insured property, and scattered fire and burning fragments upon the insured property and destroyed it. The decision of the supreme court was that the loss was within the exception of loss by fire occasioned by explosion. To me it seems that it would have been rather more rational to have held that the destruction was by fire per se. But the court interpreted the terms of the contract of the parties in this way. We must remember that there may be a difference between interpreting the obligation of a contract, and defining liability under the law of social duty. Certain it is the laws are not the same. One does not necessarily rule the other. I may say further that there is no evidence, in the opinion of Mr. Justice Miller, that he had specially in view the same question, so ably discussed by Mr. Justice Hunt, or, if he had, that his investigations extended so far as did those of the last-named judge. He does not even refer to the New York case at all."

Under Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Kerr the appellants are entitled to judgment. But it is said the authority of that case has been somewhat impaired. There is an intimation to that effect in what was said by Mr. Justice Mitchell in Haverly v. State Line & S. R. Co. 135 Pa. 50, 20 Am. St. Rep. 848, 19 Atl. 1013, but it is to be remembered, on the other hand, that the case was cited with approval in Hoag v. Lake Shore & M. 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

S. R. Co. 85 Pa. 293, 27 Am. Rep. 653. It has never been overruled, and we are not inclined to overrule it now, but rather to still regard it as having applied the correct rule to the facts in the case.

The fire which caused the destruction of the property of the plaintiffs was not occasioned or caused by fire from a locomotive engine. It was caused by a spark or sparks from a building which had first been set on fire by a spark from an engine, and, as we are clear that it was not the intention of either insurer or insured, as gathered from the words of the exempting clause of the policy, that such a fire was to be within that clause, it must be without the clause, and the loss occasioned by it is therefore within the general indemnity clause of the policy.

The assignment of error is sustained, the judgment is reversed, and the record remitted, with direction that judgment be entered for the plaintiffs on payment of the jury fee.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT. (In Banc.)

FISHER FLOURING MILLS COMPANY,
Appt.,
v.
C. A. SWANSON, Respt.

(— Wash. —, 137 Pac. 144.)

Monopoly — contract to fix price of commodity — validity.

A contract by the manufacturer of a particular brand of flour sold in a certain market, with retailers, as ancillary to his wholesaling the product to them, that they will maintain a minimum price, is valid if it is necessary to the continued production of his product, involves less than a controlling part of that commodity in the market, and the price fixed is fairly necessary to his protection, and affords only a fair profit to the contracting parties.

Note. — Validity of contract provision seeking to control price at which an article shall be resold.

The question above stated is discussed in the note to Grogan v. Chaffee, 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 395, to which the present note is supplementary.

The decision of the circuit court of appeals in Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co. 90 C. C. A. 579, 164 Fed. 803, which was set forth in the earlier note above referred to, has since been affirmed by the United States Supreme Court in 220 U. S. 373, 55 L. ed. 502, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 376, where it was held that the complainant was not entitled to maintain its APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for King County in defendant's favor in an action brought to enjoin him from selling flour manufactured by plaintiff at less than the retail price fixed in a contract of sale made with the defendant. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Hyman Zettler, with Messrs. Hastings & Stedman and Higgins, Hall, & Halverstadt, for appellant:

The presumption is that the contract is enforceable unless it is made clearly to appear that it is in violation of public policy.

S. App. 152, 70 Fed. 201; Couch v. Hutchinson, 2 Ala. App. 444, 57 So. 75; 9 Cyc. 672, note 30.

The contract is one in restriction of competition.

Phillips v. Iola Portland Cement Co. 61 C. C. A. 19, 125 Fed. 593; Brown v. Rounsavell, 78 Ill. 589; Walter A. Wood Mowing & Reaping Co. v. Greenwood Hardware Co.

system of restrictive contracts, either on the ground that they related to an article manufactured under a secret process, or by virtue of the fact that they related to products of its own manufacture; but that whatever right a manufacturer may have to project his control beyond his own sales must depend not upon an inherent power incident to production and original ownership, but upon agreement. And the court further held that the system of contracts which it was sought to enjoin the defendant from inducing parties thereto to violate operated as a restraint of trade, unlawful both at common law, as imposing an unreasonable restriction, and, as to interstate commerce, under the Sherman anti-trust act. The court, speaking through Mr. Justice Hughes, said: "The present case is not analogous to that of a sale of good will, or of an interest in a business, or of the grant of a right to use a process of manufacture. The complainant has not parted with any interest in its business or instrumentalities of production. It has conferred no right by virtue of which purchasers of its products may compete with it. It retains complete control over the business in which it is engaged, manufacturing what it pleases and fixing such prices for its own sales as it may desire. Nor are we dealing with a single transaction, conceivably unrelated to the public interest. The agreements are designed to maintain prices after the complainant has parted with the title to the articles, and to prevent competition among those who trade in them.

"The bill asserts the importance of a standard retail price, and alleges generally that confusion and damage have resulted from sales at less than the prices fixed. But the advantage of established retail prices primarily concerns the dealers. The enlarged profits which would result from adherence to the established rates would go to them, and not to the complainant. It is through the inability of the favored dealers to realize these profits, on account of the described competition, that the complainant works out its alleged injury. If 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

there be an advantage to a manufacturer in the maintenance of fixed retail prices, the question remains whether it is one which he is entitled to secure by agreements restricting the freedom of trade on the part of dealers who own what they sell. As to this, the complainant can fare no better with its plan of identical contracts than could the dealers themselves if they formed a combination and endeavored to establish the same restrictions, and thus to achieve the same result, by agreement with each other. If the immediate advantage they would thus obtain would not be sufficient to sustain such a direct agreement, the asserted ulterior benefit to the complainant cannot be regarded as sufficient to support its system.

"But agreements or combinations between dealers, having for their sole purpose the destruction of competition and the fixing of prices, are injurious to the public interest and void. They are not saved by the advantages which the participants expect to derive from the enhanced price to the consumer. People v. Sheldon, 139 N. Y. 251, 23 L.R.A. 221, 36 Am. St. Rep. 690, 34 N. "The complainant's plan falls within the principle which condemns contracts of this class. It, in effect, creates a combination for the prohibited purposes. No distinction can properly be made by reason of the particular character of the commodity in question. It is not entitled to special privilege or immunity. It is an article of commerce, and the rules concerning the freedom of trade must be held to apply to it. Nor does the fact that the margin of freedom is reduced by the control of production make the protection of what remains in such a case a negligible matter. And where commodities have passed into the channels of trade and are owned by dealers, the validity of agreements to prevent competition and to maintain prices is not to be determined by the circumstance whether they were produced by several manufacturers or by one, or whether they were previously owned by one or by many. The complainant having sold its product at prices satisfactory to itself, the public is entitled to whatever advantage may be derived from competition in the subsequent traffic."

Mr. Justice Holmes dissented upon the ground that the interests of the public, at least, where the necessities of life are not involved, are not unduly prejudiced by agreements seeking to maintain a fixed retail price, saying: "The only question is whether the law forbids a purchaser to contract with his vendor that he will not sell below a certain price. This is the important question in this case. I suppose that in the case of a single object, such as a painting or a statue, the right of the artist to make such a stipulation hardly would be denied. In other words, I suppose that the reason why the contract is held bad is that it is part of a scheme embracing other similar contracts, each of which applies to a number of similar things, with the object of fixing a general market price. This reason seems to me inadequate, in the case before the court. In the first place, by a slight change in the form of the contract the plaintiff can accomplish the result in a way that would be beyond successful attack; if it should make the retail dealers also agents in law as well as in name, and retain the title until the goods left their hands, I cannot conceive that even the present enthusiasm for regulating the prices to 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) be charged by other people would deny that the owner was acting within his rights. It seems to me that this consideration by itself ought to give us pause.

"But I go farther. There is no statute covering the case; there is no body of precedent that, by ineluctable logic, requires the conclusion to which the court has come. The conclusion is reached by extending a certain conception of public policy to a new sphere. On such matters we are in perilous country. I think that at least it is safe to say that the most enlightened judicial policy is to let people manage their own business in their own way, unless the ground for interference is very clear. What, then, is the ground upon which we interfere in the present case? Of course, it is not the interest of the producer. No one, I judge, cares for that. It hardly can be the interest of subordinate vendors, as there seems to be no particular reason for preferring them to the originator and first vendor of the product. Perhaps it may be assumed to be the interest of the consumers and the public. On that point I confess that I am in a minority as to larger issues than are concerned here. I think that we greatly exaggerate the value and importance to the public of competition in the production or distribution of an article (here it is only distribution) as fixing a fair price. What really fixes that is the competition of conflicting desires. We, none of us, can have as much as we want of all the things that we want. Therefore, we have to choose. As soon as the price of something that we want goes above the point at which we are willing to give up other things to have that, we cease to buy it, and buy something else. Of course, I am speaking of things that we can get along without. There may be necessities that sooner or later must be dealt with like short rations in a shipwreck, but they are not Dr. Miles's medicines. With regard to things like the latter, it seems to me that the point of most profitable returns marks the equilibrium of social desires, and determines the fair price in the only sense in which I can find meaning in those words. The Dr. Miles Medical Company knows better than we do what will enable it to do the best business. We must assume its retail price to be reasonable, for it is so alleged and the case is here on demurrer; so I see nothing to warrant my assuming that the public will not be served best by the company being allowed to carry out its plan. I cannot believe that, in the long run, the public will profit by this court permitting knaves to cut reasonable prices for some ulterior purpose of their own, and thus to impair, if not to destroy, the production and sale of articles which it is assumed to be desirable that the public should be able to get."

The decision of the Supreme Court in the foregoing case is followed without discussion in Kellogg Toasted Corn Flake Co. v. Buck, 208 Fed. 383.

In W. H. Hill Co. v. Gray, 163 Mich. 12, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 327, 127 N. W. 803, the court, adopting the reasoning in John D. Park & Sons Co. v. Hartman, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 135, 82 C. C. A. 158, 153 Fed. 24, held that a system of contracts by which a manufacturer of medicine under a secret formula undertakes to control the retail price by fixing the price at which it shall be sold, and the dealers who may secure it, is void as in restraint of trade.

That the fact that a contract is part of a system of similar or interlocking contracts may show a restraint imposed by it to be an unreasonable one, see discussion in note to Grogan v. Chaffee, 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 395.

In D. Ghirardelli Co. v. Hunsicker, 164 Cal. 355, 128 Pac. 1041, an action to enjoin defendants from selling or offering for sale chocolate manufactured by plaintiffs except at prices fixed by the manufacturer, it was held that the fact that the product was manufactured, prepared, and packed in accordance with secret processes and formulæ was in no way material. So far as the validity of the contract was concerned, the 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

court declared its adherence to its views expressed in Grogan v. Chaffee, supra, distinguishing John D. Park & Sons Co. v. Hartman, supra, and the decision of the United States Supreme Court in Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co. 220 U. S. 373, 55 L. ed. 502, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 376, on the ground that the contracts held invalid in those cases involved the whole supply of the product in question, which was not the situation in the case then before them. It was accordingly held that the stipulation in question was valid, both at common law as being no more than necessary to afford a fair protection to the business of the complainant, and not so large as to interfere with the interests of the public, and under the Cartwright act (Stat. 1907, p. 984), as amended in 1909 (Stat. 1909, p. 593), —especially in view of the proviso in the amendatory act of 1909 that "no agreement, combination, or association shall be deemed to be unlawful, or within the provisions of that act, the object and business of which are to conduct its operations at a reasonable profit."

In Waltham Watch Co. v. Keene, 202 Fed. 225 (affirmed without opinion in 209 Fed. 1007), the court, in discussing the question whether the violation of a so-called license agreement or restriction fixing the price at which plaintiff's product might be resold by dealers constituted infringement of the patent, said that the alleged right under the contract to retake the property on paying to the purchaser the price paid by him in case it is less than that fixed by the patentee or his assignee does not operate to make the sale in the first instance a conditional one which the law will recognize.

That a contract by which a manufacturer constitutes another an exclusive sales agent and fixes the list price of the product does not violate the prohibition of the Sherman act against combinations in restraint of commerce, see Virtue v. Creamery Package Mfg. Co. 227 U. S. 8, 57 L. ed. 393, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 202.

E. S. O.

The complaint alleges, in substance: That the plaintiff is a Washington corporation with its principal place of business at Seattle, where it has erected a large manufacturing plant and installed special machinery for manufacturing a special brand of flour known as "Fisher's Blend of Patent Flour." That the cost of manufacturing this flour is greater than that of ordinary flour. That the plaintiff has widely, and at great expense, advertised this flour as a blended flour, pure, wholesome, and of unusual excellence, and has used certain copyrighted designs and the above tradename to acquaint the public with the flour, so that it has become widely known as of unusual excellence and as of higher price than the ordinary patent flour, and large quantities of it are sold in Seattle and King county. That it is necessary to operate the mill to its full capacity in order to continue the business at a profit. That the flour is sold in all of its markets in constant and keen competition with many other brands of patent flour of all qualities, and the quantity of plaintiff's flour so sold is only a very small part of the pure blended flour and of the quantity of ordinary patent flour sold in each of such markets. That it is necessary to sell the flour through all retail dealers in each community rather than through one or two, as may be profitably done, with ordinary patent flours, so that the good will of the retail dealers is necessary to the success of the company. That in order to keep this good will it is necessary to maintain a minimum retail price offering a reasonable profit to the retailer. That, if the uniform minimum price is not maintained, the reputation of the flour will be injured, the good will of the dealers lost, and the plaintiff will be prevented from operating its mill at a profit. That the defendant conducts a retail grocery store in Seattle, and on or about October 3, 1911, entered into an oral contract with the plaintiff, agreeing to purchase from the plaintiff a carload of this flour at the uniform wholesale price, and further agreeing not to sell the flour at less than a certain minimum retail price. That these prices were the same as the wholesale and retail prices maintained by the plaintiff and its other customers, and permit no more than a reasonable profit. That, according to the contract, the plaintiff delivered an instalment of the flour on this purchase, the defendant accepting therewith a written invoice containing the following stipulation: "Retail prices. Our flour is sold on condition, which is made a part of the consideration of the sale of said goods, that the purchaser, if he retails the same, will maintain our fixed minimum retail selling prices, and if he wholesales them, they are sold subject to the same conditions. Nothing in the above conditions shall prevent the purchaser from fixing the selling price in excess of the above lists when cost of transportation or other local conditions necessitate the same." That, since the delivery of the flour to the defendant, he has violated the agreement by selling the flour at less than the agreed price, and has widely advertised such sales, which price is less than the general retail price of all the other patent flours so sold in Seattle and the state of Washington. That his purpose in so doing is to attract customers to his store, and that he has threatened to continue this practice. That the defendant's action in this respect is causing damage to the plaintiff by injuring the reputation of the flour with the public and destroying its sale to retailers in Seattle and throughout the state. That, by reason of defendant's action, other retailers are threatening to follow his example, which will curtail the sales of the flour and cause irreparable damage to the plaintiff. That it has already decreased the sales of the flour, by rendering it unpopular with the retailers, to the plaintiffs damage in the sum of $1,000. That the plaintiff has no adequate remedy at law. The defendant demurred to the complaint upon the ground that it does not state a cause of action, and that the court has no jurisdiction of the subject-matter. The demurrer was sustained, and the plaintiff electing to stand upon its complaint, the action was dismissed. The plaintiff appeals.

A single question is presented: Has a manufacturer who has given a reputation to particular goods which he creates, the right to fix in his contract of sale to retailers a reasonable minimum price at which those goods shall be sold to consumers?

It may be premised as a postulate that a manufacturer who has imparted a reputation to his goods may lawfully employ any means to secure the legitimate benefits of that reputation not inhibited by statutory enactment or inimical to a sound public policy.

It is not claimed, on the one hand, that the contract in question is inhibited by any statute of this state. No question of interstate commerce is involved. We are therefore not here concerned with the Sherman anti-trust act (act July 2, 1890, chap. 647, 26 Stat. at L. 209, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3200). Nor is it claimed, on the other hand, that the fact that the article sold was under a tradename or in a trade dress, or the fact that it was manufactured by a patented process, affords the contract any immunity from invalidity which it would not otherwise possess. These things must be regarded as immaterial to this discussion. No question of public service corporations is involved. What we shall say has no application to contracts of corporations charged with public functions or duties as such.

The question is thus reduced to the inquiry whether at common law the contract here involved is violative of any canon of public policy. In considering this question, much confusion may be avoided by marking the distinction not always observed in the adjudicated cases between those contracts which, since the earliest history of the law on the subject, have been designated as "contracts in restraint of trade," and those more correctly designated as "contracts in restraint of competition." The term "contracts in restraint of trade" has so long been applied to undertakings not to pursue a particular profession, trade, or business, and has so thoroughly acquired that conventional significance, as to render its use in any other connection confusing. The rules relating to such contracts are of long standing and thoroughly established. Such contracts are valid only when restricted as to time and to place, and when reasonably necessary to the protection of the party in whose interest they are made. Conversely stated, such contracts, when without limit as to time or place, are invalid. Long v. Towl, 42 Mo. 540, 97 Am. Dec. 355. The broader doctrine inhibiting, as contrary to public policy, all contracts which, by any other means, tend unreasonably to restrict competition, is of much more recent development, and is much less thoroughly settled. This doctrine has to do with the rules of public policy relating to control of markets. See note to Harding v. American Glucose Co. 64 L.R.A. 738, 74 Am. St. Rep. 238, 239; Noyes, Intercorporate Relations, § 336; 2 Eddy Combinations, §§ 719, 722; Cooke, Combinations, Monopolies, & Labor Unions, 2d ed. § 160.

This broader doctrine is primarily directed against monopoly in any form, and seeks to protect the public interest by holding invalid all contracts by which monopoly of a given market may be either created or sustained, or, as such, made profitable to its beneficiaries, where the right to make them is not incidental to a legal monopoly such as is accorded by the patent laws. With these last we are not here concerned. It is manifest that in case of such contracts the public interest is not conserved by mere limitations either as to time or space. The public interest can only be secured by a prohibition of all contracts having a tendency to create or foster monopoly by a control of any given market. Noyes, Intercorporate Relations 2d ed. § 357. Since limitations of time and space do not serve as the test of the validity of contracts in restraint of competition, the test must be sought in the reason which underlies the rule of public policy. It must be found in the tendency of the given contract to control the given market. If the contract has that tendency, it is against public policy. If it does not have that tendency, it is not. In applying this test, the public interest is always the first and controlling consideration. A contract or combination creating a general—that is to say, complete—restraint or restriction, however slight, within a given market, is essentially invalid because it must either result from, or tend to produce, a monopoly. Its inevitable tendency is to destroy competition. Under an economic system founded upon competition, every general restriction—that is, every restriction covering all or a controlling fraction of a given commodity—is essentially unreasonable. It is not fairly necessary to the protection of the manufacturer. Having a monopoly, he needs no protection. It is not in any sense beneficial to the public, because it does not tend to create an incentive to increased excellence of product in order to maintain the better price, but, because of the monopoly, has a contrary effect.

And again, when the contract fixing the price is not ancillary to some main lawful contract, the sole object of the contract is to restrain competition and enhance prices, and its only tendency is to control the market. It is therefore invalid because of this tendency, without reference to its reasonableness in other particulars. In such a case, there is no main lawful purpose to subserve which partial restraint is permissible; hence, nothing by which to measure the reasonableness of the restraint. Its only measurable tendency would be to create a monopoly. Such a contract is therefore invalid. United States v. Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. 46 L.R.A. 122, 29 C. C. A. 141, 85 Fed. 271; State v. Duluth Bd. of Trade, 107 Minn. 506, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1260, 121 N. W. 395.

But it does not follow that every contract restraining competition as to an insignificant part of the total of a given commodity in a given market in any degree is obnoxious to public policy. At common law, contracts containing limited restrictions on competition as incidental to some main contract, and not entered into for the sole purpose of suppressing competition or controlling the market, are not always and necessarily invalid. 2 Eddy, Combinations, § 723. "A monopoly created by the Crown seems to have been necessarily illegal, and, subject to the limitations hereafter considered, the same seems true of what is strictly a monopoly; that is, a complete restriction upon competition, resulting from the acts of individuals. But, however it may have been as to restrictions upon competition created by the Crown, it seems clear enough that not all restrictions upon competition resulting from the acts of individuals are illegal. This results from the view that seems to be generally accepted, that the economic effects of a restriction upon competition are not necessarily evil; in other words, that unrestricted competition results in economic evils, capable of prevention or removal by some degree, at least, of restriction upon such competition. A different view of such economic effects has, however, led to judicial declaration in sweeping condemnation of any restriction upon competition, though, as may readily be inferred, there is no decision to that effect." Cooke, Combinations, Monopolies & Labor Unions, § 118. State v. Duluth Bd. of Trade, 107 Minn. 506, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1260, 121 N. W. 395, 410. See also Noyes, Intercorporate Relations 2d ed. § 336; 1 Eddy, Combinations, §§ 307-324, incl.; Herriman v. Menzies, 115 Cal. 16, 35 L.R.A. 318, 56 Am. St. Rep. 81, 44 Pac. 660, 46 Pac. 730; Oakdale Mfg. Co. v. Garst, 18 R. I. 484, 23 L.R.A. 639, 49 Am. St. Rep. 784, 28 Atl. 973; State v. Eastern Coal Co. 29 R. I. 254, 132 Am. St. Rep. 817, 70 Atl. 1, 17 Ann. Cas. 96; Lanyon v. Garden City Sand Co. 223 Ill. 616, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 446, 79 N. E. 313, 7 Ann. Cas. 50.

Partial restrictions have been held valid where the restraint was in different particulars. For example: The contract may limit the vendee's right of sale to a certain territory,—a restriction as to place. Phillips v. Iola Portland Cement Co. 61 C. C. A. 19, 125 Fed. 593. It may provide that the vendee deal exclusively with the vendor, and only in articles of the vendor's manufacture,—a restriction as to person. Brown v. Rounsavell, 78 Ill. 589; Walter A. Wood Mowing & Reaping Co. v. Greenwood Hardware Co. 75 S. C. 378, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 501, 55 S. E. 973, 9 Ann. Cas. 902; Ferris v. American Brewing Co. 155 Ind. 539, 52 L.R.A. 305, 58 N. E. 701; Butterick Pub. Co. v. Fisher, 203 Mass. 122, 133 Am. St. Rep. 283, 89 N. E. 189. Again, the restriction may be as to the price which the retailer must charge for goods purchased from the manufacturer,—the case here involved. Elliman, Sons, & Co. v. Carrington & Son, [1901] 2 Ch. 275, 70 L. J. Ch. N. S. 577, 49 Week. Rep. 532, 84 L. T. N. S. 858; Walsh v. Dwight, 40 App. Div. 513, 58 N. Y. Supp. 91; Grogan v. Caafee, 156 Cal. 611, 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 395, 105 Pac. 745; Com. v. Grinstead, 111 Ky. 203, 56 L.R.A. 709, 63 S. W. 427, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

The foregoing authorities make it clear that the courts now generally recognize as the basis of the rule of public policy against restraints on competition the tendency to create a monopoly. It is manifest that a restriction of competition between the owners of an insignificant part of the entire supply of a given commodity in a given community could not create a monopoly nor injuriously affect the public. It is equally clear that the restriction need not be a complete restriction covering the entire supply of a given commodity in order to injuriously affect the public; but, unless it be held that every restriction is per se illegal, where are we to draw the line? Obviously, the answer must be found in the facts of each particular case. If, considering all of the circumstances, including the character of the business, the necessities of the parties, the existence of other contracts, if any, of the same character, the restriction results or tends to result in a substantial control of the supply or price of a given commodity within a given area by a single dealer or a few dealers, or by what amounts to a combination of all of the dealers, the contract is invalid. Substantial control of a market by one or a few is, of course, as injurious to the public as an absolute control. Wherever, therefore, there exists a monopoly or combination, or the contract creates or tends to create a monopoly or such approximation to monopoly as to practically bar others from entering the field by the chance of failure, a contract fixing retail prices is void as essentially injurious to the public. "It is not essential, however, to the control of the market, within the rule, that it should be complete. Practical control is sufficient; and this does not imply an absolute elimination of competition. On the other hand, a mere restriction of competition does not give control of the market and is not unlawful. The commercial maxim 'competition is the life of trade,' while not adopted as a maxim of jurisprudence, finds a place in many decisions, and the language of the courts is often broad enough to include, as opposed to public policy, every combination in restraint of competition, regardless of degree. But the weight of authority—as well as sound principle—supports the view that every combination restricting competition is not invalid,—that restriction, to be unlawful, while not necessarily amounting to total suppression, must give substantially the control of the market. Just where the line is to be drawn between a lawful and unlawful restriction of competition—just what restriction is practical suppression—must depend largely upon the facts and circumstances of each case. As said in Hoffman v. Brooks, 11 Ohio L. J. 259, a case not officially reported: "Those engaged in any trade or business may, to such limited extent as may be fairly necessary to protect their interests, enter into agreements which will result in diminishing competition and increasing prices. Just the extent to which this may be done the courts have been careful not to define, just as they have refused to set monuments along the line between fairness and fraud." Noyes, Intercorporate Relations, § 356. Cooke, Combinations, Monopolies, & Labor Unions, § 120. As exemplifying that the facts in each case must determine the effect of the contract, and that practical control of the market or any approximation to monopoly marks the line between valid and invalid restrictions, see the following decisions: Herriman v. Menzies, 115 Cal. 16, 35 L.R.A. 318, 56 Am. St. Rep. 81, 44 Pac. 660, 46 Pac. 730; Walsh v. Dwight, 40 App. Div. 513, 58 N. Y. Supp. 91; Oakdale Mfg. Co. v. Garst, 18 R. I. 484, 23 L.R.A. 639, 49 Am. St. Rep. 784, 28 Atl. 973; Phillips v. Iola Portland Cement Co. 61 C. C. A. 19, 125 Fed. 593; Marsh v. Russell, 66 N. Y. 288; Export Lumber Co. v. South Brooklyn Sawmill Co. 54 App. Div. 518, 87 N. Y. Supp. 626; United States v. Nelson (D. C.) 52 Fed. 646; State v. Duluth Bd. of Trade, 107 Minn. 506, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1260, 121 N. W. 395; Meredith v. New Jersey Zink & I. Co. 55 N. J. Eq. 211, 37 Atl. 539.

The fact that the circumstances of each particular case and the situation of the parties, in addition to the effect on the public welfare, must be considered, and that, of all circumstances, the dominant consideration is the welfare of the public, makes it difficult to state by definition, except in the broadest way, any rule for determining the validity of any such contract as that here involved. Perhaps the following is as near a complete definition as we can formulate from the adjudicated cases: Contracts fixing prices as incidental to some main contract, and involving less than a controlling part of a given commodity in a given market, not proceeding from, nor tending to create, or to maintain, a monopoly, will be sustained when the restriction is, under the circumstances of the particular case, reasonable in reference to the interests of the parties, and reasonable in reference to the interests of the public; that is to say, when the price fixed is fairly necessary to the protection of the covenantee, and fair to the public in that it furnishes only a reasonable profit to the contracting parties. Lacking these elements, such contracts are invalid as contrary to public policy. As said by Lord Macnaghten in Nordenfelt v. Maxim-Nordenfelt Guns & Ammunition Co. [1894] 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

A. C. 565: "The true view at the present time, I think, is this: The public have an interest in every person's carrying on his trade freely; so has the individual. All interference with individual liberty of action in trading, and all restraints of trade of themselves, if there is nothing more, are contrary to public policy, and therefore void. That is the general rule. But there are exceptions: Restraint of trade and interference with individual liberty of action may be justified by the special circumstances of a particular case. It is a sufficient justification, and indeed it is the only justification, if the restriction is reasonable;—reasonable, that is, in reference to the interests of the parties concerned and reasonable in reference to the interests of the public, so framed and so guarded as to afford adequate protection to the party in whose favor it is imposed, while at the same time it is in no way injurious to the public." And again, as said by Mr. Justice Hughes in Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co. 220 U. S. 373, 406, 55 L. ed. 502, 518, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 376, 384: "To sustain the restraint, it must be found to be reasonable both with respect to the public and to the parties, and that it is limited to what is fairly necessary, in the circumstances of the particular case, for the protection of the covenantee. Otherwise restraints of trade are void as against public policy."

Measured by our definition, which, as it seems to us, is as stringent as any fair construction of the authorities will sustain, the facts and circumstances as alleged in the complaint disclose no sinister purpose in the contract pleaded, nor any tendency inimical to the public interest. It may be objected that, since protection against general restriction is the basis of the rule of public policy, then if a general restriction is brought about by all, or nearly all, of the dealers in a given commodity in a given area making contracts of the same character with all retailers, the public interest is injuriously affected just as if there were an actual combination or contract creating or approximating a monopoly. The possibility of such a result as a mere coincidence, however, is too remote to furnish a reason for declaring the contracts of a single manufacturer who has no monopoly or approximation thereto void. If a controlling number of manufacturers or wholesale dealers in a given commodity should make identical contracts with the retailers of that locality, it would doubtless be the result of an agreement, secret or otherwise, between them, and all such contracts would be invalid as in aid of a combination in restraint of competition. The coincidence would be almost conclusive evidence of the illegal combination, and sufficient basis for declaring all of the contracts void. No such condition, however, is presented by the record before us.

Such a contract as that here in question is of interest to the public only where the whole of a given commodity, or a measurable approximation to the whole of that commodity, is in the control of one of the contracting parties, or of some combination of which he is a member or which dictates his policy. It is monopoly, either actual or approximate, hence potential, against which the public interest is arrayed, not a fair reward to individual effort and initiative, which is as essential to competition as a competitive price. In the absence of a monopoly, either actual or potential, as above defined, a contract fixing retail prices to the consumer cannot have an effect appreciably inimical to the public interest because it cannot fix prices at an unreasonably high figure without defeating its own purpose by either signally failing to maintain the fixed price, or putting the individual manufacturer out of business. In either case, it fails to restrict competition. Either the consumers will not buy the product at the price fixed or, if they do, the high price will stimulate competition in production and the price will inevitably fall. The given manufacturer will thus be compelled to accept one or the other alternative. He must either fix the price to cover only a reasonable profit, or he must retire from business, and this for the simple reason that, in the absence of a monopoly either actual or potential, of the entire supply, the natural conditions of trade will defeat any attempted restriction of competition. Under our present competitive system, the public is as vitally interested in the maintenance of competition in the excellence of the product as it is in competition in prices. The one is as essential to value received at any price as the other is to a reasonable price for any value. Lacking either, the public will eventually be the loser, either in quality of product or in enhancement of price, which comes to the same thing. No sound public policy will insist upon the complete sacrifice of competition in one of these elements to competition in the other. A monopoly, however, either complete or approximate, tends to the destruction of both; hence is on all scores against public in the hands of one man or a combination policy. But where a given product is not of men, there is no monopoly, either actual or proximate, and the public has no interest hostile to a contract by a single manufacturer among many, intended and reasonably calculated to enable him to maintain an unusual standard of excellence in that part of the aggregate of the given product which he puts out. On the contrary, the public interest, so far as it is touched by the contract, is in sympathy with it, because served by it.

Applying the principles which we have developed from the cases, it seems clear that this contract is valid. The facts alleged negative the idea of any existing monopoly in the appellant, and the contract has no tendency to create one. The retail selling price was fixed merely as ancillary to the contract of sale to the respondent. The fixing of the price was reasonably necessary to protect the appellant, and reasonable as applied to the public, in that it provides only for a fair profit. Fairly considered, the contract, while slightly restricting competition, is primarily intended to promote competition by enabling the appellant to compete with other high grade flours while maintaining the excellence of its product. As said by the supreme court of California in a case closely parallel to that before us (Grogan v. Chaffee, 156 Cal. 611, 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 395, 105 Pac. 745): "Under these circumstances, we see no reason why the contract alleged by the plaintiff should not, as between the parties to it, be held to be valid. It violates no canon of public policy. By its terms the buyer is not precluded from engaging in any lawful trade. He may sell other olive oil at any price and on any conditions satisfactory to him. The producer was, in the first instance, under no obligation to sell his oil, and when he did sell it had the right to exact, as part of the consideration for the sale, a promise by the purchaser that he would not sell it at less than a stipulated price. There is nothing either unreasonable or unlawful in the effort by a manufacturer to maintain a standard price for his goods. It is simply a means of securing the legitimate benefits of the reputation which his product may have attained. Contracts similar to the one under discussion have been considered in a number of cases, and have generally been upheld where, as here, they had no tendency to create a monopoly." After citing and reviewing many authorities, the opinion continues: "The necessary result of what we have said is that the complaint must be held sufficient. It is alleged that the defendant bought oil under an express agreement that he would not sell it at less than given prices, and that he had sold and threatened to sell it at less than such prices. This is a violation of plaintiff's rights under his contract. Whether this contract could be enforced against persons who might come into possession of plaintiff's oil, with notice of the restriction imposed by him on its sale, but without having made any direct agreement to respect such restriction, is a question not here presented. See Garst v. Hall & L. Co. 179 Mass. 588, 55 L.R.A. 631, 61 N. E. 219."

In Walsh v. Dwight, 40 App. Div. 513, 58 N. Y. Supp. 91, the New York supreme court, touching a contract closely analogous to that here involved, said: "It is difficult to see upon what ground it can be claimed that such a contract is illegal. That the defendants would have the right to establish agencies for the sale of their goods, or to employ others to sell them, at such prices as the defendants should designate, cannot be disputed. Nor can it be that a manufacturer of merchandise cannot agree to sell to others upon condition that the vendees, in selling at retail, should charge a specified price for the goods sold, or should sell only the manufactured product of the manufacturer. If a dealer in articles of this kind, for his own advantage, agrees to confine his business to a particular line of goods, or agrees with the manufacturers to charge a particular price for the articles which he sells in his business, such an agreement is not illegal, as in restraint of trade, or as tending to create a monopoly, as there is nothing in the agreement to prevent others from engaging in the business, or the manufacturers of other articles from selling their products to anyone who is willing to buy."

In Com. v. Grinstead, 111 Ky. 203, 56 L.R.A. 709, 63 S. W. 427, notwithstanding the existence of a statute expressly prohibiting any person, firm, or corporation doing business in Kentucky from entering into any pool, trust, combine, agreement, confederation, or understanding with any other person, firm, or corporation for the purpose of regulating, controlling, or fixing prices, the court upheld the plan of fixing minimum retail prices of certain brands of goods of established reputation by contracts between the manufacturer and retailer, on the ground that there was no concerted action among the manufacturers, since the price was fixed by each manufacturer on his own product only.

That the tendency to monopoly, complete or substantial, is the real test in all cases involving the restraint of competition, is demonstrated by cases involving labor unions. Independent of statute, the test of legality as to contracts or combinations in restraint of competition is the same for sellers of merchandise as for sellers of labor. This, so far as we are advised, has never been judicially challenged. "On principle, it is not apparent why the legality of combinations among employees as such should be subjected to any different test from that applied to combinations among employers as such, or among tradesmen as such." Cooke, Combinations, Monopolies & Labor Unions, § 52; 27 Cyc. 904; Herriman v. Menzies, 115 Cal. 16, 35 L.R.A. 318, 56 Am. St. Rep. 81, 44 Pac. 660, 46 Pac. 730; Milwaukee Masons' & Builders' Assn. v. Niezgorowski, 95 Wis. 129, 37 L.R.A. 127, 60 Am. St. Rep. 97, 70 N. W. 166; Gatzow v. Buening, 106 Wis. 1, 49 L.R.A. 475, 80 Am. St. Rep. 1, 81 N. W. 1003; Froelich v. Musicians' Mut. Ben. Assn. 93 Mo. App. 383; O'Brien v. Musical Mut. Protective & Benev. Union, 64 N. J. Eq. 525, 54 Atl. 150; Folsom v. Lewis, 208 Mass. 336, 35 L.R.A. (N.S.) 787, 94 N. E. 316; More v. Bennett, 140 Ill. 69, 15 L.R.A. 361, 33 Am. St. Rep. 216, 29 N. E. 891.

It would seem that the doctrine which would hold the contract here involved a contract or combination in illegal restraint of competition, carried to its logical extent, would render illegal practically every trades union or labor union in the country. The courts should be slow to adopt a rule of such far-reaching results. Such unions or associations for the purpose of maintaining wages are now universally recognized as legal. 24 Cyc. 819 C.

The respondent relies solely upon the following decisions: John D. Park & Sons Co. v. Hartman, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 135, 82 C. C. A. 158, 153 Fed. 24; Bobbs-Merrill Co. v. Straus, 210 U. S. 339, 52 L. ed. 1086, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 722, and Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co. 220 U. S. 373, 55 L. ed. 502, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 376, affirming the decision of the circuit court of appeals in 90 C. C. A. 579, 164 Fed. 803. The decision in John D. Park & Sons Co. v. Hartman is not necessarily in antagonism to the views here expressed. That case involved a monopoly. It holds that there is no such analogy between the statutory monopoly accorded by the patent laws and the monopoly resulting from the sole possession of a trade secret as to make it lawful to protect the latter by contracts or notices fixing the retail price, as is permitted in the case of patented articles. The opinion is devoted largely to a demonstration of the proposition, which we deem unquestionably sound, that the owner of a secret formula for the manufacture of a proprietary medicine, though he may protect the secret by contract against its disclosure, cannot protect the profits resulting from his monopoly in the manufactured article (in that case, Peruna) by contracts or notices fixing a minimum price at which the jobbers and retailers shall sell it. That the effect of the contracts there involved was an absolute prevention of any competition in prices, a complete or general restriction as to Peruna, because of their application to the whole supply of that article on the market, is shown by the opinion, where it is said: "Thus all room for competition between retailers, who supply the public, is made impossible. If these contracts leave any room at any point of the line for the usual play of competition between the dealers in the product marketed by complainant, it is not discoverable. Thus a combination between the manufacturer, the wholesalers, and the retailers to maintain prices and stifle competition has been brought about. It is true that the complainant is not in a combination with other makers of 'Peruna.' There are no others. If there were, there would not be a complete or general restraint; for it might then happen that these others, not being bound by any covenants, could supply the public. If the supply to come from them was adequate for the public demand, the public might be in no wise affected." That the learned judge who wrote the opinion recognized the validity of such contracts as between the actual contracting parties, where no monopoly is involved, and when merely ancillary to some main contract, and reasonably necessary to the protection of the retained business of the covenantee, is also evident from the following language which further distinguishes that case from the one before us: "Looking to the averments of the bill as a whole, and to the scheme of business as disclosed by the contracts themselves, we cannot escape the conclusion that the covenants restricting sales and resales have as their prime object the suppression of competition between those who buy to sell again. Any benefit to the retained business to result from them is manifestly but an incident of the main purpose, which is to benefit his vendees and subvendees by breaking down their competition with each other. Restraints which might be upheld if ancillary to some principal contract cannot be enforced if, when unmasked, they appear to be the main purpose of the contract, and not subordinate. The covenants in the contracts signed by the retailers are not even collateral to any sales by the complainant, but to sales made by the wholesalers. Although they run to the complaint, their prime purpose is neither the protection of the retained business of the complainant nor of the wholesaler, but only to prevent competition between retailers. Covenants protecting the seller of property against the competition of the buyer, by its use against the business retained by the seller, which are upheld if not wider than necessary for that purpose, have been covenants where the main purpose has been to protect the seller himself against competition directed against his retained business." The opinion, when fully considered, fairly recognizes every principle hereinbefore developed from the authorities as sustaining the contract here involved.

In Bobbs-Merrill Co. v. Straus, it was held that the sole right to vend a copyrighted book secured by the United States statute to the owner of the copyright does not include the right to impose, by a mere notice printed on the same page with the notice of copyright, a limitation as to the price at which the book shall be sold at retail by future purchasers with whom there is no privity of contract. The distinction from the case in hand is too plain to require further comment.

Nor do we deem the decision of the United States Supreme Court in Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co. controlling on the facts here presented. In that case, the bill alleged the manufacture of certain proprietary medicines under secret formulae and processes, and the sale thereof under trade marks and trade dress; that, to prevent injury to its business by the sale of its medicines at cut prices, complainant had adopted a dual system of contracts controlling the sale and resale of its product; that the system contemplated consignments to wholesale dealers, permitting them to sell only to other contracting wholesale dealers and retail dealers who had also contracted with the complainant to sell its goods at fixed prices; that the defendant, refusing to enter into a consignment contract, had induced complainant's wholesale and retail agents, by means of fraudulent representations, to violate their contracts and sell goods of complainant's manufacture to the defendant, with the intention of selling such goods at cut rates to attract customers for other merchandise. An injunction against this practice was sought. It appeared that consignment contracts had been made with over 400 jobbers and wholesalers, and retail agency contracts with 25,000 retail dealers in the United States. The court refused relief on the ground that, by its system of interlocking restrictions, complainant sought to control not only the prices at which its agents might sell its product, but the prices for all sales by all dealers at wholesale or retail, whether purchasers or subpurchasers, and thus fix the amount which the consumer shall pay, eliminating all competition. The court held that such a system amounts to a restraint of trade, and is invalid both at common law and under the Sherman anti-trust act. It will be noted that the system there involved had no purpose save to create and perpetuate a monopoly which, under any view of the authorities, is invalid. While certain expressions in the opinion might appear contrary to the views we have expressed, the opinion expressly states that the mere fact that some restraint results does not necessarily render the contract invalid, and clearly recognizes the principles upon which the contract here involved must be held valid. Mr. Justice Hughes, speaking for the court, uses the following language: "With respect to contracts in restraint of trade, the earlier doctrine of the common law has been substantially modified in the adaptation to modern conditions. But the public interest is still the first consideration. To sustain the restraint, it must be found to be reasonable both with respect to the public and to the parties, and that it is limited to what is fairly necessary, in the circumstances of the particular case, for the protection of the covenantee. Otherwise restraints of trade are void as against public policy. As was said by this court in Gibbs v. Consolidated Gas Co. 130 U. S. 409, 32 L. ed. 984, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 553: 'The decision in Mitchel v. Reynolds, 1 P. Wms. 181, s. c., Smith, Lead. Cas. 7th Eng. ed. 407, 8th Am. ed. 756, is the foundation of the rule in relation to the invalidity of contracts in restraint of trade; but as it was made under a condition of things, and a state of society, different from those which now prevail, the rule laid down is not regarded as inflexible, and has been considerably modified. Public welfare is first considered, and if it be not involved, and the restraint upon one party is not greater than protection to the other party requires, the contract may be sustained. The question is whether, under the particular circumstances of the case and the nature of the particular contract involved in it, the contract is or is not unreasonable. Rousillon v. Rousillon, L. R. 14 Ch. Div. 351, 49 L. J. Ch. N. S. 338, 42 L. T. N. S. 679, 28 Week. Rep. 623, 44 J. P. 663; Leather Cloth Co. v. Lonsont, L. R. 9 Eq. 345, 39 L. J. Ch. N. S. 86, 21 L. T. N. S. 661, 18 Week. Rep. 572.'"

The cases upon which the respondent relies are all reviewed and distinguished from a case such as that here presented, in D. Ghirardelli Co. v. Hunsicker, 164 Cal. 355, 128 Pac. 1041.

We do not hold that a mere notice printed on the packages or bill of lading, in the absence of express contract to be bound by such notice, would be sufficient to create a valid restriction of the sale price, however unobjectionable. We do not hold that a manufacturer would have the right by any such notice to pursue his product into the hands of third parties and fix their selling price. The right, where it can be exercised at all, rests in contract, and it would seem that the contract should only be held binding upon the parties to it, except where the breaking of the contract is induced by the fraud of the third party. As observed in Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co. 220 U. S. 373, 55 L. ed. 502, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 376: "Whatever right the manufacturer may have to project his control beyond his own sales must depend not upon an inherent power incident to production and original ownership, but upon agreement." See also Garst v. Hall & L. Co. 179 Mass. 588, 55 L.R.A. 631, 61 N. E. 219, and Bobbs-Merrill Co. v. Straus, 210 U. S. 339, 52 L. ed. 1086, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 722.

Finally, it seems to us an economic fallacy to assume that the competition which, in the absence of monopoly, benefits the public, is competition between rival retailers. The true competition is between rival articles, a competition in excellence, which can never be maintained if, through the perfidy of the retailer who cuts prices for his own ulterior purposes, the manufacturer is forced to compete in prices with goods of his own production, while the retailer recoups his losses on the cut price by the sale of other articles at, or above, their reasonable price. It is a fallacy to assume that the price cutter pockets the loss. The public makes it up on other purchases. The manufacturer alone is injured, except as the public is also injured through the manufacturer's inability, in the face of cut prices, to maintain the excellence of his product. Fixing the price on all brands of high grade flour is a very different thing from fixing the price on one brand of high grade flour. The one means destruction of all competition and of all incentive to increased excellence. The other means heightened competition and intensified incentive to increased excellence. It will not do to say that the manufacturer has no interest to protect by contract in the goods after he has sold them. They are personally identified and morally guaranteed by his mark and his advertisement. Mazetti v. Armour & Co. 75 Wash. 622, 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 213, 135 Pac. 633. His reputation as a manufacturer, one of his chief assets, is bound up in them. The attitude of the respondent, who has wilfully violated his contract, presents no equities in his favor. The allegations of the complaint show that the public interest will in no wise suffer from an enforcement of the contract. As between the parties, the appellant is entitled to the relief for which he prays.

The judgment is reversed.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.
(Department No. 1.)

ALICE V. ROBINSON, Appt.,

v.

EDWARD ROBINSON, Resp't.

(— Wash. —, 138 Pac. 288.)

Divorce — collusion — vacating.

1. A decree of divorce secured by collusion will not be vacated at the instance of petitioner, in the absence of duress.

Duress — divorce — representation of embarrassment.

2. Representations by a man that his wife's refusal to secure a divorce from him greatly embarrasses him in his business, and that her continued refusal will compel him to leave the state, are not such duress as to entitle her to a vacation of a collusive decree secured in consequence thereof.

Divorce — perjury — vacation.

3. The fact that a divorce decree is founded on perjury affords no ground for vacating it.

Same — insufficient evidence.

4. Insufficiency of evidence is no ground for vacating a divorce decree.

(February 4, 1914:)

APPEAL by petitioner from a judgment of the Superior Court for Spokane County sustaining a demurrer to a petition filed to vacate a decree of divorce. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. F. W. Girard and Robertson & Miller for appellant.

Messrs. Post, Avery, & Higgins for respondent.

Note. — Right of party obtaining or consenting to divorce to contest its validity.

This note is supplementary to the note to Karren v. Karren, 60 L.R.A. 294, and is the same in its scope as that note, and contains the cases decided since the preparation thereof.

As to the right of third persons to have a decree of divorce set aside, see subdivision "I. Decree of divorce," of note to Tyler v. Aspinwall, 54 L.R.A. 758, upon the general question as to who may sue or take other proceedings to set aside judgments against other parties.

Direct attack by party obtaining divorce.

Supplementing note in 60 L.R.A. 294.

The few recent cases, as ROBINSON v. ROBINSON, are in accord with the clear weight of authority among the earlier cases, as appears from the earlier note, to the effect that no relief will be granted upon a direct application by one who has voluntarily obtained a divorce, to have it set aside for any cause.

Thus, a wife who has obtained a decree of divorce in an action brought by her against her husband cannot contest the validity of the decree; and a decree made seven years later by the same court which granted the divorce, purporting to set aside the divorce decree upon the wife's application and upon the husband's default, without having ever obtained jurisdiction of his person, is of no effect, as against him, to change her status as fixed by the decree of divorce, or to restore her former status as his wife. Buxbaum v. Mason, 48 Misc. 396, 95 N. Y. Supp. 539.

But, as in cases where a husband has obtained a decree of divorce in his wife's name without her knowledge or consent (see note in 60 L.R.A. 296), it has been held that a wife in whose favor a decree of divorce has been granted against her husband is entitled to have the decree set aside upon motion, where her bringing of the action for a divorce was coerced by her husband, and the decree obtained through fraud and duress on his part. Lake v. Lake, 124 App. Div. 89, 108 N. Y. Supp. 964.

Direct attack by party who has consented to or colluded in procurement of divorce — consent.

A husband who, pursuant to an agreement, has consented to a decree of divorce in favor of his wife, and has received a large sum of money in consideration thereof, and in full payment of all his right, title, and interest in and to her estate, cannot, after her death, prosecute a writ of error to a reversal of the decree for the sole purpose of permitting him, as her husband, to procure a further share of her estate. Mallory v. Mallory, 160 Ill. App. 417. (Generally, as to the right to contest the validity of a divorce decree after the death of one or both of the parties, see notes in 57 L.R.A. 583, and 44 L.R.A. (N.S.) 505.)

And a wife who, in consideration of a certain sum of money to her paid and certain promises made by her husband, has consented to his taking a decree of divorce against her upon his cross petition in a suit brought by her for a divorce, cannot, upon his failure to perform his promises, maintain an action to set aside the decree of divorce on the ground of fraud. New-

Gose, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a petition to vacate a decree of divorce entered at the suit of the petitioner. The decree was entered on the 16th day of April, 1912. Nearly ten months later, and on February 4, 1913, the petitioner, the plaintiff in the divorce suit, filed her petition to vacate the decree. A general demurrer to the petition was sustained. The petitioner has appealed.

The petition is too lengthy to be reproduced in full. It alleges, in substance, that the appellant was married to the respondent in October, 1900; that they lived together as husband and wife until the date of the entry of the decree, except during brief intervals when the respondent was away from his home through the inducement and solicitation of one Ethel Irving, with whom he became infatuated in the spring of 1910; that in the month of May, 1911, the respondent, because of his infatuation for Ethel Irving, and at her instigation, brought an action against the appellant for a divorce on the ground of desertion, which he thereafter dismissed because there was no ground for his complaint; that a short time thereafter the respondent, who is a lawyer, commenced to urge and persuade the appellant to apply for and obtain a divorce from him on the ground of desertion, "in order that he might marry the said Ethel Irving;" that he told her that her refusal to comply with his request and secure a divorce "was occasioning him great inconvenience and annoyance in a business way, and he would be ruined financially as well as lose his standing with his friends, employers, and business associates;" that he repeatedly told her that the application would be only a formal matter; that, as soon as the six months' limitation expired after she had secured the decree, "he would remarry her," and in the meantime would straighten up his business affairs; that they could then resume the marital relations; that she frequently inquired of him in what manner his marriage embarrassed him; that he always answered that he could not tell her, "and asked her if she could not believe him and trust him;" that the respondent often told man v. Newman, 27 Okla. 381, 112 Pac. 1007.

Nor can a wife who, in consideration of a sum of money to be paid to her, consented to her husband's obtaining a divorce without any defense by her, maintain an action to set aside the decree, where the former husband has failed to pay the amounts he promised,—especially where she has delayed action for five years, and the husband has in the meantime remarried and had issue by that marriage. Whitley v. Whitley, 60 Misc. 201, 111 N. Y. Supp. 1078.

Supplementing note in 60 L.R.A. 297.

In McDonald v. McDonald, 175 Mo. App. 513, 101 S. W. 850, a suit by a wife to have a divorce decree obtained against her by her husband annulled by reason of fraud on his part in its procurement, although she does not seem to have consented to, or even to have colluded in the obtaining of, the decree, the court said that, conceding that it was shown that she was willing to or did collude in allowing the divorce to be granted, this fact furnished no reason why the court, representing the state, should not set aside the decree because of fraud and collusion in a suit of the character of the one under consideration, where no innocent third parties would be affected by the decision.

Collateral attack—by party obtaining divorce.

The later cases are in accord with the cases cited in the earlier note, holding that the party who obtains a decree of divorce cannot assail it collaterally. 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Thus, a wife who permitted her husband and his attorney to institute in her name proceedings against the husband for a divorce, whereupon a decree in her favor was collusively obtained, is not entitled, after the death of the husband, to attack the decree in a collateral proceeding for the purpose of acquiring the property of the decedent, as his widow. Johnson v. Johnson, — Ala. —, 62 So. 706.

So, a wife who obtained a divorce from her husband upon a cross petition filed in a suit brought by him against her in another state in which neither of the parties resided, but to which he had gone for the purpose of obtaining a divorce, cannot contest the validity of the decree, for lack of jurisdiction, in an action subsequently brought by her in the state of their residence for the alienation of her husband's affections. Bledsoe v. Seaman, 77 Kan. 679, 95 Pac. 576.

In Fitz Allan v. Rieutord, 6 Quebec Pr. Rep. 111, it was held that a woman who has obtained a divorce from her husband and has remarried cannot question the validity of the divorce, after the death of her first husband, by claiming to be his widow, unless the second marriage has been declared void.

And in Goodwin v. Goodwin, 158 App. Div. 171, 142 N. Y. Supp. 1102, it was held that a husband who had obtained a judgment for separation against his wife, based upon his affirmation and the court's finding of the validity of their marriage, could not contest the validity of that finding, in a subsequent action to annul the marriage on the ground that it was invalid.

A decree of divorce obtained by a wife in an action brought by her against her husband fixes her status, and she cannot assert her that, if she did not commence an action for and secure a divorce from him, he would be compelled to leave the state; that she would never hear from him again; that he would give no financial aid to her and to the children; but that, if she would get a divorce, his financial difficulties would soon be satisfactorily adjusted; that he told her that he would employ an attorney to represent her; that he would make default; and that he would make provision for the support of herself and their children until their remarriage. It is further alleged that, after the respondent had pleaded with the appellant for a number of months, "and after talking with one of his lawyers," who assured her that the respondent was greatly embarrassed in a financial way by reason of her refusal to apply for a divorce, and being overpersuaded, she finally consented to go before the court "and tell the situation to the court just as it was, at the same time protesting that she did not want a divorce; that she had no grounds therefor; that she did not believe that a decree would be granted;" that she was advised by the respondent that, in order to get a divorce, "it would be necessary for her to go to the attorney whom he had selected and would pay, and have him present the matter for her;" that pursuant to the "arrangement" she instituted an action for divorce; that the respondent defaulted, and that on the 16th day of April, 1912, a decree of divorce was entered. She further alleges that the facts stated in her complaint and testified to at the trial did not justify a divorce on the ground of desertion; that, although she and the respondent sustained the marital relation subsequent to the bringing of the action, she did not testify to that fact; that the findings of the court in the divorce action, which are made a part of the petition, are not in accordance with the evidence adduced at the trial and are not supported by the evidence; that at the trial she did not state that she wanted a divorce, but only stated "that she wanted to do what was best for the children;" that the trial court did not believe there was any ground for divorce, and continued the hearing until the afternoon; that the court was then not satisfied of the sufficiency of the evidence to warrant a decree; that he called counsel for the appellant; and the prosecuting attorney to the bench, and the attorney for the appellant stated to the court that he and the attorney for the respondent had been endeavoring for a number of months to bring about a reconciliation, but that they were unable to do so, and expressed the opinion that the appellant and the respondent could no longer live together as husband and wife; that after this statement the court granted the decree; that the statement made by counsel for the appellant "was not the fact;" that the appellant did not desire a divorce, but that she applied for it because of the solicitation of the respondent and because of the representations made by him and one of his attorneys; that she did not know or have reason to believe at such time "that a fraud was being practised upon her or the court;"

the contrary, for the purpose of rendering the husband liable for necessities thereafter furnished to her, notwithstanding he may be in a position to assail the decree for lack of jurisdiction as to him. Buxbaum v. Mason, 48 Misc. 396, 95 N. Y. Supp. 539.

A husband who has left his wife and obtained in another state a decree of divorce against her, and has then returned and married another woman, cannot contest the validity of the divorce on the ground that the court which rendered it had no jurisdiction of the parties, in a subsequent proceeding to compel him to support the second wife. People ex rel. Shradly v. Shradly, 47 Misc. 333, 95 N. Y. Supp. 991.

So, a wife who has obtained in another jurisdiction a decree of divorce against her husband upon constructive service of process cannot contest the validity of that decree, in a subsequent proceeding in the state of their matrimonial domicile, based upon the continued existence of the marital relation. Gibson v. Gibson, 81 Misc. 508, 143 N. Y. Supp. 37 (suit by wife in New York for separation); Simmonds v. Simmonds, 78 Misc. 571, 138 N. Y. Supp. 639 (suit by wife in New York for divorce on ground of former husband's adultery with a woman 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) whom he married in reliance on the former decree).

—by party who has consented to, or colluded in, procurement of divorce.

Supplementing note in 60 L.R.A. 305.

A husband who counseled with and employed the attorney who brought a divorce suit for his wife against him, and colluded in the obtaining of a decree in her favor, adjudging him to be the guilty party, cannot contest the validity of the decree when it is pleaded in defense to an action brought by him for the alienation of his wife's affections. Hamilton v. McNeill, 150 Iowa, 470, 129 N. W. 480, Ann Cas. 1912D, 604.

In Friebe v. Elder, — Ind. —, 105 N. E. 151, an action for partition brought by a divorced wife, after the death of her former husband, on the theory that the divorce decree was absolutely void, and that she was the widow of the decedent, the court said: "The complaint might possibly warrant an inference that there was collusion between the husband and wife in the procurement of the decree; but, if such inference were permissible, it would not result in rendering the decree void, on a collateral attack by either party." A. C. W.

that she was informed and believes that the decree "was obtained by collusion;" that the respondent had a good defense to the action; that he had not in fact deserted her, but had during the pendency of the suit sustained the marriage relation with her, and was supporting her and the children.

In the divorce suit, the court expressly found that the respondent deserted the petitioner in the month of July, 1909; that he had since that time refused to live with her, and that during all of said time he had lived separate and apart from her, against her will, and without her consent. The divorce decree recites that the prosecuting attorney of Spokane county appeared on behalf of the state and resisted the action. The decree awarded to the appellant the custody of the four minor children, and directed the respondent to pay her the sum of $200 per month, payable monthly, for the support and maintenance of herself and the minor children, until the further order of the court.

We think the demurrer was properly sustained. There is no allegation that the appellant was feeble in mind or body, or that she stated the real facts to her attorneys or to the court. In short, the petition shows nothing but a collusive arrangement for a divorce. She alleges that she finally consented to go before the court "and tell the situation to the court just as it was." There is no allegation that she did this. Indeed, the inference is either that the facts alleged in her petition are false, or that she testified falsely, or suppressed material facts in the trial of the divorce suit. The gist of her petition is that her husband, who had theretofore commenced a divorce suit against her on the ground of desertion, which he had dismissed, represented to her that the marriage embarrassed him in his business relations; that, while both of the parties knew there was no ground for divorce, he represented that, if she would obtain a divorce, he would get his business affairs adjusted within six months and remarry her.

The appellant relies upon Graham v. Graham, 54 Wash. 70, 102 Pac. 891, 18 Ann. Cas. 999; Pringle v. Pringle, 55 Wash. 93, 104 Pac. 135, and McDonald v. McDonald, 34 Wash. 293, 75 Pac. 865, from this jurisdiction, and Danforth v. Danforth, 105 Ill. 603, and Winder v. Winder, 86 Neb. 495, 125 N. W. 1095, from other jurisdictions. The case at bar has little in common with any of these cases.

In the Graham Case a decree of divorce was entered at the suit of the husband on the 1st day of September, 1908. On the 1st day of October following, the wife filed her petition, praying for an order vacating the decree, and for permission to withdraw her answer and defend the suit. She alleged in her petition that prior to November, 1907, the marriage relation had been most amicable; that from that time the husband began to grow cold and distant; that in June, 1908, he requested her to procure a divorce, which she refused to do; that his inattention and neglect then became more marked, until finally, with intent to deceive her as to his real motive, he more than once threatened to commit suicide unless she consented to allow him to procure a divorce; that he procured a revolver and made a pretended attempt to take his life; that his conduct so terrorized her and her children that she was reduced in health and so shocked in her nervous system that she was induced to believe that he would commit suicide, and yielded to his demand; that she signed an answer which her husband had caused to be prepared; that her husband thereafter telephoned her that he would take his life if she resisted the divorce or appeared in the courtroom at the hearing; all of which she believed, and for that reason did not appear. She further alleged that all the facts set forth in the complaint were false and untrue; that his threats of suicide were made with intent to cover his real purpose, which was to marry another,—a purpose which he thereafter admitted to her. In holding that the petition was sufficient, the court said that the complaint in the divorce suit was subject to demurrer; that the suit was, in effect, notwithstanding the record, a decree by default; that, while ordinarily "the plea of coercion or duress would not be heard, upon the facts alleged, when we consider the years of intimate relationship existing between these parties, the trust and confidence inspired by mutual interest in the rearing of children, it is not for us to say in this proceeding that appellant was not the victim of a well-founded dread that respondent, the father of her children, would take his life unless she submitted to his demand."

In the Pringle Case the wife commenced an action in Mason county against the petitioner and obtained a decree of divorce upon constructive service. Returns were properly made that the husband could not be found in either Mason or Chehalis county. A trial was had, and a decree entered, in which it was adjudged that the wife was entitled to a divorce. The husband alleged in his petition, that he had at all times during the pendency of the action resided in Chehalis county; that his place of residence and postoffice address were well known to his wife. This was held to state a ground for relief. It will be observed, however, that the petition was filed by the innocent party.

In the McDonald Case the court said: "It would seem to be violative of fundamental principles to hold that a divorce decree, fraudulently procured, may not be timely assailed by the innocent party to the proceedings." (The italics are ours.)

In the Danforth Case a motion was made to vacate a decree of divorce on the ground that it had been collusively entered. It was made at the term during which the decree was rendered. The court said that the decree had not then become "an unalterable record;" that the decree "with the records of other proceedings of the term, was still in fieri and under the control of the court to amend, change, or vacate it, as justice might require." Winder v. Winder is to the same effect. There the motion to vacate the decree because of collusion was made at the term at which the decree was entered. It was said: "The court had power to set aside the decree during the term, if satisfied that it had been obtained by fraud or collusion, or if it believed that its former conclusion was erroneous."

In Meisenheimer v. Meisenheimer, 55 Wash. 32, 133 Am. St. Rep. 1005, 104 Pac. 159, and Ferry v. Ferry, 9 Wash. 239, 37 Pac. 431, we held that a decree of divorce stands upon the same footing as a decree in other cases.

In the Ferry Case the wife was the defendant in the divorce action. The decree was granted to her upon her cross complaint. She sought to have the decree vacated upon the ground, among others, that neither party to the divorce suit was a resident of the state at the time the decree was entered. She also alleged that no evidence was taken as to the residence of either party. A demurrer to her complaint was sustained. In passing upon the case, the court said: "We know of no rule prevailing in cases where husband or wife alleges fraud of this kind different from that which controls cases between other classes of parties."

In Karren v. Karren, 25 Utah, 87, 60 L.R.A. 294, 95 Am. St. Rep. 815, 69 Pac. 465, the wife sought to vacate a decree of divorce obtained at the suit of the husband. She alleged inter alia that her husband represented to her that he was procuring the divorce because of the insistence of his parents, and in order to get the homestead conveyed to him by his father, and that he represented that, after the divorce was obtained, he would remarry her, and that to enable him to procure the deed to the homestead she refrained from appearing and defending the action. In denying the relief, the court said: "The plaintiff, when she gave her consent, must have known that the contemplated divorce could only be procured by a suppression of the facts and false testimony." Nichols v. Nichols, 25 N. J. Eq. 60; Newman v. Newman, 27 Okla. 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

381, 112 Pac. 1007, and Simons v. Simons, 47 Mich. 253, 645, 10 N. W. 360, announce the same rule.

In Starbuck v. Starbuck, 173 N. Y. 503, 93 Am. St. Rep. 631, 66 N. E. 193, the court said: "A party cannot avail himself of a defense or of a right to recover by means of an invalid decree or judgment obtained by him; but, on the other hand, he may not be heard to impeach a decree or judgment which he himself has procured to be entered in his own favor." This is undoubtedly the general rule; there may be exceptions. If the petition when read as an entirety showed that the appellant was, in fact, acting under duress, she might be exempt from the rule stated, but no such fact appears.

The fact that perjured testimony may have been offered to secure the decree affords no ground for vacating it. Whittle v. Whittle, 60 Misc. 201, 111 N. Y. Supp. 1078; United States v. Throckmorton, 98 U. S. 61, 25 L. ed. 93.

In the Throckmorton Case it was said: "On the other hand, the doctrine is equally well settled that the court will not set aside a judgment because it was founded on a fraudulent instrument, or perjured evidence, or for any matter which was actually presented and considered in the judgment assailed."

We think the petition when fairly read shows nothing more than a collusive arrangement to obtain the divorce. The prosecuting attorney appeared and resisted on behalf of the state. The petition does not allege that he failed to discharge his duty to the state. The legal presumption is that he did. There is no allegation that the appellant in the divorce action told the "situation to the court just as it was," as she alleges she had agreed with the respondent to do. Nor is there any allegation, either that she did or that she did not make full disclosures to her counsel who represented her at the instance of the respondent. It is true she alleges that the evidence was not sufficient to justify the decree. That, however, was for the court. In what respect it was insufficient she fails to point out. The presumption is that her counsel did their duty and there is no allegation to the contrary. The presumption is that the court did its duty, and there is no allegation to the contrary except the alleged insufficiency of the evidence. The insufficiency of the evidence would in proper cases justify an appeal, but it will not justify a vacation of the decree. Morgan v. Williams, — Wash. —, 137 Pac. 476.

We think the petition is fatally defective. The judgment is affirmed.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

WATERLOO LUMBER COMPANY et al.
v.
DES MOINES INSURANCE COMPANY,
Appt.

(— Iowa, —, 138 N. W. 504.)

Insurance — transfer of risk — authority.

1. An insurance agent with power to issue policies has no authority, upon direction by his company to cancel the policy paid for and delivered, to transfer the risk on behalf of the applicant to another company represented by him.

Same — exchange of policies — effect.

2. The exchanging by one who has suffered a fire loss, of a policy which had been

Note. — Power of insurance agent to bind insured by transferring risk from one company to another represented by the former.

Generally, as to insurance brokers as agent for the insured, see note to Morris McGraw Woodenware Co. v. German F. Ins. Co. 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 614.

This note does not cover the general question whether an insurance agent is authorized to receive notice of the cancellation of a policy for the insured.

It is confined to the consideration of the question whether it is within the power of insurance agents representing several companies to substitute a policy in one company for a policy in another without the insured's consent.

Agents employed merely to obtain insurance.

It is generally held that insurance agents who are employed merely to obtain insurance on property have no authority to consent to the cancellation of a policy issued at their instance by a company represented by them, and substitute a policy of another company represented by them in its place, since it is held that the authority conferred upon them is exhausted by the procurement of the first policy.

Thus, agents who were merely authorized to obtain insurance were held to have no power to transfer the risk to a second company represented by them, and the company in which the risk was first placed was held to be the one liable,— —where an agent wrote a policy providing that it might be terminated on notice, and upon the insurer's refusal to take the risk, he, without the knowledge of the insured, wrote a policy in another company, and a loss occurred the same day, Massasoit Steam Mills Co. v. Western Assur. Co. 125 Mass. 116;

—where an agent of several insurance companies gave no notice to the insured upon being ordered to cancel a policy written by him providing for cancellation on 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

duly issued and paid for, for one in another company, upon receiving notice that the former was to be canceled, is not a ratification of the attempted change of insurers, so as to release the one which issued the surrendered policy, since after the loss the agent could not bind the substituted company.

Appeal — prematurity of action — right to question.

3. The objection that an action to enforce payment of a fire insurance policy was brought prematurely cannot be raised for the first time in the appellate court.

five days' notice, but wrote a policy in another company represented by him, which was not delivered to the insured until the day after a loss, Yoshimi v. Fidelity F. Ins. Co. 99 App. Div. 69, 91 N. Y. Supp. 393;

—where an agent, upon receipt of a letter addressed to the insured ordering the cancellation of the policy, without the consent of the insured, who was temporarily absent, issued policies in other companies for which he was agent, and forwarded them to the insured with a request to accept them in lieu of the first one, but the letter did not come to the insured's notice until after a loss had been sustained, Partridge v. Milwaukee Mechanics' Ins. Co. 13 App. Div. 519, 43 N. Y. Supp. 632, affirmed in 162 N. Y. 597, 57 N. E. 1119;

—where an agent obtained a policy through other agents, which was delivered, and upon receiving notice to cancel it, he wrote a policy in another company, which he mailed to the insured, requesting a return of the first policy, but the property was destroyed before the notice of the attempted transfer of the risk was received by the insured, Stebbins v. Lancashire Ins. Co. 60 N. H. 65;

—where it appeared that an agent for several companies, upon application by a broker for insurance for a stated amount in some good company, wrote a policy in a certain company and delivered it through the broker to the insured, and charged the premium to the broker; that later, upon receiving orders from the insurer to cancel the policy, without giving the notice of the cancellation as provided for in the policy, he entered the risk on his books in another company, which he credited with the premium; that on the day on which a loss occurred, without knowledge thereof, he mailed a policy in the second company to the broker, together with notice that the original insurer had declined the risk, and requested an exchange of policies; that on the same day he received notice from the second company declining the risk, and that thereafter he obtained the first policy from

The material facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Read & Read for appellant.

Messrs. Edwards & Longley, for appellees:

There may be no cancellation of a policy of insurance in the absence of the five days' notice required by statute, unless the consent of the insured, given by himself or by someone having authority to do so for him, is procured. And authority to procure insurance does not at all imply or confer authority upon the insurance agent to receive notice of cancellation. The agency is terminated when the insurance is procured.

the insured and delivered the second, Wilson v. New Hampshire F. Ins. Co. 140 Mass. 210, 5 N. E. 818;

—where an agent, upon notice to cancel a policy which had been delivered, directed a clerk to issue a policy in another company, and made an entry of a new policy covering the risk on his daily report, but no policy was written or notice of the attempted cancellation given to the insured until after a loss had occurred, Clark v. Insurance Co. of N. A. 89 Me. 26, 35 L.R.A. 276, 35 Atl. 1008;

—where agents, upon notice from an insurer to cancel a policy, without notice to or the consent of the insured, issued new policies, which were not delivered until after a fire occurred, London & L. F. Ins. Co. v. Turnbull, 86 Ky. 230, 5 S. W. 542. And to the same effect is Joyner v. Scottish F. Ins. Co. 155 N. C. 255, 71 S. E. 434;

—where an agent attempted to substitute another policy without the knowledge of the insured, upon receiving notice from the insurer to cancel a prior policy, although there had been no delivery of that policy, Commercial Union Assur. Co. v. Urbansky, 113 Ky. 624, 68 S. W. 653.

And in Merchants' Ins. Co. v. Shults, 8 Kan. App. 798, 57 Pac. 306, where both parties had acquiesced in the substitution of an insurer, the court said that an agent who was authorized to obtain insurance was not the agent of the insured at the time he issued a policy to take the place of one which he had been ordered to cancel.

And there is a dictum to the same effect in Larsen v. Thuringia American Ins. Co. 208 Ill. 166, 70 N. E. 31.

In Martin v. Palatine Ins. Co. 106 Tenn. 523, 61 S. W. 1024, where an applicant for insurance expressed a preference for certain companies, and the agent stated he could not place the risk in those companies, but that he would procure a policy in another company through other agents, which he did, delivering the policy to the insured, it was held that the agent had no power to assent to the cancellation of this policy, and to substitute another in one of the companies represented by him for which the insured had expressed a preference, and the first company was held liable, although the second policy had been delivered to the personal representative of the insured, the former never having consented to the cancellation of the first policy.

And where policies procured by an agent had to be to the satisfaction of the insured, no recovery can be had on a policy which the agent, upon being informed of a previous insurer's intention of raising its rate, filled out, countersigned, and placed in his safe, but did not deliver, no attempt being made to take up the first policy until the day after the insured property was destroyed, although he noted on his books a transfer of the premium and the cancellation of the previous policy. Kerr v. Milwaukee Mechanics' Ins. Co. 54 C. C. A. 616, 117 Fed. 442.

Agents authorized to keep property insured.

Where insurance agents representing several companies are authorized not merely to obtain insurance, but, under a general agreement between a property owner and an agent, to keep the property insured, it is generally held that the agent has authority to transfer the risk to another company represented by him on notice from a former insurer to cancel an existing policy.

Thus, it has been held that where an agreement is made by a property owner with an insurance agent, that the latter will keep property insured, and no insurance companies are mentioned, the agent may, upon notice from an insurer to cancel a policy, terminate it without notice to the insured and substitute a policy in another company, and where the substituted policy is mailed to the insured before a loss occurs, it is binding although it does not reach the insured until after the property has burned. Phoenix Ins. Co. v. State, 76 Ark. 180, 88 S. W. 917, 6 Ann. Cas. 440.

And in Jackson v. Fire Asso. of Philadelphia, 13 N. Y. S. R. 257, where an insurance agent agreed to insure property in a specified company if it would carry it, and if not to insure in some other company, and he issued a policy which provided that it might be canceled on notice to the agent, in the company mentioned, and delivered it to the insured, and after notice to cancel, without the insured's knowledge, he placed the risk in another company, which refused it, and he subsequently placed it in another company, whose policy was delivered to the insured, and the first policy handed back after a fire had occurred, it was held that the first two policies were properly terminated, and that the last company was liable for the loss, since, under the agreement with the property owner, it was the agent's duty, upon notice of cancellation by one insurer, to place the risk in another of the companies represented by him.

Upon loss of insured property, the rights of the parties to the contract of insurance are fixed. A valid claim then exists or does not exist, and no right of election is open to insured at that time by any act of his to change the rights of either himself or the insurer.

And in Dibble v. Northern Assur. Co. 70 Mich. 1, 14 Am. St. Rep. 470, 37 N. W. 704, it was held that the policy first issued was properly canceled, and that there was a sufficient delivery of the one substituted for it, where it appeared that an insurance agent who had authority to keep one's property insured in such companies as the agent might select placed a risk in a company and sent the policy, which authorized the insurer to cancel upon notice, to the insured; that, upon being ordered by the insurer to cancel it, he did so, and notified the insured the same day, and at the same time notified him that he had rewritten the risk in a specified company; that the notice was received by the insured's clerk the next day, and new policies were written and placed in the agent's safe, and the insurer notified and the premium remitted; that a loss occurred the day after the last policy was issued and the notice of the change was received by the insured.

And in Todd v. German American Ins. Co. 2 Ga. App. 789, 59 S. E. 94, it was held that it was no strained inference to say that a property owner's expression to an insurance agent of a desire that his agency should carry a certain amount of his insurance gave authority to the agent, in the event that any insurance originally written by the agent in companies of his choosing should become canceled, to replace it with a policy in some other company represented by the agency, and in this case, where a company in which the agent had written a policy became bankrupt, and he rewrote the risk in other companies represented by him, that, from the insured's instructions to the agent, and from the other attending evidence and circumstances, the jury might find an assent by the insured to the new policy in lieu of the old.

And it was held that, in determining whether the insured's assent was to be inferred, the jury would be authorized to take into consideration not only the insured's exact words, but also the surrounding circumstances, and to apply their common knowledge as intelligent men as to what a customer meant when he asked an insurance office to carry so much insurance for him. Ibid.

insurance agent representing several companies was employed to procure insurance on property without designating the company, and the premium was paid and the agent agreed to place the policy in his safe and keep the property insured, and policies were written in two companies, one after the other, which the insurers ordered canceled, after which the agent resolved to place it in another company, and began to write a policy, but was unable to finish it on account of darkness, and the property was burned that night, it was held that there was a binding contract of insurance with the last company.

And in Finley v. Western Empire Ins. Co. 69 Wash. 673, 125 Pac. 1012, where agents who had obtained a policy, upon notice from the insurer to cancel it, secured a policy in another company, which was not delivered to the insured until the property covered was destroyed, it was held that, considering the whole record, the agents had authority to substitute the policy in order to keep up the amount of insurance.

In Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. McKenzie, 70 Ill. App. 615, where an agent, upon notice to cancel a policy covering a hazardous risk which had been refused by several insurers, made notations purporting to transfer the risk to another company, and signed a policy in blank, and charged the insured with the premium on his books, it was held that he acted without authority from the insured, although there was some evidence that the insured had instructed the agent to write him up in another company in case of cancellation of a policy.

Authority inferred from usage.

In Hamm Realty Co. v. New Hampshire F. Ins. Co. 80 Minn. 139, 83 N. W. 41, where for fifteen years an insurance agency representing several companies, and authorized to issue policies, had carried the risk on a property owner's buildings, designating the companies, and receiving notice of cancellations, and issuing new policies as substitutes without objection by the insured, it was held that an insurer represented by such agency was liable on a policy issued by the agency to replace one which it had been ordered to cancel, although a loss occurred before the policy was delivered to the insured, it appearing that it was not the custom of the agency to immediately deliver policies substituted by it for those canceled. Testimony of insured that no authority was given to the insurance agents to accept notice of cancelation of policy, and also that no such notice was in fact received, is competent and, if uncontroverted, conclusive of the question.

Wisconsin C. R. Co. v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 123 Wis. 313, 101 N. W. 703.

The agent procuring the insurance policy is not, in the absence of express authority given, or such course of business as of itself is evidence of such authority, the agent of insured for receiving notice of cancelation.

Clark v. Insurance Co. of N. A. 89 Me. 26, 35 L.R.A. 276, 35 Atl. 1010; Kerr v. Milwaukee Mechanics' Ins. Co. 54 C. C. A. 616, 117 Fed. 447.

An agent of an insurance company has no authority to insure property already destroyed; and a policy written and intended as a substitute for a subsisting policy in another company, but not delivered, and of which the assured has no knowledge until after the property is destroyed by fire, is not a valid contract of insurance.

Weaver, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff is a lumber dealer at Waterloo, Iowa. The defendant insurance company maintains a recording agency in that city conducted by Jameson & French. Through this agency the policy in suit was issued, and during the period named in such policy the property insured was destroyed by fire. These facts are conceded, but defendant denies liability on the grounds (1) that, when the issuance of the policy was reported by its agents, defendant rejected the risk and canceled the policy, and that same was never in fact delivered or paid for; and (2) that, in violation of a provision of said policy, the plaintiff procured other insurance upon the property without the knowledge or consent of the defendant, whereby the contract of insurance with defendant became void and of no effect.

The facts conceded or well established are as follows: Upon plaintiff's application Jameson & French, defendant's recording agents, acting within the scope of their authority, issued the policy in suit, and received payment of the stipulated premium. This policy was issued on January 27, 1908, and duly reported by said agents to the defendant at Des Moines. Eight days later defendant addressed a letter to Jameson & French, saying that the rate was inadequate, and, unless a higher rate could be procured, they were directed to take up the policy and return it for cancelation. This demand or direction was received by Jameson & French on February 5, 1908, but was not then reported by them to the plaintiff lumber company. On the same day they entered upon their records a note of the cancelation of the policy, and directed an employee to rewrite the same risk in the Iowa Manufacturers' Insurance Company, which they also represented. Such policy was prepared not earlier than February 5, 1908, but it was antedated as of February 1, 1908, and it is not entirely clear from the record whether the instrument was executed before the property was destroyed by fire, on February 7, 1908. As a matter of bookkeeping the plaintiff's payment of premium which had been credited to the defendant company was transferred to the credit of the manufacturers' company. On the morning of February 8, 1908, having learned of the fire, a representative of Jameson & French went to the manager of the plaintiff company, told him that the defendant had asked a cancelation of its policy, and that the agents had on the day before written up another in the manufacturers' company to take its place, and upon the strength of such alleged facts demanded an exchange of said policies. The manager replied that he only wanted what was right and to get the insurance for which he had paid; took the policy offered to him, and returned the one previously issued. Thereafter the plaintiff demanded of said agents a return of the policy sued upon, and offered to surrender the policy of the manufacturers' company.

1. There is no evidence whatever to support the plea that the policy was never delivered or paid for. The delivery and the payment are both shown, and neither was disputed upon the trial. We have, then, to consider whether the policy was canceled and defendant released from liability thereon. Jameson & French being recording agents authorized to countersign and deliver policies, it requires neither argument nor citation of authorities to support the proposition that this policy upon delivery to plaintiff became a valid contract of insurance. It is equally clear that such policy could not be effectively canceled by notice or instruction from the company to its own agents that the premium was inadequate, and that, unless a higher rate could be obtained, the policy must be taken up. The insured could, of course, authorize the agents to act for him in receiving notice of cancellation and in procuring other insurance in case his policy was thereafter canceled, but the giving of such authority in this case was nowhere shown, nor is it to be fairly implied from the record. It should also be here remembered as having material bearing upon this controversy that the defendant did not attempt nor order an unconditional cancellation of the policy. Addressing its agents under date of February 4, 1908, it called their attention to the character of the risk, disapproving the rate charged as being insufficient, and adding: "We consider it well worth 1½ per cent for three years, fire and lightning, and unless you can obtain this rate, we will ask you to very kindly take up our policy and return it to us for cancellation." This direction quite clearly contemplated an effort on the part of the agents to obtain the increased premium, and that cancellation should only follow the failure of such effort. So far as shown, the agents did not consult the plaintiff on the subject, or attempt to induce it to meet the company's demand. This, even without respect to the lack of due notice to the insured, would seem to be not so much an act of cancellation as it was a proposition or threat of cancellation to be made upon the failure of the insured to comply with the demand for a greater premium. The case thus presented is similar in principle to the one decided in Van Tassel v. Greenwich 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Ins. Co. 151 N. Y. 130, 45 N. E. 365. There the plaintiff held a policy for $10,000, which was renewed or extended for a year. A week later the company addressed a letter to the agent, saying the risk was declined for $10,000, but that the company would renew for $5,000 if wanted, and that the risk would not be held binding for more than $5,000. No reply was made to this communication, and a loss was incurred within six days thereafter. Suit being brought, defendant sought to escape liability on the ground that the policy as issued had been canceled, and that the proposition or offer to renew for the smaller amount had not been accepted. The defense was overruled, it being held that the letter constituted no more than a proposed cancellation, and not a cancellation in fact. See also Chrisman & S. Bkg. Co. v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 75 Mo. App. 310.

The point is made in argument that, plaintiff having applied to Jameson & French for insurance without designating any particular company in which the policy was desired, the agents were authorized to place it in any responsible company represented by them, and that, upon notice to them of the cancellation of such policy, it was within the scope of their implied authority to place the risk with some other insurer. With this contention we are unable to agree. Plaintiff did not deal with Jameson & French as mere soliciting agents to present its application to different companies in succession until one was found willing to accept the risk. They were, as we have seen, recording agents authorized to issue policies for the company. Plaintiff applied to them for insurance in a stated sum. They furnished it, and plaintiff paid for it. The contract was complete, and thenceforward these agents ceased in any manner to represent the insured. If the defendant thereafter undertook to cancel the policy, it was a new and independent transaction, in which its agents could not represent nor bind the plaintiff without special authority so to do, or a previous course of dealing between such parties from which the authority may be implied. *John R. Rep. 197, 3 N. E. 341; Broadwater v. Lion F. Ins. Co. 34 Minn. 466, 26 N. W. 455. The precedents cited to the contrary effect,—Arnfeld v. Guardian Assur. Co. 172 Pa. 605, 34 Atl. 580; Kooistra v. Rockford Ins. Co. 122 Mich. 620, 81 N. W. 568; Standard Oil Co. v. Triumph Ins. Co. 64 N. Y. 85,—and others of that class, are not in point. In each of these cases the person receiving the notice was the admitted agent or broker of the insured, or the course of business between the insured and the company's agent for a considerable period had been such as to justify an implication of authority to act in the premises.

Here there is no claim of express authority, nor is there any proof of prior transactions or course of business from which a finding of implied authority could be sustained. The notice of Jameson & French, not having been communicated to plaintiff till after the loss had occurred, was necessarily unavailing to relieve the defendant from its liability, unless we are required to hold as a matter of law that plaintiff's act in receiving the policy in the manufacturers' company and giving up the one in suit is an act which bars or estops it from denying the effectiveness of the alleged cancellation. Counsel argued that if plaintiff had been informed of the change in the policies before the loss occurred, and had accepted the one last written in exchange for the first, he would be held to have ratified the act, and could not recover from the defendant. This is, of course, true, but it does not follow that such an exchange or attempted substitution made after the loss would have the same effect. In the case supposed by counsel, the plaintiff's ratification having been made while the insured property was still in existence, the manufacturers' company would clearly be bound by the contract made by its agents, and the defendant discharged from further liability. In the case before us, the alleged ratification cannot upon any theory be said to have taken place until after the loss occurred, when the insured property had ceased to exist, and the agents could no longer bind the manufacturers' company by any attempt to insure it at that time. Defendant cannot relieve itself from liability for loss already occurred by inducing the insured to receive the alleged policy of another company, issued without authority and affording no indemnity whatever. Decisions touching upon transactions of this kind are quite numerous.

It has frequently been held that an agent has no authority to insure property already destroyed, and a policy written and intended as a substitute for a subsisting policy in another company, but not delivered or brought to the notice of the property owner until after loss, is not a valid contract of insurance. Stebbins v. Lancashire Ins. Co. 60 N. H. 65; Clark v. Insurance Co. of N. A. 89 Me. 28, 35 L.R.A. 276, 35 Atl. 1008; Kerr v. Milwaukee Mechanics' Ins. Co. 54 C. C. A. 616, 117 Fed. 442. In the last-cited case, as in the case at bar, the insurer in the first policy, the Phoenix company, notified its agent to cancel it. The agent Rohrer made the entry in his books, transferred the premium credit to the Milwaukee company, and wrote up a policy in the last-named company ready for delivery to the insured, who was given no notice of the transaction until after a fire had destroyed the property, when an actual delivery of the policy was made. In holding that such acts did not work a cancellation of the first policy, the court reviews the precedents to which we have already called attention, and says: "These cases hold that the written but undelivered policy never matured into a contract for insurance, and that liability upon the subsisting policy, which was intended to be replaced, was fixed by the burning of the property while it was still in force. The acts of bookkeeping of Rohrer in marking cancellation on his office record of the Phoenix company's policy, and transferring in his accounts the credit for premium from that company to the defendant company, all done in anticipation of his purposed delivery of defendant company's policy in replacement for the expected surrender of the policy of the Phoenix company, were futile, and affected no existing rights or liabilities. London & L. F. Ins. Co. v. Turnbull, 86 Ky. 230, 237, 5 S. W. 542; Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. McKenzie, 70 Ill. App. 615, 623. In the present case it clearly appeared that at the time of the burning of the elevator, the policy of the Phoenix Insurance Company was a valid contract of insurance, which had never been surrendered nor canceled; and that plaintiff, the insured, then held it as such. The policy of the defendant company was then an undelivered writing, not yet a contract, and because of the destruction of the property while it was in that condition, it never became a contract." The Clark Case cited from the Maine court arose upon a state of facts very similar to those we have here to deal with. The plaintiff applied to the agents for insurance, which they wrote in the Commercial Union Company. A few days later that company wrote the agents to cancel the policy. Without notifying the insured, they directed their clerk to write another policy in the Insurance Company of North America. That policy was antedated, as was done in this case, and credit for the premium paid was transferred to the last-named company. Before the change was reported to the insured, the property burned. Thereafter the agent induced the insured to receive the last policy and give up the one first written, assuring him that it would be all right. As a matter of safety separate actions were brought on these policies setting up the facts of the attempted cancellation and change. Speaking with reference to the action upon the policy last issued, the court says: "The agent had no authority, express or implied, to effect any insurance for the plaintiff beyond what had already been completed. His authority was to procure for the plaintiff $1,200 insurance in one of the companies which he represented, and, having done that to the acceptance of the plaintiff, his agency, so far as the plaintiff was concerned, was accomplished, and he had no authority to make further insurance on the behalf of the plaintiff. Nor was it the intention even, on the part of the agent, to effect additional insurance. It was, at most, an attempt to transfer a risk from one company to another at the instance of the company then carrying the risk, and without the consent of the assured. The attempted cancellation and the effort to place the risk in the defendant company were parts of the same transaction with no consent of the assured. Unless the cancellation was valid, the second risk did not attach. It is not pretended that the plaintiff was aware of any intention or attempt at cancellation till the morning after the loss occurred. Until the five days' notice provided in the policy should be given him, or he should consent to such cancellation, the first policy would remain in force, and the second would not become operative as a legal subsisting contract." Quite in point and to the same effect are Massasoit Steam Mills Co. v. Western Assur. Co. 125 Mass. 110; Wilson v. New Hampshire F. Ins. Co. 140 Mass. 210, 5 N. E. 818; Stebbins v. Lancashire Ins. Co. 60 N. H. 65.

If it be said that, Jameson & French being agents of the manufacturers' company, its assent to the issuance of the second policy must be assumed, it is none the less true that the assent of the plaintiff was essential to the existence of a completed contract, and, if such assent was not given or procured until after the subject of insurance had been destroyed, the company would not be bound thereby. Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Young, 23 Wall. 85, 23 L. ed. 152; Michigan Pipe Co. v. Michigan F. & M. Ins. Co. 92 Mich. 493, 20 L.R.A. 277, 52 N. W. 1070, and cases already cited. Counsel's illustration of a case in which the insurance companies deal directly together, the second company agreeing to take the risk which is being carried by the first company, and loss ensues before the policy is delivered, does not cover the case at bar. In such instance there is a complete contract of reinsurance for the benefit of the first insurer, which may be enforced. But the first company is in no manner relieved from its obligation to the property owner, although it is in position to protect itself against ultimate loss by calling upon the second company for the promised indemnity. Massasoit Steam Mills Co. v. Western Assur. Co. 125 Mass. 110.

Neither company is empowered to speak or act for the holder of the first policy, or to bind him to an acceptance of the second policy, and he is equally powerless to bind the second insurer by a consent given after a loss has occurred. But two cases are brought to our attention from which any apparent support for defendant's position can be extracted,—Larsen v. Thuringia American Ins. Co. 208 Ill. 166, 70 N. E. 31; Arnfeld v. Guardian Assur. Co. 172 Pa. 605, 34 Atl. 580,—and a careful reading of these demonstrates that neither goes to the extent claimed for it. In the Arnfeld Case plaintiff employed a broker to procure insurance, and the broker obtained a policy from the guardian company. This company thereafter notified the broker of its purpose to cancel the policy within five days. Acting upon the notice, the broker at once procured a policy in the Queen Company, and notified the guardian company thereof, and assured it that it was relieved from further liability. The insured accepted the policy from the Queen Company, and that company conceded its liability, and paid its proportion of the loss. Action was also brought on the first policy, and the essence of the decision upon appeal in that case is that the court should have instructed the jury that if the second policy was taken as a substitute for the first, and not merely as additional insurance, and if the second company accepted responsibility and paid its share of the loss, then the first policy should be treated as canceled, and no recovery could be had thereon. Of the soundness of this proposition there can be no dispute, and it is in no manner inconsistent with the conclusions we have above announced. The Larsen Case, decided by the Illinois court, is substantially similar in its facts to the Arnfeld Case, in that, after being notified of the exchange of policies, the insured not only assented thereto, but presented its claim to the substituted company, which acknowledged its liability and paid its proportion of the loss. The insured having thus received the indemnity promised in the policy last issued, the court very properly says: "It cannot lie in him now to say that there was no consideration for the surrender of the policy issued by appellee, and that appellee is not relieved from liability by that transaction." Without further consideration of the authorities, we have to say that we are quite clear that there was never any efficient cancellation of the policy issued by the defendant, nor was there a valid substitution therefor of the policy of the manufacturers' company. For the reasons already stated, it must be held that the defense based upon an alleged avoidance of the policy by the act of the plaintiff in procuring additional insurance is without any support in the record.

2. The defendant further insists that the judgment below must be reversed because the action was prematurely begun. This fact is said to affirmatively appear from the printed record, a statement which the appellee questions. We have not undertaken to satisfy ourselves in that respect because it appears to be unnecessary. The objection to the timeliness of the action was not raised in pleading or by motion in arrest, nor does it appear to have been in any manner called to the attention of the trial court. Under such circumstances, it cannot be raised for the first time in this court. Petty v. Mutual F. Ins. Co. 111 Iowa, 358, 82 N. W. 767; Van Camp v. Keokuk, 130 Iowa, 716, 107 N. W. 933; Borghart v. Cedar Rapids, 126 Iowa, 313, 68 L.R.A. 306, 101 N. W. 1120. The objection is quite certainly not one which goes to the jurisdiction of the court, and the general rule that other objections not in any manner raised in the trial court will not be considered on appeal is so general and universal that citation of authorities in support thereof is not required. The action is at law. The burden was upon defendant to make good its several defenses, or some of them, and the findings of the trial court upon all disputed matters of fact are in favor of the plaintiff.

We find no reversible error in the record, and the judgment below is therefore affirmed.

JOHN P. LOONEY, Appt.,

v.

CITY OF SIOUX CITY, Iowa.

Municipal corporation — liability for tort of police officer.

Failure of a superintendent of police to take the bond from a police officer authorized by ordinance, before permitting him to exercise the duties of his office, does not render the municipality liable for a tort committed by such officer in the performance of his duty, since it is in the exercise of a governmental function.

(February 11, 1914.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Woodbury County sustaining a demurrer to a petition filed to recover damages for negligent failure of the defendant city to have a policeman of the city under bond when plaintiff was shot and injured by him. Affirmed.

Statement by Preston, J.:

This is an action wherein the plaintiff seeks to recover damages from the defendant city for negligence in failing to have one Matt Carr, a policeman of said city, under bond on the 1st day of May, 1912, when plaintiff was shot and injured by the said police officer. The demurrer to the petition was sustained. Plaintiff appeals.

Mr. Andrew G. Lehr, for appellant:

The board of civil service commissioners and the city council act for and on behalf of the city, and their negligence and breach

Note.—A search has disclosed no other cases involving the liability of a municipality for failure to require a bond of an officer.

The general subject of municipal liability for torts of police officers is treated in the notes to Gillmor v. Salt Lake City, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 537, and Sehy v. Salt Lake City, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 915. For other phases of municipal liability for acts of officers, see Index to L.R.A. Notes, "Municipal corporations," §§ 81-84.

of duty are the negligence and breach of duty of the city, and there is no discretion in the matter, as it is the neglect of a ministerial duty for which the city is liable.

Gray v. Griffin, 111 Ga. 361, 51 L.R.A. 131, 36 S. E. 792; Gibson v. Huntington, 38 W. Va. 177, 22 L.R.A. 561, 45 Am. St. Rep. 853, 18 S. E. 447.

The appointment and putting under bond of a police officer are a ministerial act and duty, and not a governmental act, in which the city has no discretion, and the negligence of its officers is the negligence of the city, for which the city is liable.

Ibid.

Messrs. Schmidt & Pike, for appellee:

The police power in all its branches, as exercised by a municipality, is a governmental function, and in the performance of this function, the municipality represents the state. The officers exercising these powers are state officers.

Corp. 2d ed. 1910, § 318, p. 323.

The mere fact that the city takes a bond in these cases cannot in any respect increase the liability of the city to the individual. It cannot be liable indirectly for what it is not directly liable.

Preston, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff states in his petition that while under arrest of one Matt Carr, a policeman of the defendant city, he was shot and severely injured by the said Carr, and that he recovered in the district court of Woodbury county a judgment against the said Carr of $4,000 for his injuries so sustained, and that he tried to enforce said judgment against said Carr, but that Carr had no property subject to execution, either at the time of the injury or any time thereafter, and that the city, by practice and custom, has fixed the amount of the bond required of its policemen at $2,000, and that the plaintiff is therefore damaged in the amount of $2,000 owing to the negligence of the defendant city in not having said Carr under bond at the time of said injury.

Carr was appointed policeman on the 22d day of April, 1912, and up to May 1, 1912, when he shot plaintiff, had not given bond. A copy of a part of the ordinance on this subject is attached to the petition, under the title, "Bonds of City Officers," and is as follows: "Sec. 2. The superintendents of the different departments are hereby authorized to require bonds from employees in their respective departments, not mentioned in § 1 hereof, and to fix the amount of said bonds, whenever they shall deem such action necessary. Such bonds shall comply as to sureties with other bonds herein required, and shall be approved by the city council."

The grounds of the demurrer are: "First. That the said city was acting in a governmental capacity, as the agent of the state, in enforcing the police regulations in said city, and for any wrongs committed by the agents or officers of said city in relation thereto, it is not liable, either directly or indirectly. Second. That the requirements that a bond be furnished by police officers was a requirement imposed upon the officers of the city acting in a governmental capacity, and that the failure of any municipal officer to require such bond is the failure to exercise or perform a governmental duty, and not the breach of a municipal obligation for which a city may be liable."

The only authorities cited by appellant are Gray v. Griffin, 111 Ga. 361, 51 L.R.A. 131, 36 S. E. 792; Gibson v. Huntington, 38 W. Va. 177, 22 L.R.A. 561, 45 Am. St. Rep. 853, 18 S. E. 447; Laws of Iowa, 34 G. A. chap. 54, § 2; Code, §§ 1182, 1183. Gray's Case was an action in which plaintiff attempted to hold the defendant city liable for wrongful imprisonment, and it was held that the city was exercising a governmental function and could not be held liable. That is appellee's contention in the case at bar. The Gibson Case was an action brought for the alleged wrongful death of a child, caused by the falling of an embankment which had been undermined by a person without the knowledge of the city. The city was held not liable, but on the ground that it did not have notice of the defect. In the opinion the court makes some general observations as to the rules by which a city is liable for injuries sustained by the negligent management of its corporate property, and for injuries caused by its negligence in the discharge of, or failure to discharge, such duties as are purely ministerial, and not governmental or discretionary. These rules are conceded by the defendant to be correct statements of the law.

Chapter 54, Acts of 34 G. A., has reference to civil service examinations of fire and police officers before a commission, in cities under the commission form of government. It is not alleged in the petition in this case that the defendant city is under such form; but this is, perhaps, not material. The application of this act to this case is not stated by appellant further than that he concedes the appointment of a policeman to be a governmental act; but, he asserts, that the requiring of a bond of such officer, but some other officer of the city (in this case, under § 2 of the ordinance, the superintendent of the department), is a ministerial act for which the city is liable. Sections 1182 and 1183 of the Code are the requirements as to the officers giving bond. It may be observed here—though it has not been suggested in argument—that § 1185 of the Code provides that the amount of the bond shall be in such a sum as the council, by ordinance, prescribes; while, under the ordinance, this is to be done by the superintendents of the departments. Again, § 1197 provides that it shall be a misdemeanor for an officer of whom a bond is required to act without giving the bond; and that he shall be liable to a fine for an amount not exceeding the amount of the bond required of him.

In this case neither the statute nor the ordinance of the city fixes the penalty of the bond; but, as stated, the petition alleges that "by practice and custom it has been fixed at $2,000." Plaintiff seems to rely on the ordinance rather than the state law. It may be further noticed that the ordinance seems not to be mandatory, but authorizes the superintendents of the different departments to require bonds "when-ever they shall deem such action necessary." It is doubtful whether, under the allegations of the petition, there is any fact pleaded or showing that any bond was required of the policeman; but conceding, for the purpose of the argument, that it was, it is clear that it was not an administrative, but a governmental, act, and the failure to perform it does not make the defendant liable.

The defendant cites the following authorities: Calwell v. Boone, 51 Iowa, 687, 33 Am. Rep. 154, 2 N. W. 614; Easterly v. Irwin, 99 Iowa, 694, 68 N. W. 919; Lahner v. Williams, 112 Iowa, 428, 84 N. W. 507; Ball v. Woodbine, 61 Iowa, 83, 47 Am. Rep. 805, 15 N. W. 846; Curran v. Boston, 151 Mass. 505, 8 L.R.A. 243, 21 Am. St. Rep. 465, 24 N. Rep. 499; Vanhorn v. Des Moines, 63 Iowa, 447, 50 Am. Rep. 750, 19 N. W. 293, 294; case note in 30 Am. St. Rep. 376, 401. The last four cases are cited to sustain the proposition that the mere fact that the city takes a bond in these cases cannot in any respect increase the liability of the city to the individual; it cannot be liable indirectly for what it is not directly liable.

It is well settled, and it is not contended otherwise by appellant, that an act, whether of omission or commission, of an officer or employee of a municipal corporation, done in the line of the performance of an official duty public in character, does not make the municipality liable for the tort or wrongdoing of such officer or employee, while engaged as such, unless expressly authorized by statute or otherwise. The grounds of exemption from liability as stated in some of the cases are, substantially, that the corporation is engaged in the performance of a public service, in which it has no particular interest, and from which it derives no special benefit or advantage in its corporate capacity, but which it is bound to see performed in pursuance of a duty imposed by law for the general welfare of the public. In this case the policeman, Carr, was a public officer, and it is admitted by appellant that because of this the city would not be responsible directly for his act in shooting plaintiff. The requirement that such officer must give bond, if under the record in this case it is required, and the failure to do so, is but the act of another officer of the defendant corporation, and is but one of the steps to be taken in the appointment and qualification of such policeman. This duty of the superintendent of the police department is a public service, or governmental function, in which he acts as a servant of the state, and the city is not liable for a failure to perform it.

As bearing on this question and as sustaining our conclusion, we cite, without discussion, the following additional cases: McFadden v. Jewell, 119 Iowa, 321, 60 L.R.A. 401, 97 Am. Ladd, Ch., J., and Evans and Weaver, JJ., concur.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

EXCHANGE NATIONAL BANK OF FITZ-GERALD, Plff. in Err.,
v.
J. A. J. HENDERSON.

(139 Ga. 260, 77 S. E. 36.)

Bills and notes — illegal consideration — bona fide holder — buying notes.

1. A promissory note given for an illegal and immoral consideration is void, and cannot be enforced, even in the hands of an innocent purchaser for value, before due, and without any notice of defense. And this is so even if the consideration of the note is in part legal.

Headnotes by HILL, J.

Note. — Validity of agreements tending to influence elections or appointments to office.

- I. Agreements tending to influence elections, 549.
- II. Agreements tending to influence appointments to office, 554.

I. Agreements tending to influence elections.

Agreements to accept less than legal amount of compensation are excluded. See the note to Lukens v. Nye, 36 L.R.A. (N.S.) 244.

For agreements in consideration of withdrawal of candidacy for office, see the note to Com. ex rel. Layman v. Sheeran, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) 289.

For validity of agreement to divide fees or salary of public officers, see the note to Anderson v. Branstrom, 43 L.R.A. (N.S.) 422.

For contract as to the location of public buildings [not connected with any voting or election], see the note to Edwards v. Goldsboro, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 589.

As to injunction in favor of party in pari delicto against enforcing or otherwise proceeding with illegal contract, see the note to Basket v. Moss, 48 L.R.A. 842.

"It is the interest of the state that all places of public trust should be filled by men of capacity and integrity, and that the appointing power should be shielded from influences which may prevent the best selection; hence the law annuls every contract for procuring the appointment or election of any person to an office." Grier, J., in Marshall v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 16 How. 314, 14 L. ed. 953.

(a) Buying or selling, or offering to buy or sell, a vote at any election in this state, or in any county thereof, is both illegal and immoral.

(b) Buying or selling votes and political influence is both illegal and immoral; and a note having as a basis such consideration, in whole or in part, is void, and cannot be enforced in the hands of an innocent purchaser.

Evidence — admissibility.

2. The court did not err in admitting in evidence the testimony objected to, of the several witnesses for the defendant, under the facts of this case; nor in refusing to charge the jury as requested in writing by the plaintiff's counsel.

Appeal — motion for new trial.

3. There was no error in overruling the motion for a new trial.

(January 18, 1913.)

ERROR to the Superior Court for Irwin County to review a judgment in defendant's favor in an action on a promissory note. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Contracts involving advance of money or credit to aid an election.

Most cases are decided expressly upon statutes. In Martin v. Wade, 37 Cal. 168, however, the decision was placed upon public policy; and it was there held that a recovery could not be had upon a note given for the amount of advances made upon a contract, which was rescinded at the time of the giving of the note, the original contract being that a candidate, if elected, would give certain of the emoluments of his office to one who was to use his political and personal influence to secure such candidate's election, and was to advance him money to be used for that purpose. The court said: "That the agreement . . . was in violation of the general law of public policy, immoral, and malum in se, and therefore, wholly void, there can be no reasonable doubt," stating also that such contracts "corrupt and poison the very source of political power in republican governments."

But unless the statutes prohibit the use of any money by a candidate, it would seem that a loan of money to him for use in his election generally might be recovered, as it would not be presumed to be for an illegal purpose. Thus it was held in Deskins v. Phillips, 11 Ky. L. Rep. 485 (reported on memorandum), that the fact that a note was executed for money lent by the payee to the payor a few days before the election, to enable the defendant "to make the race" for county judge, was not sufficient to enable the appellate court to say, against the opinion of the trial court, that the purpose was the bribery of voters, although the court might suspect that the plaintiff must have known that

Mr. H. J. Quincey, for defendant in error:

The note was void even in the hands of a bona fide holder for value.

Johnston Bros. v. McConnell, 65 Ga. 129; Cunningham v. National Bank, 71 Ga. 400, 51 Am. Rep. 266, 75 Ga. 366; Moss v. Exchange Bank, 102 Ga. 808, 30 S. E. 267; Jones v. Dannenberg Co. 112 Ga. 426, 52 L.R.A. 271, 37 S. E. 729; Rhodes v. Beall, 73 Ga. 641; Joyce, Defenses to Commercial Paper, § 291; 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 366.

Mr. W. H. Horne also for defendant in error.

$500, the amount of the note, could not be legitimately expended within three days before the election.

As just stated, the matter has usually arisen under express statute, or in case of agreements contemplating an act prohibited by statute.

Thus, a promissory note given to raise money for election of a third party will not support a recovery by a holder with notice under the Canadian statute, which provides that "every executory contract, or promise, or undertaking, in any way referring to, arising out of, or depending upon, any election under this act, even for the payment of lawful expenses, or the doing of some lawful act, shall be void in law." St. Pierre v. L'Ecuier, Rap. Jud. Quebec, 23 C. S. 495 (approving Danser-eau v. St. Louis, 18 Can. S. C. 587).

See also as to checks, Dion v. Boulanger, Rap. Jud. Quebec, 4 C. S. 358.

In Foley v. Speir, 100 N. Y. 552, 3 N. E. 477 (affirming 11 Daly, 254), it was held that an agreement by a candidate (for a judgeship) with a political committee was void which provided that he should pay a certain definite sum of money in consideration of certain expenditures to be made by such committee, which included rent and some other matters not included in the statute, which limited contributions to defraying expenses of printing, the circulation of votes, handbills, and other papers, and for conveying sick, poor, and infirm electors to the polls; and the committee could not recover from the candidate upon such contract. The court distinguished Hurley v. Van Wagner, 28 Barb. 109, infra, and Sizer v. Daniels, 66 Barb. 432, infra.

So, a promise to pay to the owner of a building a certain sum if he would permit the building to remain standing and allow it to be used for meetings of a certain political party, etc., during the election, was held void under a statute making it a misdemeanor to contribute money intended to promote an election of any particular person or ticket (except for printing, and for circulation of votes, papers, etc.), and 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Hill, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Exchange National Bank of Fitzgerald brought suit against J. A. J. Henderson, as maker, and Mitchell & Paulk, as indorsers, upon a promissory note for $400. The note was payable to Mitchell & Paulk, who indorsed it to the plaintiff for value before due. The note itself does not disclose the consideration, and only recites that it is given "for value received." At the appearance term of the court, J. A. J. Henderson, the maker of the note, filed his plea averring that the note was without consideration, and was obtained by fraud; that the note was given for a certain patent right; that the consideration had failed, because the payees of the note failed and there can be no recovery upon such promise. Jackson v. Walker, 5 Hill, 27; this judgment was affirmed by an equal vote in the court of errors in 7 Hill, 387.

But it has been held that the chairman of a county committee of a political party may lawfully employ another to perform the duties of that position. Thus, in Smith v. Babcock, 3 App. Div. 6, 37 N. Y. Supp. 965, it was held that a contract was not necessarily void which provided that the defendant, being desirous of accepting the position of chairman of a political committee, and not being able to give time to it, employed the plaintiff personally to perform these duties for him for a compensation which was agreed upon between them, where the statute was designed to prevent "furnishing money or entertainment to induce attendance at polls," and provided that "any person who, with the intent to promote the election of a person to an elective office, . . . contributes money for any other purposes than the printing and circulating of handbills, books, and other papers previous to an election or town meeting, or conveying electors to the polls, or music or rent of halls, is guilty of a misdemeanor;" the court stating that if such a contract was entered into for the purpose of evading the statute, it would be void.

A contract for the loan of money which, in the lender's ignorance, is procured to further the election of a certain person, is valid and enforceable.

Thus, the fact that a note and mortgage were given to raise money to use in promoting the candidacy for office and the election of one of the makers, the payee not knowing the use to which the money is to be put, affords no defense to an action by the payee and mortgagee on the note and mortgage. Hale v. Harris, 28 Ky. L. Rep. 1172, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 295, 91 S. W. 660 (where it was stated that the court might not, without evidence, assume that the money was corruptly used).

refused to make over or to transfer to the defendant the interest in and to the patent right for which the note was given; and that they were unable to do so, for the reason that they did not own or have at the time of the execution of the note any such patent right as they claimed to have. By an amendment to the original plea, J. A. J. Henderson set up the defense "that the note sued upon . . . is void, and that the plaintiff cannot recover thereon, for the reason that said note was given for an immoral and illegal consideration, to wit, to purchase political influence and votes in an election held in said county for the purpose of removing the courthouse from Irwinville to Ocilla," and that the payees fully understood that the consideration moving the maker of the note to enter into the contract for the purchase of an interest in the patent right was the agreement that he was to obtain the political influence of the payees to secure the removal of the courthouse, and that the purchase of such interest was a mere blind to cover up such illegal and immoral contract, which was the sole consideration for the giving of the note sued on. The amendment to the plea further averred that the transaction was part of a general scheme whereby certain citizens of Ocilla, including the defendant, in consideration of the agreement on the part of Mitchell & Paulk to exert their political influence in favor of the removal of the courthouse, gave notes in the aggregate sum of $2,500 for Promises by candidate to appoint to office.

A promise by a candidate for electoral office to appoint another his deputy is void and cannot be enforced. Robertson v. Robinson, 65 Ala. 610, 39 Am. Rep. 17.

And an agreement between two candidates for the office of sheriff is void which provides that whichever one is elected shall appoint the other his deputy, and pay him one half of the emoluments. Glover v. Taylor, 38 La. Ann. 634.

Hiring influence or services.

Contracts purchasing or hiring the influence of another to further a particular election are wholly void. Wilcox v. Puryear, 12 Ky. L. Rep. 556; Gaston v. Drake, 14 Nev. 175, 33 Am. Rep. 548; Swayze v. Hull, 8 N. J. L. 54, 14 Am. Dec. 399; King v. Raleigh & P. S. R. Co. 147 N. C. 263, 125 Am. St. Rep. 546, 60 S. E. 1133, 15 Ann. Cas. 40; Nichols v. Mudgett, 32 Vt. 546; Livingston v. Page, 74 Vt. 356, 59 L.R.A. 336, 93 Am. St. Rep. 901, 52 Atl. 965 (furthering a nomination); Whitman v. Ewin, — Tenn. —, 39 S. W. 742; EXCHANGE NAT. BANK v. HENDERSON.

In Whitman v. Ewin, — Tenn. —, 39 S. W. 742 (infra) the court said: "The greater his influence, the more powerful his eloquence, the more persuasive and effective his arts and skill, the more important it is that such powers and capabilities should be preserved and protected, unbought and unpurchasable, for the benefit of the state and the public weal, and only allowed to be brought into pernicious activity from purely patriotic and unselfish motives. . . . All such contracts as the one alleged are corrupt, contrary to public policy, illegal, void, and unenforceable in the courts."

"A contract by which one agrees, for money or other personal profit, to use his efforts, influence, etc., to induce a majority of the voters at an election to vote for a particular candidate or for any proposition, as for a subscription by a city or county in aid of a railroad, is against public policy, 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) and therefore void." Wilcox v. Puryear, supra.

A promissory note is void which was made in consideration that the promisee should give the promisor his interest in pursuing his election to the office of sheriff, the note being payable after the election if the promisor was elected, and no recovery can be had upon it by the promisee against the promisor. Swayze v. Hull, 8 N. J. L. 54, 14 Am. Dec. 399.

So, a contract between partners that one of them should become a candidate for the office of district attorney, the other to use his best efforts to secure his partner's election, and the fees of the office to be divided, is void and will not support an action by the nonofficial partner, alleging the agreement to divide the fees, and that he had rendered services to the other partner in his official capacity. Gaston v. Drake, 14 Nev. 175, 33 Am. Rep. 548.

The same is true of contracts securing the support of newspapers. Thus, a contract by a railroad to pay a newspaper editor for endeavoring in his paper to carry an election authorizing the issue of bonds for the building of a railroad, and to gain for the railroad the good will of the citizens, etc., is void and will not sustain a recovery. King v. Raleigh & P. S. R. Co. 147 N. C. 263, 125 Am. St. Rep. 546, 60 S. E. 1133, 15 Ann. Cas. 40, where the court said: "Contracts for money or personal profit, to use efforts and influence to 'carry an election,' especially an election of this character, are contra bonos mores."

In Livingston v. Page, 74 Vt. 356, 59 L.R.A. 336, 93 Am. St. Rep. 901, 52 Atl. 965, it was held that a contract between a Republican candidate for nomination to the office of Congressman and the publisher of a Democratic newspaper, whereby the latter was to use his influence to secure such nomination, was void as against public policy, and the publisher of the newspaper could not recover upon it. (The plaintiff asked a reasonable compensation, but a verdict was directed against him.)

So, an agreement is void by which a creditor agrees to reduce the debt if the debtor the purchase of a half interest in the patent rights. There was much testimony both for the defendant and plaintiff. Most of the witnesses for the defendant testified that they would not have signed the notes except that they thought that they were signing them in order to get the influence and notes of Mitchell & Paulk for the removal of the county site from Irwinville to Ocilla. William Henderson who represented those interested in having the county site removed to Ocilla, and who procured the notes, stated to each one signing that Mitchell & Paulk would use their influence for Ocilla, and it was on this representation that the notes were signed. It appears from the evidence that Mitchell did use his influence in behalf of Ocilla; in fact, he favored the removal to Ocilla before there was put in motion the scheme to sell the stock in the corporation which was organized to manufacture and sell the patented implement. But Paulk did not vote for, or use his influence for, Ocilla. Some of the signers of the notes received certificates of stock in the corporation. Some of them, including the defendant, gave written recommendations of the merits of the patented implement. The defendant testified that "part of the consideration of that note was subscription to stock in that corporation," that "the stock was sent to me inclosed in an envelop," but that he did not return it; as he did not know who sent it, and did not consider the stock worth anything. A patent was duly issued, and a will "work" for the creditor's election to office, and it will not effect a reduction of the debt. Whitman v. Ewin, — Tenn. —, 39 S. W. 742.

See also under the Missouri statute, Keating v. Hyde, infra.

The same is true of an agreement to cancel a debt if the debtor would do what he could for the creditor's election to office. Nichols v. Mudgett, 32 Vt. 546, where it was argued that the agreement did not necessarily mean that the debtor, who was politically opposed to the creditor, should vote for him, but it was clear that he had used his influence for him. The court said: "Such bargains cannot be enforced in law. And the reason why they cannot be enforced is not merely because they are made criminal acts by statute, or are opposed to the provisions of the Constitution, but because of their own inherent turpitude, because they are corrupt and corrupting because they are destructive to public virtue and the welfare of the community. In republican governments especially, whatever tends to destroy the purity of elections should be guarded against with the strictest watchfulness, and pursued with the most prompt condemnation by court and legislators."

The default of the person whose influence is purchased will not alter the case. Thus, it was held that the court would not give its assistance to the recovery of money sent by the plaintiff to the defendant, with the request that the defendant use his influence to get the plaintiff nominated to the electoral office of clerk of a police court, although the defendant used his influence not for the plaintiff, but against him. Liness v. Hesing, 44 Ill. 114, 92 Am. Dec. 153.

It has been held that contracts to secure a nomination are equally bad with those to secure an election. Livingston v. Page, supra, where the court said: "When the voters are unevenly divided into two parties, the nomination of the stronger organization is usually equivalent to an election. And when party action is less decisive, the subsequent efforts of the voters are ordinarily confined to a selection from the candidates regularly presented. The individual voter of a large electorate can seldom give an effective expression to a choice that is not in line with the action of some party convention. To secure a free and exact expression of the sovereign will, there must be a proper selection of candidates, as well as an honest election. If the choice of delegates and the action of the nominating convention is improperly determined, the election ballots will fail to express the real judgment of the voters."

See also Keating v. Hyde, 23 Mo. App. 555, infra; Liness v. Hesing, 44 Ill. 114, 92 Am. Dec. 153, supra; and Strasburger v. Burk (Md.) 13 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 607, infra.

But in Sizer v. Daniels, 66 Barb. 426, it was held that services rendered to a political committee by their agent under a contract with him before the nomination of any candidate were not against the statutes making it a misdemeanor to contribute money to further the election of a particular person or a particular ticket.

—hiring services.

Between the hiring of influence and the hiring of services there is sometimes no material distinction.

In Whitman v. Ewin, supra, a contract to "work" for a candidate's election was held to be void.

And in Keating v. Hyde, 23 Mo. App. 555, it was held that an agreement not to enforce an obligation if the obligor would "work" for the nomination of the obligee as candidate for an electoral office was void, where the statute made it a misdemeanor to give or contract to give anything to another who should endeavor to procure the election of a person to office. (The court stated that it would not be illegal to compensate a person for merely advertising a candidate by means of papers, etc., where one acted as an advertiser, and not as an advocate.)

But, on the other hand, it has been held that it is not necessarily illegal to hire a charter procured for the corporation. The original payees of the note, Mitchell & Paulk, denied in their testimony that the consideration of the note was their vote and influence in behalf of Ocilla, but insisted that it was given for an interest in a patented fertilizer distributor, and for stock in a corporation to manufacture and sell the distributor. The jury returned a verdict for the defendant. A motion for a new trial was overruled, and the plaintiff excepted.

1. The main question to be determined in this case is whether the promissory note sued on is void in the hands of an innocent purchaser for value, who took it before due and without notice of any defense. The Civil Code, § 4286, declares: "The bona fide holder for value of a bill, draft, or promissory note, or other negotiable instrument, who receives the same before it is due, and without notice of any defect or defense, shall be protected from any defenses set up by the maker, acceptor, or indorser, except the following: (1) Non est factum. (2) Gambling, or immoral and illegal consideration. (3) Fraud in its procurement." It is insisted by the defendant that the real consideration of the note sued on was the votes and political influence of the payees of the note, Mitchell & Paulk, in agreeing to thus assist the defendant and others in having the county site of Irwin county removed from Irwinville to Ocilla, where the defendant lived; that, although the plaintiff claims that the person to present the views of the candidate when he cannot personally do it.

Thus, it was held that a contract by which a candidate for Vice President of the United States employed a person to speak in advocacy of his candidacy in his native state of Indiana, when sued upon in the New York courts, will be presumed to have been made in Indiana, and unless it appears that such contract is void in Indiana, it will be presumed to be a good contract, in the absence of averment to the contrary. Murphy v. English, 64 How. Pr. 362, where the court said: "No authority has been cited to show that it is an offense at common law for a candidate for a national office, who could not personally present his individual views of national policy over a wide area of constituency, to employ and compensate a person for that purpose."

In Howard v. Jacoby, 3 Pa. Co. Ct. 436, it was said obiter that the statute was not intended to prevent the hiring of a person to canvass for the hirer as candidate.

And a contract with a laborer was enforced against one who hired him to travel through the country to assist in putting up and taking down a tent which his employer used for his meetings in which he agitated the election of a certain presidential candidate. Hurley v. Van Wagner, 28 Barb. 109. The court considered that Jackson v. Walker, 5 Hill, 27, supra, was not to be extended beyond the circumstances of the case, and that the legislature did not intend to prohibit matters of the nature concerned in the action. This case, together with Sizer v. Daniels, 66 Barb. 439, was distinguished in Foley v. Speir, 100 N. Y. 558, 3 N. E. 477, as not being contrary to the decision in that case.

Contracts involving furnishing food or drink to voters.

The statutes prohibiting the furnishing of meat, etc., or intoxicating liquors, to voters, are frequent, and contracts involving a breach of these statutes are void, and will not support a recovery by the person furnishing such supplies, against the candidate directing that they be furnished. Ribban v. Crickett, 1 Bos. & P. 264; Lofthouse v. Wharton, 1 Campb. 550, note.

And personally voting against a candidate will not save contracts of this character. Thus, in Duke v. Asbee, 33 N. C. (11 Ired. L.) 112, it was held under the state statutes where a liquor seller sued a candidate upon a contract in which he furnished the defendant, at his request, such liquor as the defendant and his political friends might desire, that it was immaterial that the plaintiff alleged that he did not further the candidacy of the defendant, that he was opposed to him politically, and voted against him, the court holding that the jurors should have been instructed that, if, from the testimony, they believed it was the intention of the defendant to influence the election by the meat and drink furnished by the plaintiff, and that intention was known to the plaintiff, the latter could not recover.

A contract with the defendant by which the plaintiff was to supply intoxicating liquors to electors, together with his influence upon them for the nomination of the defendant's father, was held void in Strasburger v. Burk (Md.) 13 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 607, although the election was a primary election for the nomination, as this election was recognized by the law, and the supplying of liquor to electors was a criminal offense, and any contract made to violate its provisions was necessarily void.

But it was held in Ward v. Nanney, 3 Car. & P. 399, that an innkeeper supplying beer to voters on the request of a person who was not a candidate, but who was canvassing for one, could recover from such person so canvassing, under the English statute 7 & 8 Wm. III.

And it was held in Thomas v. Harries, 6 Car. & P. 616, that if a person who is not himself a candidate, and who is not known to the party who supplies refreshments to be an agent of a candidate, opens a public house at an election, and orders supplies for the voters, he is personally liable to pay, and the treating act, 7 & 8 Wm. III., chap. 24, will afford him no defense note was given solely for an interest in a patent right and stock in a corporation which was to manufacture a fertilizer distributor, the real consideration was the votes and political influence of the payees in behalf of Ocilla; that this consideration alone induced the defendant to sign the note; and that such consideration was both immoral and illegal, and the note unenforceable for that reason. Undoubtedly, if the note sued on was not given for the stock in the corporation, or for an interest in the patent right, but was really given for an immoral and illegal consideration, it would be void and unenforceable, even in the hands of an innocent purchaser. Civil Code, § 4286. See Rhodes v. Beall, 73 Ga. 641; Civil Code, § 4253. If the real consideration of the note was the buying of votes and political influence, for the purpose of removing a county site at an election to be held to determine that question, such a consideration will be against public policy, and void. 1 Page on Contracts, § 410, and cases cited. Is the buying of political influence to secure the removal of a county site immoral and illegal?

In the case of Jones v. Dannenberg Co. 112 Ga. 426, 428, 52 L.R.A. 271, 37 S. E. 729, 730, Mr. Justice Little said: "But the issue is still further narrowed to the question whether the averments of the plea set up a contract, the consideration of which was both immoral and illegal. It will be noted that the statute requires these two conditions to exist conjointly to let in the

if the goods were supplied entirely on his credit.

Similarly it was held in Thomas v. Edwards, 2 Mees. & W. 215, 1 Tyrw. & G. 872, that a contract by an innkeeper with a person not authorized by a candidate, to furnish supplies, was valid in the absence of evidence that the innkeeper supplied the meat or drinks with a view to induce the electors to vote for a particular candidate.

A candidate's agent cannot recover from him for money spent for whisky and in other ways prohibited by the statute. Howard v. Jacoby, 3 Pa. Co. Ct. 436, infra.

But in Bayntun v. Cattle, 1 Moody & R. 265, it was held that where a candidate for Parliament had ratified the expenditures made in assistance of his candidacy which were illegal, he could not recover from his agent for such expenditures. (Here it seems they were either ordered or ratified.)

Miscellaneous.

A contract assigning the fees of an office depending upon an election yet to be held is wholly void. Willis v. Weatherford Compress Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 66 S. W. 472.

A check given to a town treasurer to influence the town in voting for bonds for a railroad is void, and the drawee having certified the check as good upon a certain condition, and having paid it, cannot recover from the drawer. Burden Bank v. Phelps, 5 Kan. App. 685, 48 Pac. 938.

A bond given to guarantee or indemnify a taxpayer against any taxes that he might have to pay by reason of the bonding of his town for the benefit of a railroad, by reason of which he joined others in requesting the commissioners to bond the town, is void. Dean v. Clark, 80 Hun, 80, 30 N. Y. Supp. 45.

So, an authorization to an agent to induce votes for the selection of a townsite by the gift of lots is void, and the agent may not require his principal to carry out such gifts of lots, made by the agent. Roby v. Carter, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 295, 25 S. W. 725.

W. 302, where it was agreed between the members of a firm that the election expenses of one of the members should be paid out of the firm moneys, it being considered that his political position would be of an advantage to the firm, the court considered that the contract was, at the most, of doubtful validity; but, the money having been paid out under the agreement, it would not compel the partner to bring it back into the firm assets, it not appearing that it was paid out for any illegal, corrupt, or criminal purpose.

A note given after the election, by a defeated candidate, to persons who printed matter used during the campaign, not at his request, but at the request of the chairman of the committee of the party, is a note without consideration, and cannot be collected by the payee from the maker. Dearborn v. Bowman, 3 Met. 155.

In Harris v. Firth, — N. J. L. —, 68 Atl. 1064, it was held that "a promise in writing to pay the sum of $500 'on the day after my nomination for county clerk in the year 1900, for value received, is not ipso facto contra bonos mores, nor against public policy. While not valid as a negotiable promissory note, it is valid as a promise to pay money, unless evidence aliunde be adduced from which illegality in the inception of the contract may reasonably be inferred." There was no evidence admitted to show that the contract depended upon services for the maker's election, or that it was a gambling contract.

It is not intended to include cases where notes payable after the maker was elected were held to be wagering contracts.

II. Agreements tending to influence appointments to office.

Cases of agreement between the holder of an office and his deputy are not included, nor other cases of agreements to divide official fees or salary. For validity of agreement to divide fees or salary of public officers, see the note to Anderson v. Branstrom, 43 L.R.A. (N.S.) 422. Agreements as to the appointment of a person to a pridefense. As was said in the opinion in the case of Rhodes v. Beall, supra, 'the statute which makes such a contract illegal and void must also make the same a crime, or the act itself must be immoral and contra bonos mores.' An examination of the plea discloses the fact that its averments do not designate the offense for which the husband of the plaintiff in error was arrested, nor can we gather from it the nature of the crime with which he was charged. It may have been a felony, and, equally as well, it may have been a misdemeanor." And again, at page 430 of 112 Ga.: "So that we think that if we confine the averments made in the plea to their narrowest limits, and assume, because it was not otherwise pleaded, that the criminal offense for the settlement of which it is averred that the note and mortgage were given was a misdemeanor, then the consideration was an illegal one. Was it an immoral one in the sense of the statute? One of the definitions of 'immoral' given in the Standard Dictionary is 'hostile to the welfare of the general public.' And Mr. Bouvier defines immorality to be 'that which is contra bonos mores;' and, in defining what contracts are contra bonos mores, the same author says, among other things which he names, that those which have a tendency to mischievous or pernicious consequences are void as being contrary to good morals." Is the buying of votes and political influence a crime under our law? Under the definition cited above, selling or buying votes or political influence vate official duty such as administrator or receiver, etc., are not considered.

It is the present American common law that all agreements tending to influence appointments to public office are absolutely void. Probably the same is substantially true to-day in England, though the courts were a good while in reaching the conclusion.

By the statute of 12 Rich. II. chap. 2, certain officers were required to be sworn that they would not make certain appointments "for any gift or brokerage, favor or affection." There were later statutes restricting certain farmings or sellings of offices, and by 5 & 6 Edw. VI. chap. 16, it was provided that sales in deputation, etc., of offices relating to the administration of justice or the collection of the King's revenue (with certain exceptions) should cause the forfeiture or loss of the office, and that contracts relating to such sales, etc., should be void. The provisions of this act were extended to other offices, etc., by the statute of 49 Geo. III. chap. 126. By the statute of 6 & 7 Wm. III., army officers were required to take an oath that they had not paid or promised any money or gratuity for the commission.

In Filson v. Himes, 5 Pa. 452, 47 Am. Dec. 422, the court said: "Is not the procurement of an appointment to office by private influence illegal on the ground of public policy? In England, a public office is yet so much a subject of private property that the sale of it was not prohibited before the 5 & 6 Edw. VI. chap. 16, which interdicted it in respect to offices which concern the administration of justice, or the public revenue, and the 49 Geo. III. chap. 126, which interdicted it in respect to offices in the gift of the Crown, and in certain specific cases. Had all traffic of the sort been deemed, from the first, illegal at the common law, these statutes would have been unnecessary; and hence it is, perhaps, that the English judges handle transactions like the present with the utmost tenderness. But, notwithstanding what was said by Mr. Justice Burrough, in Richardson v. Mellish, 2 Bing. 252, 9 J. B. Moore. 435, 1 Car. & P. 241, Ryan & M. 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

66, 3 L. J. C. P. 265, 27 Revised Rep. 603, that public policy is an unruly horse that carries you, when you bestride it, you know not whither, the settled law of this day is, that this same public policy may render the sale of an office illegal even in England; and the Chief Justice Best, arguing in restraint of its influence, conceded in the same case, that wherever the proof clearly puts the contract on the contravention of public policy, the principle must prevail. And there are many English cases in which the plaintiff broke down precisely on that ground. But were the English common law otherwise, such contracts could not be tolerated by the courts of a country whose government is founded theoretically on the most pure and exalted public virtue."

"We have no doubt that all contracts based upon the sale of, or traffic in, offices of any description, at this day, and in this country, are void at common law, as against public policy." Eddy v. Capron, 4 R. I. 394, 67 Am. Dec. 541.

Early cases.

(Cases between principal and deputy, or for a division of fees of an office, are excluded.)

In Vernon's Case, 2 Co. Litt. 234a, the appointment was held void under the statute of Edw. VI., where the cofferer of the King's house, for a consideration from A, surrendered his office to the King, that A might be appointed, which was done.

Similarly, a bond given for like action in regard to the office of warden of the Fleet prison was held void under such statute, the office being one touching the administration or execution of justice.

So it was held in Virginia that a bond was void under the statute of Edw. VI., which was given by one deputy sheriff to another deputy sheriff for a certain definite sum of money, the consideration being the procuring of the influence of the obligee with the sheriff to secure the appointment of the obligor. Noel v. Fisher, 3 Call. (Va.) 215.

is undoubtedly contra bonos mores, but, for it to be both immoral and illegal, it must appear that the act is also a crime under our law, or that it is of itself immoral and opposed to public policy; for, as observed by Mr. Justice Little in the Jones Case, supra, these two conditions must exist conjointly to let in the defense. We hold that the act of buying political influence is against public policy. Is it also illegal under our statute to buy votes and political influence? The Penal Code, § 665, declares: "If any person shall (1) buy or sell, or offer to buy or sell, a vote, or shall be in any way concerned in buying or selling, or contribute money or any other thing of value for the purpose of buying a vote at any election in this state, or in any county thereof; . . . he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. . . . The hiring of workers qualified to vote in said election or primary before or on the day of election, for the purpose of canvassing for or influencing votes in behalf of any candidate, or the being hired for said purpose, is a misdemeanor." Under the averments of the defendant's plea, the note sued upon "is void," and "the plaintiff cannot recover thereon, for the reason that said note was given for an immoral and illegal consideration; to wit, to purchase political influence and votes in an election held in said county for the purpose of removing the courthouse from Irwinnville to Ocilla." There was evidence tending to show that such was the consideration of the note sued on, and the

(But in Godbolt's Case, Leon, pt. 4, p. 33, it was held that the sale of a bailiwick of a hundred was not within the statute of Edw. VI., as it was not an office concerning the administration of justice, nor an office of trust; but the facts of the case are not reported.)

The sale of the good will of a business as law stationer, etc., together with an agreement that the seller would use his best efforts to have the buyer appointed in his stead as collector of taxes and distributor of stamps, is an illegal contract under the statutes of Edw. VI. and Geo. III., and will not support an action by the buyer against the seller to carry it out. Hopkins v. Prescott, 4 C. B. 678, 16 L. J. C. P. N. S. 259, 11 Jur. 562.

But there are early cases which were decided upon grounds of public policy.

In Kingston v. Pierepont, 1 Vern. 5, it was held that a gift in a will of a certain sum to procure by all lawful means a dukedom within a year after testator's decease was void (but the year had already elapsed when the suit was brought).

This was followed in the case of Edgerton v. Brownlow, 4 H. L. Cas. 1, 23 L. J. Ch. N. S. 348, 18 Jur. 71, 24 Eng. Rul. Cas. 118, where it was held that a proviso in a will defeating limitations in case the life holder of an estate should not become a duke or marquis was void as against public policy.

And it was held in Rex v. Pollman, 2 Campb. 229, 11 Revised Rep. 689, that it is a misdemeanor at common law to conspire, for money, to procure the appointment of a person by the authorities to an office in the customs.

One of the most influential of the cases on the public-policy aspect of the subject is Garforth v. Fearson, 1 H. Bl. 328, note, 2 Revised Rep. 778 (not strictly within our scope), where, in holding that an agreement that one who receives a customs office by the recommendation of another shall hold the profits of such office at the disposal of the other will not support an action in assumpsit, the court considered not only that the arrangement was prohibited by the statute 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

utes of 12 Rich. II. and 5 & 6 Edw. VI., but that it was illegal in itself.

So, contracts for the sale of the appointment to the command of a ship in the East India Company's service were held illegal, as this was a position virtually in a branch of the public service. Blachford v. Preston, 8 T. R. 89; Thomson v. Thomson, 7 Ves. Jr. 470, 6 Revised Rep. 151.

Thus, in Blachford v. Preston, supra, where a payment was made to the person securing the appointment, with an agreement that he would repay it on the appointment of the payor's successor, it was held that such repayment could not be enforced on the appointment of such successor.

Where one resigned command of a ship in the East India Company's service in favor of another, in consideration of the latter's agreement for an annuity, and thereafter the company, in seeking to break up the custom of such contracts, paid the promisor a compensation or allowance for any loss of the sale of his position, it was held that equity would not decree payment, out of such compensation, of the annuity or its equivalent, as the contract was illegal. Thomson v. Thomson, supra.

—early applications in equity for relief.

Generally as to injunction in favor of party in pari delicto, against enforcing or otherwise proceeding with illegal contract, see the note to Basket v. Moss, 48 L.R.A. 842.

The early equity cases seem to have refused effectual relief against contracts for office, but later the court granted relief in some cases, in which the essential illegality of such contracts was recognized.

In Berrisford v. Done, 1 Vern. 98, relief in equity was refused against a bond (except as to interest thereon) given for the consideration that the obligee should surrender his commission as captain in the army in Ireland, the obligor, his lieutenant, expecting to get the place; though the appointing authority, on accepting the resignation, declined to appoint the obligor.

So, in Symonds v. Gibson, 2 Vern. 308, jury under the evidence was authorized to find such to be the case. The evidence showed that W. A. Mitchell and J. B. D. Paulk were partners, owing a certain patent right to a fertilizer distributor, and were without funds with which to promote it. They endeavored to interest certain citizens of Ocilla in the patent, including the maker of the note, and to sell them a half interest in it, and also stock in the corporation created to promote the enterprise. The defendant and other Ocilla citizens were also interested in the campaign then pending to have the county site of Irwin county removed from Irwinnville to Ocilla. Various conversations were had between the citizens of Ocilla, including the defendant, and one or both members of the firm of Mitchell & Paulk, which tended to show an agreement that, if Mitchell & Paulk would vote for and use their political influence in favor of Ocilla, the defendant and the other citizens of Ocilla associated with him in endeavoring to have the county site removed would take stock in the corporation to promote the patent right. The evidence for the defendant tended to show that Mitchell promised to vote and use his influence for Ocilla, and that his partner, Paulk, would do the same. Paulk did not vote for or use his influence for Ocilla, and Mitchell & Paulk both denied selling or offering to sell their vote or influence for Ocilla. J. A. J. Henderson testified in part as follows: "There was a conversation between Mr. Mitchell and myself, in which he relief was refused except as to the interest on bonds given to one who had the promise of appointment of himself as purser on one of the King's ships, in consideration that he procure the appointment of the obligor to the position.

So, in Ivye v. Ashe, Colles, P. C. 267, the court of chancery refused to give relief against a bond given in consideration that the obligee would procure for the obligor a commission in the marines, as officers of marine regiments were not within the statute of 6 & 7 Wm. III., requiring commission army officers to make oaths that they had not paid any money or gratuity for their commissions.

But, on the other hand, in Law v. Law, 3 P. Wms. 391, it was held that equity would require that a bond be delivered up which was given in consideration of the procurement by the obligee of a place with the excise commissioners for the obligor. The court stated that though the excise was no part of the revenue at the time of the statute of Edw. VI., yet it might be "within the reason and mischief" of that law, which was rather remedial than penal.

And in Morris v. McCulloch, 1 Amb. 432, the chancery court, per Henley, Ld. Ch., in giving judgment for the refund of money paid for the procurement by "interest" of a commission for the plaintiff in the marines (he being later discharged on account of his having been a livery servant), said: "I lay down this rule, that if a man sells his interest, to procure a person an office of trust or service under the government, it is a contract of turpitude; it is acting against the Constitution, by which the government ought to be served by fit and able persons, recommended by the proper officers of the Crown for their abilities, and with purity. This case is within the reason of the determinations upon marriage brokerage and post obit bonds. It is one of the most useful jurisdictions of the court, and ought to be exercised upon all occasions."

consideration that he procure the promotion of a cornet, as the contract was void. The court stated in effect that the principle of particeps criminis did not apply when the granting of relief by the court would tend to suppress vicious practices.

In Osborne v. Williams, 18 Ves. Jr. 382, 11 Revised Rep. 218, affirmative relief was granted to a son's estate against his father's estate from a contract between father and son by which the father should gain for the son the father's position as captain of a packet hired by the postoffice. The court considered the contract void as a fraud both upon the postoffice authorities (it being done without their knowledge), and also under the ship registry acts; and that the parties were not really in pari delicto, the fault being considered as mostly that of the father.

It may be noted that in Hartwell v. Hartwell, 4 Ves. Jr. 815, which arose on a bill in equity on a bond, for an annuity, against the executrix of the obligor, to have the bond established against his assets, the court retained the bill pending an action which the plaintiff might bring at law. The defense was that the obligor, in succession to his deceased father, was appointed captain of a government mail packet, his appointment being secured by the influence of friends, who insisted as a condition that he should pay an annuity to his mother for his life, and for this the bond was given to her.

Sales of local offices by local public authorities.

There is some difference of opinion as to the power of local public authorities to sell a local office.

In Meredith v. Ladd, 2 N. H. 517, it was held that, in the absence of statute on the subject, the sale by a town of the office of constable is void, and the town may not recover upon a promissory note given by the intended constable to the town for the price of sale.

So, in Johnson County v. Mullikin, 7 Blackf. 301, it was held that county com-told me, if we would get up this subscription for the stock for this patent right, we would have the following of him and Mr. Paulk; and he connected Mr. Young with it. He said that we would secure that district over there that they lived in, secure their influence and get that district. I thought that was a fair and square understanding as I ever had [with] anybody in my life. I was anxious about the courthouse removal question, and they were rather against us in a political way, and, when you all got it up, we did it for the purpose of securing that influence. That was my understanding. . . . The only thing that moved me to give the note was to get that political influence. That was the agreement with Mr. Mitchell. I remember one conversation with Mr. Paulk in Ocilla before the election; and I think the words he used were: 'Well, if you take this stock here in Ocilla, the interest in our patent right, it is going to change my feelings towards you. I see you are all interested in me, and I will be more so towards Ocilla.' Our political feelings had always been bad; that is the conversation in substance that we had. . . . Before the notes were signed, I had an agreement with Mr. Mitchell, whereby he was to use his influence in the election. As near as I can give it to you, it was that if we would get up this subscription, take half interest in this patent right, Paulk and his influence would be with us in this courthouse fight; and, after it was over, Mr.

missioners could not recover upon a promissory note given to them in consideration that they would appoint a certain person a collector of revenue, the amount of the note when collected to go to the county and be part of its funds, as the note was void, as given upon a sale of a public office. The court said: "It does not matter whether the office be sold in violation of an express statute or not. If the bestowment of it be for a money consideration, it is in contravention of public policy, and equally void."

In Groton v. Waldborough, 11 Me. 306, 26 Am. Dec. 530, it was held that a constable could not recover from a town the price he had paid for his office, which was put up for auction and sold by the town, for although the contract was illegal, the court would leave the parties where they had placed themselves.

In Alvord v. Collin, 20 Pick. 418 (where it seems that the matter was not necessary to the decision), the court considered that the office of collector of taxes was not a public office, and that while it would probably be illegal for the town to sell the office to the lowest bidder, at all events, that it was not illegal to sell the office for a certain figure, the theory being that the town would not be compelled to comply with the bid unless the bidder was a suitable person.

These suggestions bore fruit in subsequent Massachusetts cases. Thus, in Spencer v. Jones, 6 Gray, 502, it was held that a vote of a town that the taxes be collected by the lowest bidder, without qualification, is void, and the town may not recover of him the amount of his bid, although he had, before the suit, collected the taxes of the year.

But in Howard v. Proctor, 7 Gray, 128, it was held that a vote of a town to let out the collection of taxes to the lowest bidder the town will accept is valid, and the person so chosen is a good collector.

In Wilkes-Barre v. Rockafellow, 171 Pa. 177, 30 L.R.A. 393, 50 Am. St. Rep. 795, 33 Atl. 269, where a city, as the price of the office of treasurer, exacted from a candidate an agreement to pay interest on funds in his hands as treasurer, it was held that this contract was not capable of enforcement against the treasurer's sureties.

It may be noted that in Thetford v. Hubbard, 22 Vt. 440, it was held that a town had a right to sell the office of first constable to the highest bidder, and to collect from him upon his promissory note given for the purchase, under the statute which provided that "the inhabitants of any town shall have liberty to agree with some suitable person to fill the office of first constable, in such method as they shall judge most advantageous, and such person shall afterwards be chosen by the town."

Use of influence.

All contracts for the purchase of one's influence in the appointment to public office are wholly void.

A promise to pay a certain sum per annum to a person who was, in consideration therefor, to use influence with the governor to appoint the promisor to a certain office, is void as against public policy, and no action will lie upon the promise. Faurie v. Morin, 4 Mart. (La.) 39, 6 Am. Dec. 701.

Most of the cases arise where the holder of an office for a consideration resigns in favor of the payor, and is to advocate his appointment.

A contract by a postmaster for the sale of his goods, etc., with an agreement to secure (or to endeavor to secure) the office for the purchaser, is void. Eilson v. Himes, 5 Pa. 452, 47 Am. Dec. 422; Edwards v. Randle, 63 Ark. 319, 36 L.R.A. 174, 58 Am. St. Rep. 108, 38 S. W. 343; Harris v. Chamberlain, 126 Mich. 280, 85 N. W. 728.

The title to the goods will not pass under such a contract. Harris v. Chamberlain, supra.

An agreement is void that one party shall transfer to the other a lease and certain goods in a store, and secure within six months the transfer of the postoffice to the location of the store, and the appointment of the transferee to the position of postmaster, and the seller cannot recover a balance upon the contract, all of which he has performed except the removal of the post-

Mitchell told me he was never so surprised in his life as he was when John Paulk didn't do it. I think Mr. Mitchell did use his influence for us. The substance was that if we went into this company and carried out that plan and got these notes, Paulk's influence would be for us." R. L. Henderson, a witness for the defendant, and who was defendant in another suit on a similar note given by him to Mitchell & Paulk, testified: "What I gave the note for was for the influence of Mr. Mitchell and Mr. Paulk to help us remove the courthouse to Ocilla. That was what I would consider the consideration. The negotiations were carried on by my brother, William Henderson. He represented to me that that would secure the influence of Mr.

Mitchell and Mr. Paulk." William Henderson, a witness for the defendant, and also a defendant in his own case, testified in part as follows: "I know W. A. Mitchell and J. B. D. Paulk. Along in May, 1907, at the time these distributor notes were given, there was a political campaign going on here in Irwin county about removing the court house from Irwinville to Ocilla. I was considerably interested in that campaign, and thought of nothing else about that time. I was in favor of bringing the courthouse here. J. B. D. Paulk had political influence, and had always been strong, politically, here. I know what his attitude was about the courthouse removal question. I didn't hear him express himself, but it seemed to me like he ought to have been in office and the appointment of the defendant, as the contract is indivisible. Filson v. Himes, supra (where it was said that if a price had been put upon the illegal part of the consideration, it might have been deducted).

Similarly, a person who had paid for a sutler's stock on being appointed, through the seller's influence, his successor by the local military authority, cannot recover the price paid, though the Washington authorities fail to confirm the appointment; nor can he offer evidence that the seller had falsely represented to him that the approval of the local officer was all that was required. Haas v. Fenlon, 8 Kan. 601.

So, an action by the purchaser to recover the price paid upon the contract failed, as the contract was void, and the court would not lend its aid to either party, in Edwards v. Randle, 63 Ark. 319, 36 L.R.A. 174, 58 Am. St. Rep. 108, 38 S. W. 343, where the defendant, for a certain sum, agreed to sell to the plaintiff his postoffice fixtures and furniture, further agreeing to resign his office and recommend the plaintiff as his successor, and permit him to recover the fees of the office from the time of his actual appointment as successor until the time that he was installed, etc., and the defendant had done all that was possible, but could not remove the fixtures, etc., without the permission of his superior.

But where no execution had been had of the contract except the payment of certain money by the purchaser, it was held that although the contract was illegal, he might recover the money he had paid. McCall v. Whaley, 52 Tex. Civ. App. 646, 115 S. W. 658 (affirmed on rehearing, 115 S. W. 659), where, under the agreement, one party was to sell to the other certain personal property and a store and storehouse and lot, and was to resign as postmaster, and use his influence for the appointment of such successor.

A note given in consideration that the payee, who was the United States mail agent, should resign his office and use his influence for the appointment of the maker of the note as his successor, cannot be recovered upon (where it is found by the jury that the plaintiff was a nominal plaintiff, and that the payee was the real holder of the note). Meachan v. Dow, 32 Vt. 721.

A note is void which is given in consideration of an agreement by the person to be benefited by it that he will resign the office of deputy sheriff, and endeavor to secure said office for the person for whose accommodation the note was made, and the person endeavoring to sell his office cannot recover upon the note, as the consideration was in fact the sale of the office of deputy sheriff, an office of trust, which concerns the administration of justice. Carleton v. Whitchee, 5 N. H. 196.

A mortgage is void at common law which is given to secure a sum of money to be paid to the holder of an office of the United States for resigning it, and for the expenses and compensation of persons to go to Washington to procure the authorities there to accept his resignation, and to appoint a certain person as his successor. And the court will enjoin its foreclosure under the power of sale therein. Basket v. Moss, 115 N. C. 448, 48 L.R.A. 842, 44 Am. St. Rep. 463, 20 S. E. 733 (where the court quoted the local statute making void bargains, etc., given for the purchase or sale of offices the sale of which is contrary to law.)

An obligation is against public policy and void which is given in consideration of an agreement that the obligee would resign his office as port physician under the United States "in favor of the obligor," although it was not intended that the obligee should recommend the appointment of the obligor, or use any influence to have him appointed, notwithstanding that there was no statute in the state on the subject. Eddy v. Capron, 4 R. I. 394, 67 Am. Dec. 541. (The court does not point out how there can be a resignation "in favor of" a person without the resignor recommending such person, but as the other party had himself formerly held the office, it is possible that the resignation was not in favor of anyone, the other party taking his chances.)

Miscellaneous.

In Stroud v. Smith, 4 Houst. (Del.) 448,

Ocilla. I discussed this matter with W. A. Mitchell a number of times and with Paulk one time. I told Mitchell that there was a little politics in this thing if nothing else, and more politics than anything else; and if he could carry J. B. D. Paulk and Joe Young, and he told me that Joe's wife was already for Ocilla, that Joe would do anything in the world for him, and they would help us in this election. I asked him over again about Paulk, if he would help us; and he said, yes, he would if we the people of Ocilla got up this, and I told him I could get it right away if they would promise to do that. He didn't say just that if the people of Ocilla would get up this money for this interest, but that was what we were talking about, and what we were leading to. Mr. Mitchell was wanting to get stock for this patent right, and I was wanting him to promise to help us in the courthouse election, and told him, if he would do it, I could get it up right off, and he was perfectly willing himself. I asked him if Mr. Paulk would favor Ocilla if these notes were signed up, and he said he would; and I told him, 'I can go and get it up in two hours.' Other witnesses for the defendant testified substantially to the same effect as those above quoted.

One cannot read the testimony in this case, and not be impressed with the idea that it was understood between one of the partners (Mitchell) and the defendant, J. A. J. Henderson, and the other witnesses who testified that "the consideration causing me to sign this note and indorse the others was the agreement I had with Mitchell for his and Paulk's influence in the election," that the citizens of Ocilla were to get the votes and influence of the firm of Mitchell & Paulk for Ocilla, in consideration for the notes. If Mitchell, a member of the firm of Mitchell & Paulk, agreed to sell, in connection with a firm transaction, the votes and influence of the firm, such agreement would taint the whole transaction, and his copartner would be affected. A contract based upon such a consideration would not only be immoral and against public policy, but would be illegal as well. It would be both illegal and immoral. Such a contract cannot be enforced under our law. The legislature of the state, by the statute quoted from above, has wisely endeavored to throw around our elections every safeguard to prevent corrupt practices at and preceding elections held in this state, and makes the buying or selling or offering to buy or sell votes at any election a misdemeanor.

Under § 665 of the Penal Code, supra, it is illegal to sell or offer to sell votes "at any election in this state." If, therefore, it was held that an agreement for a money consideration by which two employees of a postoffice exchanged their positions was void and would not be enforced.

Where an arrangement was made between a city treasurer and one who became his successor, that the city treasurer would run for mayor, that his successor would run for city treasurer, and on being elected would enable the former treasurer to handle the funds, he being in default to the city, it was held that the bond given by the former treasurer to the treasurer for the handling of the funds was void. Cobbs v. Hixson, 75 Mich. 260, 4 L.R.A. 682, 42 N. W. 818.

The mandate of a labor union commanding public officers who are members of it to appoint a certain person to office is void, and punishment for disobedience of such mandate will be set aside with damages, notwithstanding the pledge of such members of such labor union to yield obedience to all its laws and legal summons, etc., and not to do anything prejudicial to the best interest of the association, as such pledge is binding on the makers only in so far as those purposes are lawful and are to be attained by lawful means. Schneider v. Local Union No. 60, 116 La. 270, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 891, 114 Am. St. Rep. 549, 40 So. 700, 7 Ann. Cas. 868.

For obligation of members of labor union as to political matters, see the note to Schneider v. Local Union No. 60, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 891.

Where a promissory note is founded on a sufficient consideration, one who signs as a surety upon a promise that the maker will be appointed to public office cannot avoid the note, as the element of illegality did not enter into the real consideration. Graham v. Marks, 98 Ga. 67, 25 S. E. 931.

In Outon v. Rodes, 3 A. K. Marsh. 432, 13 Am. Dec. 193, it was held that a contract to resign an office and obtain the appointment of the successor for a consideration was against the statute of Edw. VI., and, if not, was against public policy; but a judgment on a note growing out of a transaction of this kind would not be enjoined on the failure of the person to whom the office had been farmed fully to perform his duty, where the bill to enjoin did not disclose the turpitude of the transaction, but it only appeared on the allegations of the person who had procured the judgment. (It does not appear just how the turpitude was not shown by the enjoining party, and how it was shown by the party who was sought to be enjoined.) The decision in this case is misstated in Eversole v. Holliday, 131 Ky. 202, 114 S. W. 1195, where it was held that a sheriff was not precluded from an action requiring his deputy to account because the sheriff might have procured his office by an illegal bargain with the former sheriff and the defendant, which included the agreement to appoint the defendant his deputy. B. B. B.

the consideration of the note sued on was in payment or part payment for the political influence and votes of Mitchell and Paulk, even though a part of the consideration was an interest in a patent right, or stock in a corporation to promote the patent right, still the plaintiff would not be entitled to recover on the notes as against the defendant, if the real consideration was based upon the purchasing of the votes and political influence of the payees in favor of Ocilla. The jury has found, in effect, that such was the consideration of the notes sued on, and we think there was sufficient evidence to support their verdict.

2. The first, second, third, and fourth grounds of the motion for a new trial raised substantially the same question. Evidence was admitted by the court, over objection, which tended to show that the inducement to the defendant to sign the note sued on, and to others who were parties to the scheme and who signed similar notes, was the votes and political influence of the payees, Mitchell & Paulk, in helping to remove the county site from Irwinville to Ocilla, where the defendant and the others who signed similar notes resided. It is insisted that the evidence objected to was irrelevant, and that that which referred to the inducement offered to others to sign similar notes was as to a matter between other parties. Under the ruling made in the first division of this opinion, it follows that evidence which tended to show that the consideration of the note sued on was the votes and political influence of the payees of the note in favor of Ocilla was admissible for that purpose. It is difficult to prove an express consideration of the kind alleged. No one would readily admit that he was buying or selling a vote. As one witness expressed it, "it was a pretty ticklish thing coming out that way with a man like him, to what looked like buying him, and I wanted to go as far as I could." Slight circumstances, therefore, might shed great light on such a transaction; and, where there was a general scheme to promote a patent right, on one side, and a general scheme to have a county site removed, on the other side, conversations between the parties to the two general schemes which tended to show what the real consideration of the notes sued on was were admissible for that purpose. Nor can it be said, under the facts of this case, that the evidence of some of the witnesses is admissible as being res inter alios acta, because they were not parties to the present suit.

3. The fifth ground of the motion assigns error because the court admitted in evidence, over objection, the testimony of the defendant's witness, R. L. Henderson, as follows: "In a conversation after the courthouse election I stated to Mr. Mitchell that was the consideration of my note, and the reason I went into the thing was to help out in the removal of the courthouse by Mr. Paulk's influence, and he, Mr. Mitchell, stated that he regretted very much that J. B. D. Paulk did not help us to remove the courthouse." The objection was that this conversation occurred after the transaction, and was merely hearsay, and not binding on the parties. This evidence was admissible as being in the nature of an admission.

4. The court allowed H. B. Sutton, one of the defendant's witnesses, to testify, over objections of the plaintiff, as follows: "I had a conversation with W. A. Mitchell during the courthouse campaign in 1907 about the subscription to certain stock or buying half interest in a patent right for a guano distributor, and he was trying to get me to subscribe, and we were talking about the political situation about removing the courthouse; and I told him I was very sorry that J. B. D. Paulk wasn't with us, and he told me that all Ocilla would have to do would be to buy this stock, and Paulk would come in all right. I don't remember whether I ever told this conversation to William Henderson or any other parties here in Ocilla or not." It is insisted that this conversation was not had with any of the parties to this suit, and did not appear to have been communicated to either of them, so that no one could have contracted on the faith of it. We think the evidence was properly admitted, for the reason given in the second division of this opinion.

5. Error is assigned on the refusal of the court to charge the jury, as requested in writing by plaintiff's counsel before the beginning of the charge of the court, as follows: "If you find from the evidence that any member of the firm of Mitchell & Paulk agreed that if the defendant and other persons named in the defendant's answer would become interested, either by going into a corporation or otherwise, in a patent right of a manure distributor, and giving their notes for their respective shares or interest therein, then Mitchell and Paulk, or either of them, would use their influence in favor of Ocilla in the county-site removal contest, but if you further believe that there was no agreement whereby Mitchell and Paulk, or either of them, was to sell his vote, and no agreement whereby either of said parties was to buy any other person's vote, or to corruptly influence any voter, then I charge you that such agreement would not render the consideration of the note illegal and immoral, and, under such circumstances, you should find a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs." Under the facts of this case, this refusal to charge was not error.

6. The plaintiff requested the court in writing to charge the jury as follows: "A mere agreement to use one's influence in favor of one side in a public issue, without agreeing to sell one's vote or corrupt any other voter, is neither illegal nor immoral; and, in order to defeat a recovery by an innocent holder of a negotiable note, it would have to appear that the consideration of the note was both immoral and illegal." Error is assigned on the refusal to so charge. This request to charge was not an accurate statement of the law applicable to the real issues of this case, and the court did not err in declining to so instruct the jury.

7. A request to charge that which had already been "charged in substance" was properly denied, and the refusal to "charge the same just as requested" by counsel for the plaintiff will not require a new trial.

8. The court did not err in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

CITY OF ZION

v.

RICHARD BEHRENS, Plff. in Err.

(262 Ill. 510, 104 N. E. 836.)

Municipal corporation — power to prohibit use of tobacco.

The police power of a city does not extend to the prohibition of smoking or carrying lighted tobacco in its streets and parks, which are spacious enough so that the use of tobacco in such places cannot be harmful to others, or tend to cause danger to property from fire.

(February 21, 1914.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Lake County to review a judgment convicting defendant of violating an ordinance prohibiting the use of tobacco. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. A. F. Beaubien and W. H. Fabry, for plaintiff in error:

Under police power, laws cannot be passed prohibiting that which is harmless in itself.

Regulations under the police power must have some adaptability to the end sought for.

Citizens have the right to use public streets without undue restrictions.

Note. — Power to prohibit or restrict use of tobacco.

The power to prohibit or restrict the use of tobacco is, in the absence of constitutional provision, a matter depending upon the extent of the police power of the state or municipality. "Generally speaking, it may be said that the proper authorities may control practices in the operation of all business which endanger the public welfare and safety; but only such regulations will be sustained as in fact are necessary for the safety and comfort of the public, and the courts will declare arbitrary provisions invalid." 8 Cyc. 866.

authority for an ordinance prohibiting smoking in street cars, the court says: "Smoking in itself is not to be condemned for any reason of public policy. It is agreeable and pleasant, almost indispensable to those who have acquired the habit, but it is distasteful and offensive, and sometimes hurtful, to those who are compelled to breathe the atmosphere impregnated with tobacco in close and confined places."

The distinction between open and confined places, suggested in the foregoing case, renders that case clearly harmonious with ZION v. BEHRENS.

In holding unreasonable an ordinance prohibiting the smoking of cigarettes within the corporate limits of a city, the court in Hershberg v. Barbourville, 142 Ky. 60, 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 141, 133 S. W. 985, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 189, said: "The ordinance is so broad as to prohibit one from smoking a cigarette in his own home or on any private premises in the city. To prohibit the smoking of cigarettes in the citizen's own home or on other private premises is an invasion of his right to control his own personal indulgences. The city council is authorized by statute to enact and enforce all such local, police, sanitary, and other regulations as do not conflict with general laws. . . . But under this power it may not unreasonably interfere with the right of the citizen to determine for himself such personal matters. If the council may prohibit cigarette smoking in the city, it may prohibit pipe smoking or cigar smoking, or any other use of tobacco. The legislature did not contemplate conferring such power upon the council. If the ordinance had provided a penalty for smoking cigarettes on the streets of the city, a different question would be presented; but whether such an ordinance would be valid is a question not now presented or decided."

However, in Com. v. Thompson, 12 Met. 231, without discussing the validity of a statute prohibiting smoking "in any street, lane, or passageway," it is held that such statute applies to all open ways, whether legally established public ways or not.

In holding that the making of a cigarette for one's own personal use is not within the meaning of a statute forbidding the manufacture of cigarettes, the court in Dempsey v. Stout, 76 Neb. 152, 107 N. W. 235, said: "It was contended upon the 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

hearing that the legislature has no power to regulate the personal habits of an individual by forbidding him to use cigarettes; that it is the right of the sovereign citizen to eat, drink, and smoke what he may choose to, although it may be the judgment of the legislature that he is injuring himself by so doing. From a comparison of this suggestion with the act itself, and the title thereof, it will readily be seen that the legislature in this act has avoided any attempt to regulate the personal habits of the citizen. . . . The purpose of the law is to suppress the traffic in, and not to forbid the use of, these articles. It is true that the law assumes that the use of the articles is injurious to the health and morals of the public, and that therefore traffic in the articles themselves should be made illegitimate. The law thus discourages the use of the articles, but it intentionally avoids forbidding the individual to use them."

And in State v. Lowry, 166 Ind. 372, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 528, 77 N. E. 728, 9 Ann. Cas. 350, a statute prohibiting the manufacture, sale, keeping for sale, or owning of cigarettes was construed as not applying to the act of smoking cigarettes, or of having them in possession for the sole purpose of smoking.

On the right of state to confiscate cigarettes imported for personal use, see note to State v. Lowry, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 528.

Vickers, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On an appeal from a justice of the peace to the circuit court of Lake county, plaintiff in error was adjudged guilty of violating an ordinance of the city of Zion, and a fine was imposed upon him. The trial judge certified that the validity of a municipal ordinance was involved, and that the public interest required that an appeal be granted direct to this court, in pursuance of which this writ of error has been sued out.

The ordinance violated by the plaintiff in error is as follows:

"Section 1. That it shall be and hereby is declared to be unlawful for any person to smoke tobacco in any form, whether in a pipe or by the use of a cigarette, cigar, or otherwise, in or upon any street, alley, avenue, boulevard, park, parkway, public passageway, depot, depot platform, depot grounds, hospice, hotel, store, postoffice, or other public building or public place within the said city of Zion.

"Section 2. That it shall be and hereby is declared to be unlawful for any person to have in his or her possession at any time, in or upon any street, alley, avenue, boulevard, park, parkway, public passageway, depot, depot platform, depot grounds, hospice, hotel, store, postoffice, or other public building or public place within the city of Zion, any lighted pipe, lighted cigar, or lighted cigarette."

The remainder of the ordinance imposes a fine of not less than $3 nor more than $100 for a violation of §§ 1 and 2.

The errors assigned question the validity of §§ 1 and 2 of the ordinance above set out, and the sole question involved is the validity of the ordinance.

The case was heard upon a stipulation which shows that the city of Zion has a population of about 5,000; that it covers 6½ square miles and has 1,000 acres of park lands within its limits; that no street in said city is less than 66 feet wide, and there are four streets which are 300 feet in width, running the full length of the city, and that all alleys are 25 feet wide; that Shiloh boulevard, where the smoking in question occurred, is 300 feet wide.

An extended brief and argument have been filed by defendant in error, in which it is sought to sustain the validity of the ordinance under the police power granted to cities and villages. Many cases decided by this court sustaining various ordinances and statutes under the police power are cited and relied upon. None of the cases heretofore decided by this court go to the extent of sustaining the power of a city to pass an ordinance forbidding an act under all circumstances which can only be offensive or harmful to others under certain conditions. Recognizing that tobacco smoke is offensive to many persons, and in exceptional cases harmful to some, we have no doubt that power exists to prohibit smoking in certain public places, such as street cars, theaters, and like places, where large numbers of persons are crowded together in a small space. But this is quite a different matter from prohibiting smoking on the open streets and in parks of a city, where the conditions would counteract any harmful results. The personal liberty of the citizen cannot be interfered with unless the restraint is reasonably necessary to promote the public welfare.

The only case that has been called to our attention that lends any support to the defendant in error's contention is Com. v. Thompson, 12 Met. 231. In that case the supreme court of Massachusetts sustained a statute which made it an offense to smoke or have in one's possession a lighted pipe or cigar on any of the streets of the city of Boston. In that case the law was upheld on the ground that it tended to protect the city against damage from fire. This seems to be the only case in the United States where an ordinance or statute forbidding smoking of tobacco in any form, on streets or public grounds, has been sustained. While we have a very high regard for the decisions of the supreme court of Massachusetts, still we are constrained in this instance to decline to follow the doctrine of the Thompson Case.

In State v. Heidenhain, 42 La. Ann. 483, 21 Am. St. Rep. 388, 7 So. 621, the supreme court of Louisiana sustained an ordinance which forbade smoking in street cars as a nuisance, but that court carefully limited its decision to the conditions named in the ordinance. In the course of its opinion the court said: "Smoking in itself is not to be condemned for any reason of public policy. It is agreeable and pleasant, almost indispensable to those who have acquired the habit, but it is distasteful and offensive, and sometimes hurtful, to those who are compelled to breathe the atmosphere impregnated with tobacco in close and confined places." See 3 McQuillin, Mun. Corp. § 902.

It has been held that cities and villages may pass ordinances regulating, and providing for licensing, the sale of cigarettes under a general delegation of power authorizing the passage of all adequate police regulations which may be necessary or expedient for the preservation of the health or the suppression of disease. Gundling v. Chicago, 176 Ill. 340, 48 L.R.A. 230, 52 N. E. 44. The holding in the Gundling Case was affirmed by the United States Supreme Court. 177 U. S. 183, 44 L. ed. 725, 20 Sup.

Ct. Rep. 633. The supreme court of Tennessee held that cigarettes are not legitimate articles of commerce, within the protection of the Constitution of the United States, because they possess no virtue and are bad inherently. Austin v. State, 101 Tenn 563, 50 L.R.A. 478, 70 Am. St. Rep. 703, 48 S. W. 305. That decision was affirmed by the United States Supreme Court. 179 U. S. 343, 45 L. ed. 224, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 132. Notwithstanding the smoking of cigarettes, especially by young persons, is regarded as more offensive and harmful than the use of tobacco in any other form, still the supreme court of Kentucky held an ordinance void which forbade the "smoking of cigarettes within the corporate limits" of a city. Hershberg v. Barbourville, 142 Ky. 60, 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 141, 133 S. W. 985, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 189. See also 3 McQuillin, Mun. Corp. § 921, and cases there cited.

It will be seen that the ordinance in question cannot be sustained on the ground that it tends to protect the property of the city from damage by fire. If the ordinance were limited to places where quantities of highly combustible materials were collected, it would be less objectionable. In the broad language in which the ordinance is enacted, it is apparently an attempt on the part of the municipality to regulate and control the habits and practices of the citizens without any reasonable basis for so doing. The ordinance is an unreasonable interference with the private rights of the citizen, and must be held void.

The judgment of the Circuit Court of Lake County is reversed, and, since there can be no judgment sustained under the ordinance, the cause will not be remanded. Judgment reversed.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

M. A. DUNCAN

v.

ATCHISON, TOPEKA, & SANTA FE RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.

(86 Kan. 112, 119 Pac. 356.)

Evidence — opinion — condition of bridge.

1. A bridge where a brakeman lost his life was so described and photographed that the jury could thoroughly understand its character and condition. Railway employees were permitted, over objection, to give their opinions as to such bridge being a safe place to work. Held error, as the jury could not from such opinions have received any assistance in arriving at a proper conclusion.

Same — conduct — safety.

2. Opinions of railway employees as to which side of a freight train it was proper for a brakeman to alight in order to give signals were properly received; this being a question calling for special knowledge or experience.

Master and servant — violation of rule — waiver.

3. A printed rule of the railway company, requiring brakemen to be on top of the train when approaching and passing stations, was shown to have been habitually violated with knowledge of those whose duty it was to report such violations. Held, that the jury were justified in finding that such rule was waived by the company.

Same — engine step — safety.

4. The mere use on the cab of an engine, of a stirrup of the kind used on box cars, instead of the standard step generally used on such engines, does not of itself show negligence as a matter of law. To render its use negligent, such stirrup must in some way be shown to be unsafe.

Evidence — circumstances — negligence.

5. When circumstances are relied on to show negligence, they must be of such significance and relation one to another that a reasonable conclusion of negligence can be founded thereon; and, while reasonable inferences may be drawn from the facts and conditions shown, they cannot be drawn from facts or conditions merely imagined or assumed.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Sumner County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the death of plain-

Note. — Admissibility of opinion evidence as to safety of place or appliance.

In general.

This note is limited to cases sounding in tort, which involve the question of the admissibility of opinion evidence, both expert and nonexpert, as to the safety of a place or appliance itself.

The cardinal rule is that a witness must state facts, and not opinions, and consequently, in order that a witness may express an opinion, an exception to the general rule must be made. Such an exception has been made in a great number of cases; the majority of those which fall within the scope of the present note being of comparatively recent date. Broadly speaking, the rule is that a witness possessing special skill in drawing inferences from data furnished by others, or from personal observa-tiff's intestate, alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William R. Smith, Owen J. Wood, and Alfred A. Scott, for appellant: Plaintiff failed to prove that the negligence of the defendant was the cause of the decedent's death, which, if it was not purely accidental, is directly traceable to his own negligence.

Mr. E. T. Hackney for appellee.

West, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

F. E. Duncan was an employee on defendant's road, was twenty-eight years of age, and earning $4 a day. On the night of March 9, 1908, he was head brakeman on a freight train coming east through the station of Noel, Oklahoma, where, on the south side of the track, are an elevator and switch, and on the north side a switch tion and investigation, may express his opinion whenever the facts are such that inexperienced persons are likely to prove incapable of forming a correct judgment without such assistance, and that a non-expert or lay witness may express his opinion where, from familiarity with or personal observation of the subject-matter, he has gained a personal knowledge existing in reason rather than facts, which cannot otherwise be fully presented to the jury. Stating the rule conversely, neither expert nor non-expert opinions are admissible where the matters are within the experience or knowledge of persons of ordinary understanding and experience, and where the witness, in order to form his opinion, must draw his deductions from facts which are in the possession of, or which can be fully and adequately presented to, the jury. Thus, it will be seen that the true theory upon which the opinion rule is based is necessity. In other words, opinion evidence is admissible where it is essential in order that the jury may reach an intelligent decision, and is excluded where superfluous because unnecessary.

In the main the cases are decided each upon its particular facts rather than upon principle, and are often in seeming conflict, which is probably due to the varying impressions created by the particular manner in which the question arises, the difficulty of determining whether the particular subject is one with which the ordinary person can cope, or as to which the facts can be fully and adequately presented, and the reluctance of the appellate courts to reverse the rulings in such cases.

Expert opinions.

The exception to the general rule that a witness must state facts, and not opinions, which arises from necessity, is, as before intimated, that the opinion of witnesses possessing peculiar skill or knowledge as to the safety of a particular place or appliance may be received whenever the facts are such that inexperienced persons are likely to prove incapable of forming a correct judgment without such assistance, but that when the necessity of the case ceases, the operation of the exception ceases.

ment without such assistance, but that when the necessity of the case ceases, the operation of the exception ceases.

—cases where opinions are held admissible.

Under this rule it has been held in cases involving the safety of places, that the opinion of an expert was admissible—stand, and about 78 feet east of the latter a bridge about 56 feet in length, over a ravine. On the north side, this bridge was provided with a runway and hand rail so that brakemen could cross in safety. On the south side, there was neither hand rail nor runway; the end of the ties being but 18 inches from the south rail of the track. The train was drawn by two engines, the second of which (No. 134) had on the north side the ordinary steps leading up to the gangway, but on the south side, instead of such steps, was one stirrup of metal, about 1½ inches wide, such as ordinarily used on freight cars. It was not shown how long the engine had been in this condition, nor whether Duncan had knowledge thereof at the time. On the night in question at about 11 o'clock, it being moonlight, with some clouds, as the train approached Noel, Duncan was standing in the gangway of the second engine with a lantern in his hand, receiving signals from the rear of the train, and passing them to the engineer on the front engine, who controlled the air and the movement of the train. It was necessary to cut off the caboose and switch certain cars to the side track, and Duncan was receiving and passing signals given for this purpose. As the second engine was crossing the bridge in question, Duncan was seen by the engineer to be falling from the gangway, and was found under the bridge on the roadway beneath, unconscious and injured, from which injuries he died the next day. His widow sued to recover damages, alleging as negligence on the part of the company the defective condition of the engine with respect to the step on the south side, failure to have the south side of the bridge in question provided with a runway, and failure to keep a switch light burning; no evidence being introduced on the latter point. The answer was a general denial and allegation of contributory negligence and assumption of risk. At the close of the plaintiff's testimony, a demurrer thereto was overruled, and after the close of evidence the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, and answered a large number of special questions, on which a judgment was moved for by the defendant and denied; a motion for a new trial being also refused.

The jury found, among other things, that just prior to the injury Duncan was standing in the gangway of engine No. 134; that he fell out of the gangway; that he was found just after the injury on the south side of the bridge, which was 15 feet from the ground; that on the north side of the bridge was a plank walk 5 feet from the outside of the rail, and a railing 3 feet high; that the step on the right side of the engine was similar to those used on box cars, with hand-holds on each side in good condition; that Duncan had a lighted lantern in his hand, and had just given a signal to one of the trainmen; that the negligence of the defendant which caused his death was a defective step on engine No. 134 and lack of runway and hand rail on printed rule requiring brakemen to be on the top of a train when approaching a station was commonly unheeded and violated. Testimony of former employees was given to the effect that, in their opinion, the bridge in its condition was not a safe place to work. Testimony was also introduced, showing that for the purpose of giving signals the south side of the engine was the proper one from which to alight. Defendant appeals, and assigns as error the refusal of the trial court to sustain a demurrer to the evidence, its refusal to enter judgment on the findings, its denial of a motion for a new trial, and error in instructions and in ruling upon the introduction of evidence.

In a considerable number of cases expert opinion evidence as to the safety of a place

It is argued that there was a failure to show what actually caused the death of Duncan, and that the conclusion that it was caused in the way found by the jury arises from mere speculation. Also that Duncan was bound by the rule requiring him to be on top of the train, and that, instead of being there, he had voluntarily assumed a place of danger, and thereby relieved the defendant of responsibility; that the opinion of the railroad men as to the safety of the bridge was improperly received, not being within the rule permitting expert evidence; and that the testimony showing the violation of the rule regarding the location of brakemen was improperly received, and erroneously found by the jury to show a waiver by the company. Also that there was no evidence that the has been admitted either without discussion as to its admissibility, or without a reason assigned for its admission. Thus, an expert has been allowed to express his opinion—

—as to the safety of a railroad track. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Pitts, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 42 S. W. 255;

—as to whether a spur track over which, about 100 feet from the end, was a structure so built as to prevent the use of the hand brakes on the cars at that point, and at the end of which was a buffer sufficient only to stop the trucks of a car, was a reasonably safe place. Gila Valley, G. & N. R. Co. v. Lyon, 203 U. S. 405, 51 L. ed. 276, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 145, affirming 9 Ariz. 218, 80 Pac. 337;

—as to whether the buffer at the end of a spur track was a reasonably safe and proper one, so as to render the track safe. Ibid;

—as to a safe method of constructing a railroad station platform with reference to the track, for the purpose of showing that the platform in question, upon which plaintiff, a passenger, was injured, was dangerous because too narrow. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Davidson, 22 C. C. A. 306, 46 U. S. App. 300, 76 Fed. 517, 7 Am. Neg. Cas. 449, certiorari denied in 166 U. S. 719, 41 L. ed. 1186, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 94;

—as to the merits or demerits of "whipping straps" as cautionary signals to brakemen of the fact that the train is approaching a low overhead bridge. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hall, 87 Ala. 708, 4 L.R.A. 710, 13 Am. St. Rep. 84, 6 So. 277;

—to show inferentially that a railroad was a dangerous place as regards the trainmen unless "telltails" were erected on each side of low overhead bridges. Pittsburgh, S. & N. R. Co. v. Lamphere, 69 C. C. A. 547, 137 Fed. 20;

—as to whether certain "latches" in a switch were safe on a slope. Southern Coal & Coke Co. v. Swinney, 149 Ala. 405, 42 So. 808; —to show that a switch was not safe unless it was locked down, no lock having been provided for the one in question. Birmingham R. & Electric Co. v. Baylor, 101 Ala. 488, 13 So. 793;

Ala. 488, 13 So. 793;

—as to the relative safety of blocked and unblocked switches. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Hughes, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 134, 54 S. W. 264;

—as to whether a particular pattern of "tipple" was reasonably adapted for the purpose of emptying cars at a certain place, and its condition at the time an accident occurred. Alabama Connellsville Coal & Coke Co. v. Pitts, 98 Ala. 285, 13 So. 135;

—as to whether the ceiling of a mine entry or tunnel was in a safe or unsafe condition. Jacobs v. Madison Coal Corp. 165 Ill. App. 444; Tanner v. Wickliffe Coal Co. 32 Ky. L. Rep. 1304, 108 S. W. 351; —to show that the roof of a mine was or was not properly supported. Brazil Block Coal Co. v. Hotel, 112 C. C. A. 448, 192 Fed. 108; Acme Coal Co. v. Kusnir, 71 Ill. App. 446;

—as to the safety of inclines used in mining operations. Claxton v. Lexington & B. S. R. Co. 13 Bush, 636;

—as to whether it was safe to have the space between the track and wall of a cross entry in a mine as narrow as a foot or a foot and a half. McNamara v. Logan, 100 Ala. 187, 14 So. 175;

—as to whether staging erected in a specified way was safe when carrying a particular load. Prendible v. Connecticut River Mfg. Co. 160 Mass. 131, 35 N. E. 675;

—as to whether it was safe to locate a staging with one corner post resting upon a brick ledge. Bourbonnais v. West Boylston Mfg. Co. 184 Mass. 254, 68 N. E. 232;

—as to the proper construction of a telephone line with regard to the space which safety required between it and a live wire which it intersected. Southwestern Teleg. & Teleph. Co. v. Luckie, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 153 S. W. 1158.

And in a number of cases in which the courts did not state the grounds upon which the evidence was admitted, experts have been allowed to express their opinions as to the safety of an appliance. In cases of this step or stirrup was defective, or that Duncan was in the line of his duty when the accident occurred.

It is argued that the court erred in charging that disobedience of a reasonable rule, requiring Duncan to be on top of the train, would preclude his recovery, if such disobedience caused or contributed to the injury, unless the jury also found that such rule was habitually disregarded, with the knowledge of those superior in authority, whose duty it was to report such violations, to such an extent as to show a tacit or express consent by the defendant to such disregard of such rule. Presumptively a rule of this kind is made for the purpose of being heeded; but when it is so continuously or habitually disregarded as to convince fair-minded jurors that it has been waived, it is not only sense and justice that they may so conclude, but it is the law. Kansas City, Ft. S. & G. R. Co. v. Kier, 41 Kan. 661, 671, 13 Am. St. Rep. 311, 21 Pac. 770; Union P. R. Co. v. Springsteen, 41 Kan. 724, 21 Pac. 774. In Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Slattery, 57 Kan. 499, 505, 46 Pac. 941, 943, 15 Am. Neg. Cas. 104, it was said by Justice Johnston: "Ordinarily, the wilful disobedience of a rule should be held to constitute negligence; but where the rule is habitually disregarded, and a different course has long been pursued by employees with the knowledge and approval of the managing officers of the company, the rule must be regarded as inoperative." p. 505.

—to show that a grinding stone which burst was being run at an unsafe speed. Helfenstein v. Medart, in division 2, 136 Mo. 595, 36 S. W. 863, in banc 136 Mo. 619, 37 S. W. 829, on rehearing in 136 Mo. 619, 38 S. W. 294;

—as to whether a hand car upon which a passenger was being carried from a wreck to a station, and from which she was the seventh circuit, in Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Baker, 33 C. C. A. 468, 63 U. S. App. 553, 91 Fed. 224, that the habitual disregard of such rule, with the knowledge of those whose duty it is to report violations thereof, presents a question for the jury whether the rule has been waived by the company. This is substantially the same as the rule announced in the Springsteen Case, supra, where an instruction quite similar to the one given in the case now under consideration was approved. Plaintiff asserts that, as the defendant did not plead this rule, it had no right to introduce evidence thereof. But, as the answer appeared to be a general allegation of contributory negligence and assumption of risk, the plaintiff could have required the specific facts to be set forth by motion (Price v. Atchison Water Co. 58 Kan. 551, 558, 62 Am. St. Rep. 625, 50 Pac. 450, 3 Am. Neg. Rep. 392), and, not having made such motion, it was not error to permit the introduction of the testimony.

The defendant complains that evidence was received of the opinion of witnesses that the bridge was a dangerous place to work. These questions, propounded to employees of the defendant who were familiar with the bridge in question, called for their opinions as to whether it was a safe structure to couple and uncouple cars and to switch trains on the side track, or a safe structure for the brakeman and conductor to use in coupling and uncoupling and switching trains from that station from the thrown and injured, was too narrow for the track. Healy v. Visalia & T. R. Co. 101 Cal. 585, 36 Pac. 125.

—cases where opinions are held not admissible.

On the other hand, it has been held in cases which involve the safety of an appliance, and which apply the above-stated general rule as to the admissibility of opinion evidence, that expert opinions were not admissible——to show whether or not two sticks rather than a frame were a suitable or reasonably safe appliance to keep marble slabs from falling in upon the persons holding the sticks while the slabs were being hauled, one or more slabs being on edge on each side of the wagon and the holder of the sticks standing between the slabs. *Motey v. —to show whether a rope used in loading tilting upon a car "was an ordinary, safe, and proper apparatus" for the work for which it was used. Hunt v. Kile, 38 C. C. A. 641, 98 Fed. 49, rehearing denied in 44 C. C. A. 168, 104 Fed. 717;

—to show that an elevator cable which had been used for a certain length of time was unsafe. Bruce v. Beall, 99 Tenn. 303, 41 S. W. 445 (this was upon the ground that the question of negligence in the use of the cable was the very issue involved, and therefore was for the jury, the court saying 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that the witness could properly express "his opinion as to the effect of the breaking of strands of wire upon the ultimate strength of the cable, or of the process of crystallization, the result of time and friction, upon the ultimate strength of the cable, and also as to the probable life of a cable under given circumstances," yet he should not have been permitted to state that the continued use of the cable under the conditions as existing was dangerous);

—to show the safety of a bolt used to operate machinery. Dittman v. Edison Electric Illuminating Co. 87 App. Div. 68, 83 N. Y. Supp. 1078, on subsequent appeal in 144 App. Div. 632, 129 N. Y. Supp. 221; —to show whether a hoisting apparatus used in a mine shaft was a safe and suitable one. Luman v. Golden Ancient Channel Min. Co. 140 Cal. 700, 74 Pac. 307; Coe v. VanWhy, 33 Colo. 315, 80 Pac. 894, 3 Ann. Cas. 552 (in Coe v. VanWhy, supra, the court said: "The principle upon which expert or opinion evidence is allowed is well known, but the difficulty arises in applying it to the facts of a given case. No general rule applicable to all cases can be enunciated, but each one must be determined largely upon its own peculiar facts. It does not appear that this hoisting plant was a complicated piece of machinery, but, as we read the record, it was exceedingly simple in construction and operation, and all the facts relating thereto, as well as its condition of repair, could be fully explained to the jury. It is not altogether clear just what particular acts of negligence plaintiff charged, but the chief reliance seems to be that the machinery was not properly supplied with a band brake, and that the key which secured the drum appliance to the shaft was out of repair. Just how this brake operated, and the use and character of the key, and its condition as to repair, were fully explained to the jury by the witnesses. There was no necessity for them to give to the jury their opinion as to the safety of the hoist, for the jury were as capable of determining that fact from the evidence in the case as were the witnesses themselves");

east end of the switch. This was objected to as calling for an opinion of a witness who had not shown himself competent, and that it was a matter on which opinion evidence was not competent, the safety of the bridge being a question for the jury.

The alleged negligence of the company respecting the bridge was the failure to equip it with a runway on the south side, no mention being made of a hand rail on that side; and the testimony very clearly showed that the cab of engine No. 134 must have projected over the south end of the bridge, and that there was neither runway nor hand rail on that side, and a photograph was introduced giving a very clear picture of the structure. In view of this condition of things, the jury were as well able to say as anyone else whether the bridge was a safe place for train operatives to work; it being remembered that there was no complaint concerning such bridge except as to its south side. In Murray v. Woodson County, 58 Kan. 1, 3, 48 Pac. 554, 555, 2 Am. Neg. Rep. 537, it was held proper to refuse to permit witnesses experienced in the building of bridges like the one there in question, to describe its method of construction and claimed defects, and to give their opinion as to its safety. It was there said: "Where all the facts from which an opinion can be formed as to the safety of travel on a public highway are stated by those who have knowledge of them, and the matter is one within the comprehension of the jury upon explanation of such facts, it is the

—to show whether cars with particular kinds of couplings are safe. Way v. Illinois C. R. Co. 40 Iowa, 341, 14 Am. Neg. Cas. 621 (the court said that the subject was not one regarding which unskilled persons would be likely to prove incapable of forming a correct judgment, they having province of the jury to form such opinion, and not of witnesses, although experts, to express theirs." p. 3. In Erb v. Popritz, 59 Kan. 264, 68 Am. St. Rep. 362, 52 Pac. 871, certain witnesses, without railroad experience, had been permitted to give their opinion as to the cause of a certain derailment, and this was held error on the ground, not only that the witnesses had no expert knowledge, but that the appearance of the wreck could have been easily and adequately described to the jurors, so that they could have formed an opinion as readily as the witnesses. Had the structure and situation been such that the witnesses by their railroad experience were able to afford the jury any assistance in addition to that furnished by an explanation of the facts and the photograph of the bridge, it would have been proper to receive their opinions. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Merrill, 61 Kan. 671, 60 Pac. 819, 7 Am. Neg. Rep. 620; Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. v. Blaker, 68 Kan. 244, 64 L.R.A. 81, 75 Pac. 71, 1 Ann. Cas. 883; United States Smelting Co. v. Parry, 92 C. C. A. 159, 166 Fed. 407; Central Coal & Coke Co. v. Williams, 97 C. It is impossible to see, however, why the jury were not entirely competent to judge as to the safety of the bridge, or how they could in anywise have been assisted by the opinions of others. In addition to this, the questions were too broad, and, if proper

Co.* 91 Cal. 48, 27 Pac. 590, 13 Am. Neg. Cas. 387 (the court said: "The general rule . . . is that witnesses must testify to facts, and not to opinions, and that whenever the question to be determined is the result of the common experience of all men of ordinary education, or is to be inferred from particular facts, the inference is to be drawn by the jury, and not by the witness. When the inquiry relates to a subject whose nature is not such as to require any peculiar habits or study in order to qualify one to understand it, or when all the facts upon which the opinion is founded can be ascertained and made intelligible to the court or jury, the opinion of the witness is not to be received in evidence. If the relation between the facts and their probable results can be determined without any special skill or training, the facts themselves must be given in evidence, and the conclusions or inferences must be drawn by the jury. If the circumstances out of which the negligence is said to arise have been established by proof, or can be shown, the ultimate fact of negligence is an inference to be drawn therefrom by the jury, and is not to be established by the opinions of others"); —to show the safety of a "push stick" used to push cars on a track other than that on which the locomotive was, as affected by 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) its length. Bookman v. Masterson, 83 App. Div. 4, 81 N. Y. Supp. 962; —to show the safety of an unguarded circular saw. Schmahl v. Albany Brush Co. 61 Misc. 316, 113 N. Y. Supp. 768; —to show that the particular gauge used on a steam saw was safe, the jury having a model and the methods of using it having been fully explained. Sprague v. Atlee, 81 Iowa, 1, 46 N. W. 756;

—to show the safety of a lock or fastener attached to the feed lever with which a steam sawmill was equipped. Trickey v. Clark, 50 Or. 516, 93 Pac. 457;

—to show whether an unguarded shaft near which plaintiff worked was a dangerous appliance. Civetti v. American Hatters' & Furriers' Corp. 124 App. Div. 345, 108 N. Y. Supp. 663;

—to show that a revolving shaft in the end of which a keyway with sharp edges had been sunk was more dangerous than a plain shaft. Connelly v. Hamilton Woolen Co. 163 Mass. 156, 39 N. E. 787;

—to show whether a shaft having a rough surface or end which projected 18 inches into a room where workmen were liable to come into contact with it was unsafe in that it was more dangerous than it would have been if it had been smooth. Kauffman v. Maier, 94 Cal. 269, 18 L.R.A. 124, 29 Pac. 481 (the court said that, as such question could be determined by men of common experience, to permit the jury to be influenced by the opinion of experts would deprive the litigants of their right to have the jury render its verdict upon the facts in the case, and to this extent would substitute the judgment of the experts for that of the jury);

—to show whether certain couplings, pulleys, and belts in a plow works, because of their position, afforded a reasonably safe combination and appliance. Freeberg v. St. Paul Plow-Works, 48 Minn. 99, 50 N. at all, should have been restricted to the duties of the brakeman in giving signals, and should not have included the duties of others in switching and uncoupling. It is suggested that the error, if any, was harmless, as the jury would have reached the same conclusion regardless of the opinions of others. But the matter presented by these opinions was not that the absence of a runway on the south side of the bridge made it dangerous for Duncan to assist in switching by giving signals, but was the broad proposition that the bridge as a whole, for use by the train crew generally, was an unsafe place to work, and this might well have induced the jury to find the specific negligence claimed as one item embraced within the general negligence thus sought to be shown.

Complaint is also made that railroad men were permitted to testify as to which side the brakeman should get off in order to operate the train and give and receive proper signals. We see no reason why this was not competent, however, for jurors are not supposed to understand the proper method of operating railroad trains. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Merrill, 61 Kan. 671, 60 Pac. 819, 7 Am. Neg. Rep. 620.

Instruction No. 15 charged that the law did not require that Duncan should know of defects, if any existed, in the tracks, switches, or engines, nor require him to make an inspection to ascertain if any such existed. In the same instruction, the jury were told that if any such defects existed, and were known to him, it was his duty to exercise ordinary care to avoid injury and danger caused thereby, and this is criticized. It was improper to include within this instruction tracks and switches, as the engine and bridge were the only alleged negligent matters about which evidence had been introduced; however, it is not seen that this expression could have in any wise prejudiced the jury or harmed the defendant.

The railway company insists that it devolved upon the plaintiff to show that the absence of a standard step on the south side of the engine, or the absence of a platform on the south side of the bridge, was the proximate cause of Duncan's death; that there was an utter failure of proof in this respect, because the evidence did not show whether he attempted to use either steps or platform, and, even if it had so shown, there was nothing to indicate that he looked before he leaped; and therefore the company could not be held responsible. Also that the evidence failed to show that Duncan had any duty to perform upon the ground or upon the bridge, or in giving signals from the front of the train, and that if he was performing the unnecessary act of repeating signals, he could not have done that as well in the gangway as on the bridge. It is also argued that no statute or rule of law required any particular kind of step on the engine, and that the stirrup on the south side of No. 134 was not shown to be

Boehm*, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 760. In other words, when it so far partakes of the nature of a science as to require a course of previous habit or study in order to the attainment of a knowledge of it. While, on the other hand, it does not seem to be contended that the opinion of witnesses can be received when the inquiry is into a subject-matter, the nature of which is not such as to require any peculiar habits or study in order to qualify a man to understand it.' Here no peculiar habit or study was required to enable any intelligent person to understand when a sidewalk of a street was dangerous. Supp. 358 (in the latter case one justice dissented upon the ground that the structure of the bin, the amount of strain, the size, strength, and durability of the material, and the manner of construction, were subjects that could not well be placed before the jury by a mere description);

—whether a certain part of the ground in a switch yard was in a safe condition to defective in any particular; the only complaint being that it differed in design from the standard steps in general use on engine cabs of defendant, such as were on the north side of the engine in question. In her petition, plaintiff alleged, among other things, that the bridge had been constructed some twenty years; that the defendant well knew the dangers attendant upon switching in a yard with an open trestle; that Duncan either attempted to step to the ground, or take a position on the steps of the engine, and fell through the trestle or bridge; that the engine in question had been injured prior to the accident by having its steps torn off on the south side, which had been two in number, with a curtain behind to keep employees from slipping through, and that the superintendent of repairs and the repairing force had caused to be placed thereon the single iron step, about 1½ inches wide, about like the steps on freight cars, without any protection at the back to keep employees from slipping through; that the defendant well knew such step was not safe, but that it was liable to cripple or kill employees while in discharge of their duties.

The only testimony regarding the step showed that it was not the kind generally used on such engines; that they usually have two steps; that it was not protected behind and on each side; that there were the usual handholds on both sides of engine No. 134; that they were in their usual position and firmly set; that the steps on both

This was error. These witnesses, called as experts, having properly expressed their opinions relative to questions involving expert knowledge of electricity, the instrumentalities by which it is communicated, conveyed, and controlled, the manner in which these instrumentalities perform their several functions, the effect produced upon one coming in contact simultaneously with a wire charged with electricity and a grounded telephone wire, the jury were as well qualified as were the witnesses, to determine whether or not the pole as equipped was a dangerous place to work, and the opinions of the witnesses upon that question infringed the province of the jury");

108 (it was further held, however, that the expression of opinion upon the point by the expert did not constitute prejudicial error, as the answer gave the facts in full, and explained what methods would have been safe and what matters should be taken into consideration in locating wires such as those in question, it also being fully proved by other evidence that the defendant was negligent).

But it has been held that the mere fact that the question whether or not a place or appliance is safe is ultimately to be decided by a jury does not, standing alone, prevent an expert from giving his opinion involving the point. See Western Coal & Min. Co. v. Berberich, 36 C. C. A. 364, 94 Fed. 329, wherein a mining expert was allowed to give his opinion as to the safety of a mine at a particular time and under stated conditions; Hutchinson Cooperage Co. v. Snider, 46 C. C. A. 517, 107 Fed. 633, set out supra; Alabama Consol. Coal & I. Co. v. Heald, 168 Ala. 626, 53 So. 162, holding that an expert could give his opinion as to whether a mine containing poisonous gases was a safe place to send an employee into, although the question of the safety vel non of going into the mine was to be determined by the jury, the jury not being bound by the opinion; and James v. Johnson, 12 Ill. App. 286, holding that it was not a valid objection to the admission of the opinion of an expert as to whether the platform of a horse car was a safe or unsafe place, that the question involved the question at issue to be decided by the jury.

Nonexpert opinions—cases where opinions are held not admissible.

The general rule is that the opinion of a nonexpert witness as to the safety of a place or appliance is not admissible in evidence where all the facts can easily be laid before the jury, the ground being that it is the province of the jury to draw conclusions from the facts, and that where possible, facts, and not opinions, should be given. Applying this rule, the courts have refused sides were solid; the one on the south side being firm and solid and similar to the ones on box cars. There was no evidence to show whether Duncan attempted to alight by the use of the stirrup, or whether he simply fell from the gangway; the only direct evidence being by his own engineer, who said, "I seen him falling." Assuming for the moment that the jury rightfully inferred from the circumstances shown that the deceased attempted to alight by using what he supposed were standard steps, and met his death because instead there was this stirrup, can it be said, as a matter of law, that the stirrup itself must be considered negligent equipment, or that the engine thus equipped must be considered, as a matter of law, an unsafe place for an employee to work, regardless of whether he knew that such stirrup was there or not? It would seem that a brakeman used to similar stirrups on freight cars would not be endangered by one on an engine, if he knew it was there. There is nothing to show, and we cannot assume, that such a stirrup would be more dangerous on an engine cab than on a freight car, or that it would be dangerous on either. In the absence of any testimony beyond the fact that such engines generally had steps, instead of stirrups, it would not be said that the defendant was shown to be guilty of negligence in this respect. In Jackson v. Kansas City, L. & S. K. R. Co. 31 Kan. 761, 763, 3 Pac. 501, 503, it was alleged that the step of an engine was defective, caus-

to allow nonexpert witnesses to express an opinion—

ing an injury to the conductor. It was said: "The step, however, was not really defective, but was simply of a different pattern from those often used on railroad engines; and the plaintiff admits in his brief that the evidence does not show such a defective or unsafe condition of the step as to preclude its use. And he also admits that, except for the reversal of the engine, he would not have fallen or been injured. Besides, there was no necessity for the plaintiff to use the step at the time he did; and we certainly think that no negligence can be imputed to the railroad company on account of the use of said step by the plaintiff at the time he used it. Probably neither the plaintiff nor the railroad company was guilty of negligence in using said step." p. 763.

While the jury were warranted in drawing fair and reasonable inference from the facts and conditions shown, it was only from those shown, and not from those imagined or inferred, that such inference could rightfully be drawn. They found that the negligence which caused the death was, "Defective step on engine No. 134, and lack of runway and hand rail on the south side of bridge," and also that the train was moving about 6 miles an hour, and that Duncan would not have been injured if he had waited until the train stopped before getting off. Had he thus waited, he would have been well beyond the bridge, which was 56 feet in length; and hence an injury at because of an unprotected entrance to a cellar way. Musick v. Latrobe, 184 Pa. 375, 39 Atl. 226;

And a nonexpert witness should not be allowed to give his opinion as to the safety of a place or appliance where expert knowledge is essential to the formation of a correct opinion. Under this rule it has been held that a nonexpert should not be permitted to express his opinion as to the safety of a railroad embankment (Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Kent, 84 Ga. 351, 10 S. E. 965; Cain v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 74 S. C. 89, 54 S. E. 244), or as to whether a car furnished to ship a horse in was a safe and proper one for the purpose (Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Sage, 49 Kan. 524, 31 Pac. 140). And in Fairoury v. Rogers, 98 Ill. 554, witnesses were not allowed to state their opinions as to whether a sidewalk across a ditch the point then reached could not have been caused by a defect in the bridge. A mere accidental falling from the engine, without fault of the company, would not render it liable; and therefore, in order to make the bridge a contributing cause of the injury, it must appear otherwise than by speculation that the fall itself was attributable to the negligence of the company. It is largely a case of circumstantial evidence, in which the circumstances shown must be of such significance and relation one to another that a reasonable conclusion of negligence can be founded thereon. In Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Rhoades, 64 Kan. 553, 68 Pac. 58, 11 Am. Neg. Rep. 383, it was held that, to establish a theory by circumstantial evidence, the known facts relied on must be of such nature and so related to one another that the only reasonable conclusion to be drawn therefrom is the theory sought to be established. In Hart v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 80 Kan. 699, 102 Pac. 1101, it was shown that a passenger fell from a vestibule train. The door of one vestibule was open, but there was no testimony to show where or how it was opened; and it was argued that the presumption of negligence on the part of the company, or of suicide on the part of the deceased, were the only ones to be indulged, and, the latter being unreasonable, the former alone remained. But it was held that no facts were presented upon which it could be safely assumed that the deceased lost his life because of any negligence upon the part of the was so narrow as to be dangerous, the ground seemingly being that they were not experts. But see Missouri P. R. Co. v. Jarrard, 65 Tex. 560, wherein it was held that nonexpert witnesses could give their opinion as to the safety of a railroad track at a certain point, even though the subject was not one of common information, where they had actual knowledge of that particular part of the road, and testified as fully as they could to the facts upon which their judgments were founded.

See also Chamberlain v. Platt, 68 Conn. 126, 35 Atl. 780; and Seidel v. Woodbury, 81 Conn. 65, 70 Atl. 58, as set out at the end of the following subdivision of this note.

—cases where opinions are held admissible.

On the other hand, it has been held that a nonexpert witness may give his opinion as to the safety or danger of a particular place or appliance where, from familiarity with it, or by reason of having seen it, he has gained a personal knowledge of the matter existing in reason rather than facts, which cannot otherwise be fully presented to the jury; or, in other words, applying the rule of necessity, a nonexpert may express his opinion where the facts cannot be correctly or adequately presented to the jury, the facts upon which the opinion is founded having been presented as fully as possible. This rule has been applied, and the expression of a nonexpert opinion allowed,—

The ground indicated that the body had been dragged 25 or 30 feet. The train upon which he had been riding was a vestibule passenger train. The uncoupling had been made, and the train had parted, and Duncan was seen to roll out from under a car in the rear from the opposite side of the train. Blood was found upon the ties outside of the rail from the opposite side of the track where he had last been seen, and also upon one of the cars. The engineer testified that he saw him upon the stirrup; that he was leaning over into the car and giving signals to go forward. The brake beam of the car was found to be defective, and in stepping upon it, for some reason not shown, it would sink down. The plaintiff claimed that the lever of the coupling device was disconnected and failed to work, and for that reason the deceased had to lean over between the cars to lift the coupling pin, and in so doing his foot slipped on the defective brake beam, which caused him to fall. The jury found that the ladder, handhold, and stirrup were in good order, but that the brake beam and coupling appliances were not in proper condition. The finding as to the coupling appliance was based entirely upon circumstances shown in evidence; direct testimony having been given that it was in good condition. In the opinion, Mr. Justice Benson said: "It is first presumed that the brakeman was doing his duties properly, which is a fair presumption; it is next presumed that he could not lift the pin by use of the lever; it is presumed from this that the appliance was out of order, and because of this defect it is presumed that he stepped upon the defective brake beam, thereby losing his life. . . . The lamentable death of this man may have been caused by some mischance after the uncoupling was effected. It may have been caused in the manner claimed by the plaintiff. Possibly one conjecture is as reasonable as another, but the evidence does not reveal the cause of his fall. In the absence of such evidence, there can be no recovery." pp. 232, 233.

No one witness or number of witnesses will be able to present it fully. Therefore, it does not come within the general rule of a witness taking a physical fact, and stating that fact and surrounding facts, from which any man might ordinarily infer the conditions of things"); *Laughlin v. And in some instances it has been held that a nonexpert should be allowed to express his opinion as to the safety of a place or appliance, even though the question calling therefor was one which any man of ordinary intelligence could answer. This was the rule adopted in Alexander v. Mt. Ster-

In view of the doctrine announced by these decisions, we find it impossible to hold that the evidence justified the jury in all of their conclusions.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to grant a new trial.

ling, 71 Ill. 366, wherein it was held that a nonexpert should have been allowed to give his opinion as to whether or not a sidewalk, because of the mode of its construction, was unsafe and dangerous. And in Baltimore & Y. Turnp. Road v. Crowther, 63 Md. 558, 1 Atl. 279, a nonexpert witness was allowed to give his opinion as to whether a road at a certain point was unsafe because of a bank or declivity, the court saying that the matter was one about which men of ordinary intelligence could speak as well as experts in road making, and that the testimony of such witnesses may be resorted to in such case. So, in Baltimore & L. Turnp. Co. v. Cassell, 66 Md. 419, 59 Am. Rep. 175, 7 Atl. 805, a nonexpert was allowed to express his opinion as to the safety of a highway at a particular point. And see Rowe v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 82 Md. 493, 33 Atl. 761, wherein opinion evidence as to the safety of a road, there being overhanging rocks, was admitted, seemingly without question.

And in the following cases nonexpert opinions as to the safety of a place or appliance were admitted, but the respective courts do not state the grounds upon which the admissions were allowed: Merkle v. Bennington Twp. 68 Mich. 133, 35 N. W. 436 (highway bridge); Beatty v. Gilmore, 16 Pa. 463 (excavation in highway; a subsequent case—Graham v. Pennsylvania Co. 139 Pa. 149, 12 L.R.A. 293, 21 Atl. 151, 6 Am. Neg. Cas. 329—intimates that this case belongs to that class where a mere description of the place would not convey to the jury an adequate idea of it without reference to the danger, and holds that if the case cannot be so regarded, it must be regarded as materially modified by subsequent decisions); Kitchen v. Union Twp. 171 Pa. 145, 33 Atl. 76 (defective road,—case probably one in which the court believed that an adequate description could not be given the jury); Reese v. Morgan Silver Min. Co. 17 Utah, 489, 54 Pac. 759 (ladder used for entering mine); Drew v. 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

New River Co. 6 Car. & P. 754 (witness testified that pavement was so low as to make it unsafe for pedestrians).

But it has been held that a nonexpert, although familiar with a place or appliance, should not be allowed to express his opinion as to its dangerous or safe character. It was so held in MacFeat v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 5 Penn. (Del.) 52, 62 Atl. 898, as regards a platform and passageway or crossing for the use of passengers awaiting trains (but in connection with this case, see Martin v. Baltimore & P. R. Co. as set out supra); in Seininski v. Wilmington Leather Co. — Del. —, 83 Atl. 20, as to the dangerous character of a "threshing machine;" and in Milledgeville v. Wood, 144 Ga. 370, 40 S. E. 239, as to whether a street was dangerous at a certain point.

But even in those jurisdictions which in some cases permit the introduction in evidence of the opinion of a nonexpert, it has been held that such an opinion is not admissible where the facts upon which it is based are not stated. See Chamberlain v. Platt, 68 Conn. 126, 35 Atl. 780, holding that a nonexpert who was familiar with a certain railroad station where plaintiff was injured because of alleged insufficient lighting could not give his opinion as to the conditions for safety as regards lights at the time of the accident, although he was there at the time, where he did not give the facts observed on such occasion and those upon which his opinion was based.

And such an opinion is sometimes held not to be admissible where the witness does not know or has not seen the conditions at the time of the accident. See Seidel v. Woodbury, 81 Conn. 65, 70 Atl. 58, holding that an opinion as to the safety of a highway, given in answer to a hypothetical question by a nonexpert who had no personal knowledge of the condition of the highway at the time of an accident alleged to have been caused by the defendant, was not admissible.

G. J. C.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

JAMES R. PATTERSON, Appt.,
v.STANDARD ACCIDENT INSURANCE COMPANY.

(— Mich. —, 144 N. W. 491.)

Insurance — automobile — obligation to defend criminal prosecution.

A policy of automobile insurance obligating the insurer to indemnify the assured against loss from the liability imposed by law upon him for damages on account of bodily injuries, including death, accidentally sustained by any person by reason of the maintenance or use of his automobile, and to defend in the name and on behalf of the assured any suits which may at any time be brought against him on account of such injuries, does not bind the insurer to defend a criminal prosecution for manslaughter instituted against the assured.

(December 20, 1913.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Branch County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for alleged breach of a contract to defend plaintiff in a suit brought against him on account of an automobile accident. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Joseph L. Hooper and Bernard J. Onen, for appellant:

The word "suit" includes criminal prosecutions as well as civil proceedings.

Note. — Insurance covering automobiles, or indemnifying against injury, or liability for injury, caused thereby.

The early cases upon the questions here considered were treated in the note accompanying Harris v. American Casualty Co. 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 70.

Automobile insurance—accident insurance.

Supplementing note in 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 71.

It is not necessary, in order to constitute a "collision" within the meaning of a policy insuring against damage resulting from a collision of an automobile with any other automobile, vehicle, or object, that both objects should be in motion. Lepman v. Employers' Liability Assur. Corp. 170 Ill. App. 379.

The words "collision with," as used in such a policy, mean striking against; and the policy covers a case where the automobile strikes a brick which causes an accident. Ibid.

It was held in Hanvey v. Georgia L. Ins. Co. — Ga. —, 81 S. E. 206, that a petition was not subject to a general demurrer where it alleged that the plaintiff, while operating the automobile covered by the policy, sustained damages to it, caused solely by a collision with another object, the same being a bank or side of a ditch on a certain road; and stating that the automobile left the roadbed and ran into the ditch on the side, and into the bank, and turned over, it appearing from the petition that the policy sued on insured against loss or damage to the automobile if caused solely by collision with another object, either moving or stationary, although it excluded all loss or damage caused by striking any portion of the roadbed or any impediment consequent upon the condition thereof. The court remarked that they could not say as a matter of law that the petition alleged facts which showed that the accident fell within the exception mentioned.

insured automobile skidded across the granitoid guttering about 20 inches in width, adjacent to the highway, and across a grass plat 2 feet wide, and collided with a granitoid sidewalk 6 inches above the grass plat, it was held that the guttering constituted no part of the roadbed within the meaning of a provision of the policy excluding "all loss or damage caused by striking any portion of the roadbed." The court said: "Here the policy does not exclude loss or damage caused by striking any portion of the roadway or street, but rather confines the exemption of liability to the more restricted area of the 'roadbed.' In common roads the term 'roadbed' refers to the whole material laid in place and ready for travel. See Webster's Dict. Obviously the roadbed involved here consisted of that portion between the gutters on either side which was constructed for travel, and not to the gutters designed for the purpose of draining water from the adjacent roadbed. The court did not err in instructing the jury that the granitoid gutter constituted no part of the roadbed."

In an action on a policy insuring against damage to an automobile where there was no evidence that the chauffeur, at the time of the accident for which recovery was sought, gave a sudden turn to the steering gear, an instruction that if the jury were in doubt and unable to say whether the upset was due to the car striking a brick, or to a sudden turn given the steering gear by the chauffeur, or to some unknown causes, no recovery could be had, was held properly refused, since it suggested to the jury that they might indulge in conjecture as to the cause of the accident. Lepman v. Employers' Liability Assur. Corp. supra.

It has been held that a provision in a policy insuring an automobile against damage that "each claim hereunder shall be adjusted separately, and from the amount of each claim, when determined, the sum of twenty-five dollars ($25) shall be deducted, and the company shall be liable for loss or damage in excess of that amount only," followed by provisions respecting the ascertainment of the amount of the claim for loss, and providing that the insurer shall not be responsible beyond the value of the property, and that the parties shall agree on the amount of the loss, if possible, and, if not, shall select appraisers, is not available to reduce the amount of the loss only in case an adjustment is made by agreement or appraisal, but also entitles the insurer to such a reduction where a judgment is recovered against it in an action on the policy. Stix v. Travelers' Indemnity Co. supra.

Com. v. Moore, 143 Mass. 136, 58 Am. Rep. 128, 9 N. E. 25.

The contract is not void as against public policy.

In Lepman v. Employers' Liability Assur. Corp. supra, a provision in a policy covering loss from damage to an automobile that the insurer should not in any event be liable "for more than — the actual cost of the suitable repair of the property injured" was held to indicate that the contemplation was that the measure of damages should be the actual cost of repair, and it was held proper to show the amount of damages by proving the cost of repairs to the machine, and showing that the repairs were reasonably worth the amount of the charge.

Where the insured company originally had a policy insuring its automobile against loss by fire, which was obtained by agents, and upon its being canceled by the insurer, the agents, not being able to place the risk with their companies, procured a policy through another agency which covered the machine only while in the garage, it was held that the insured was not entitled to have the latter policy reformed on the ground of mistake, upon its appearing that it knew that the agents employed by it were not authorized to act for the company issuing the policy in question, and that it knew that the policy was the only one the insurer would write upon its machine, and knew that no agent of that company was authorized to write a policy like the one which had been canceled. *Mississippi Electric Co. v. It has been held that an employee of the garage keeper at which the insured kept his machine under an agreement by which he paid a specified sum per month is not in the employment or service of the insured within the meaning of a policy providing that "loss . . . by theft, robbery, or pilferage by persons not in the employment, service, or household, is covered." Schmid v. Heath, 173 Ill. App. 649. The court said: "A servant or employee is one who is employed to perform personal service; and a contractor, one who engages to do a particular thing; the idea of personal service not being a necessary element in the bargain. To be in the service or employment of the assured, within the meaning of the policy, Collier must have been subject to the control and direction of the assured, and bound to render personal service to him; but he was employed, not by the assured, but by LiBal, and was not subject to the control of the assured, nor bound to render to him any personal service."

In Bigus v. Pacific Coast Casualty Co. 145 Mo. App. 170, 129 S. W. 982, it was held that a policy insuring an automobile against "direct loss by burglary, theft, or larceny" covered only a felonious asportation, and did not include a case where the machine was taken openly in the daytime, by one who claimed to be the owner, since such taking at most amounted only to a trespass.

Generally as to burglary and theft insurance, see the note to Rosenthal v. American Bonding Co. 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) 561.

It has been held that an indemnity policy issued to a taxicab company, covering a loss sustained from an accident arising because of a violation of a speed ordinance, is not void as against public policy. Taxicab Motor Co. v. Pacific Coast Casualty Co. 73 Wash. 631, 132 Pac. 393.

In this case it was also held that where the policy contained no condition purporting to exempt the insurer from liability for an accident caused by a violation of a speed ordinance on the part of the insured, the insurer could not defeat an action by the insured for the amount paid in satisfaction of a judgment rendered against it, on the ground that it appeared on the trial of the original cause that the insured's liability arose from a violation on its part of the speed laws of the city where the accident occurred. Ibid.

And where the insurer in that case had charge of the defense of an action brought against the insured to recover for a death caused by one of its machines, it was held that it could not defeat an action by the insured to recover the amount paid in satisfaction of the judgment recovered, on the ground that the death resulted from the malpractice of the attending physician, and not from the insured's negligence. Ibid.

It was further held that a provision of the policy that the insured should render such co-operation and assistance in the defense of actions against it to recover for injuries covered by the policy as lay in its power was not violated because an officer of the insured company gave evidence at an inquest relative to the instructions given drivers which conflicted with his evidence on the trial of an action against the insured to recover for negligently killing a person, where it did not appear that the discrepancy in his testimony was anything more than a mistake. Ibid.

It has been held that the payment of a judgment by the insured within ninety days of its affirmance by the appellate court is within the requirements of an indemnity policy providing that the insurer shall not be liable unless a judgment recovered against the insured is paid within ninety days from the date of such judgment, although the payment in question was not made within ninety days from the date of the rendition of the judgment. Ibid.

The evidence is sufficient to show a loss actually sustained within the meaning of an indemnity policy issued to a company operating taxicabs, which provides that the insurer shall not be liable in an action "unless it shall be brought by the insured to reimburse him for loss actually sustained and paid by him in satisfaction of a final judgment," where it appears that the insured, in satisfaction of a judgment, with the consent and approval of the judge of 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

9 Enc. Law & Proc. 481; Crisup v. Grosslight, 79 Mich. 380, 44 N. W. 621.

Steere, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought on a certain so-called accident policy of insurance, issued to plaintiff by defendant, for his protection from specified losses which might result to him in connection with the use of two designated automobiles within a stated period of time.

Within the period covered by the policy, a young man named Reagan was killed in a collision with one of the automobiles men-probate, executed and delivered an unsecured promissory note to the administratrix of a person killed by one of the insured's taxicabs, there being nothing to indicate that the note was not given in good faith. Ibid.

The general question whether the giving of a note is a loss or damage within an indemnity policy is covered in the notes to Kennedy v. Fidelity & C. Co. 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 478, and West Riverside Coal Co. v. Maryland Casualty Co. 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 195.

A policy indemnifying the owner of an automobile from loss from liability imposed by law on account of injuries or death accidentally suffered, and requiring immediate written notice upon the occurrence of an accident, does not require that notice should be given of all accidents resulting from the operation of the insured's automobile, but only those accidents which result in bodily injuries to others are within the meaning of the provision. Chapin v. Ocean Acci. & Guarantee Corp. — Neb. —, — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 147 N. W. 465.

The provision in such policy requiring immediate written notice of the occurrence of an accident is not unreasonable. Ibid.

The word "immediate," as there used, does not mean instantly, but means within a reasonable time, having regard to all of the circumstances. Ibid.

The word "accident," as used in such policy, means an undersigned and unforeseen occurrence of an afflictive or unfortunate character, resulting in bodily injury to a person other than the insured. Ibid.

Where at the time a person was thrown from his bicycle through being struck by the insured's automobile no injury was apparent, and the person thrown stated that he had received none, and for about a year thereafter the insured honestly believed that none had resulted, it cannot be said as a matter of law that the conditions of the accident were such as to bring it within the class in which it was the insured's duty to give immediate notice, or that the notice given was not given within a reasonable time, where it appears that upon the insured's being notified that a suit was to be brought against him to recover for the injury, he immediately notified the insurer. Ibid.

J. T. W.

tioned, while plaintiff was driving it. An inquest held over the remains of the young man resulted in a finding of the coroner's jury that he came to his death through plaintiff's negligence in operating his automobile, and criminal prosecution was recommended. An agent of defendant, experienced in that class of work, made an investigation of the accident, viewing the premises and taking the statements of witnesses, and attended the inquest. He informed plaintiff that the company would defend him in any civil action brought against him for damages, but that the insurance did not cover criminal cases.

Plaintiff was subsequently arrested and prosecuted for manslaughter. He requested the insurance company to defend him, which it declined to do on the ground that its policy did not include criminal prosecutions. He then employed his own counsel, being ultimately tried for the offense and found not guilty by the verdict of a jury. An action, entitled Reagan v. Patterson, was also begun against him in the Branch county circuit court by the father of deceased, in which plaintiff claimed $10,000 damages for the death of his son; the case involving the same facts as the criminal prosecution. At the time this case was argued here, the insurance company was defending that civil case for damages, under the requirements of its policy. Plaintiff expended $2,258.46 in attorney fees and other expenses in his defense in the criminal prosecution against him for manslaughter. This action is to recover from defendant those expenditures.

Defendant's obligations as stated in the policy in question were as follows:

"(1) To indemnify the assured named and described in the declarations against loss from the liability imposed by law upon him for damages on account of bodily injuries, including death, at any time resulting therefrom, accidentally sustained by any person or persons, by reason of the maintenance or use of any of the automobiles enumerated and described in said declarations, provided such bodily injuries are suffered within the policy period therein defined. This policy shall also cover such bodily injuries if caused by means of loading or unloading goods carried on automobiles used for transportation and delivery of materials or merchandise, and so specified in said declarations.

"(2) To serve the assured upon notice of such injuries by such investigation thereof, or by such negotiation or settlement of any resulting claims, as may be deemed expedient by the company.

"(3) To defend in the name and on behalf of the assured any suits which may at any time be brought against him on account of such injuries, including suits alleging such injuries and demanding damages therefor, although such suits, allegations, or demands are wholly groundless, false, or fraudulent.

"(4) To pay all costs taxed against the assured in any legal proceeding defended by the company according to agreement 3 above, and all interest accruing after entry of judgment upon such part of same as is not in excess of the company's limit of liability as hereinafter expressed; and

"(5) To reimburse the assured for the expense incurred in providing such immediate surgical relief as is imperative at the time of the accident."

It is claimed by plaintiff that the criminal prosecution instituted against him for manslaughter was a suit brought against him on account of bodily injuries alleged to have been sustained by reason of the use of one of the automobiles described in the policy; that under the agreement in said paragraph 3 the insurance company was obligated to defend such suit; that, having refused to do so, it is liable to him on breach of the contract for expenditures actually and necessarily made by him in employing counsel and assuming the defense of said criminal case.

The two general grounds of defense urged and argued are:

"(1) That the word 'suit' does not include criminal prosecutions brought on behalf of the people of the state of Michigan; and

"(2) That it would be against public policy to permit an insurance company to agree in advance to defend in criminal proceeding."

The word "suit," unqualified by adjective or context, has possible meanings foreign to this inquiry. When used with reference to courts, it necessarily implies a lawsuit, defined by the Century Dictionary as "a suit at law or in equity; an action or a proceeding in a civil court; a process in law instituted by one party to compel another to do him justice." It would be a forced and unnatural construction to hold that the word as used in this accident policy is intended to comprehend criminal prosecutions instituted and conducted by public officials in the name of the people, presumably for the punishment and suppression of crime.

It must be conceded that the word "suit," as applied to legal controversies, both by the legal profession and others, is now used and recognized as a generic term of broad significance, often understood and used, even by legislatures and courts, to designate almost any proceeding in a court, even, though rarely, being applied to a criminal prosecution in certain connections. Com. v. Moore, 143 Mass. 136, 58 Am. Rep.

128, 9 N. E. 25. In its strict, technical meaning, more particularly where the distinction between law and chancery is retained, as in this state, is "a proceeding in equity, the proper word for a litigation in chancery, a usual and technical designation of a proceeding in equity," as distinguished from an action at law. 37 Cyc. 524.

But, irrespective of lexicographers and precise technical definition, the expression "criminal suit" is unnatural and awkward to the professional ear and is seldom used, even in common parlance. "Suit," in its general, unqualified use in legal documents, such as the one before us, naturally means, and should be construed as intended to include, the mode or manner authorized and adopted by law to redress civil injuries. Such is the view expressed by able authorities when carefully considering and directly treating the question. Many of these authorities are cited in 27 Cyc. 522. In the lengthy and exhaustive case of Cohen v. Virginia, 6 Wheat. 264, 5 L. ed. 257, Chief Justice Marshall says: "What is a suit? We understand it to be the prosecution or pursuit of some claim, demand, or request; in law language, it is the prosecution of some demand in a court of justice. The remedy for every species of wrong is, says Judge Blackstone, 'the being put in possession of that right whereof the party injured is deprived.' The instruments whereby this remedy is obtained are a diversity of suits and actions, which are defined by the Mirror to be 'the lawful demand of one's right.' Or, as Bracton and Fleta express it, in the words of Justinian, 'jus prosequendi in iustico quod alicui debetur.' Blackstone then proceeds to describe every species of remedy by suit; and they are all cases where the party suing claims to obtain something to which he has a right."

Furthermore, the two essentials of a contract of insurance which are to be considered together in this inquiry are the subject-matter and the risk insured against. The two automobiles constitute the subject-matter in relation to which the risk was assumed. Construing the various provisions of the policy together, we think it clearly evident that the controlling thought as to indemnity, the thing contracted for, was protection against risk of liability for injury resulting from accidents in the operation of the automobiles, not risk of public prosecution for crimes or misdemeanors committed in the use of them; and we conclude from the context that in this policy the word "suits" must be taken to mean civil suits which would determine the pecuniary liability of defendant for injury to person or property; suits which, because 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) of its promised indemnity, defendant was necessarily interested in defending.

The learned circuit judge rightly held "that the provisions of said policy, read together, exclude any construction making it the legal duty of defendant to defend plaintiff on the criminal charge of manslaughter, and that consequently the defendant is entitled to an instructed verdict."

As these views dispose of the case, it becomes unnecessary to consider the other interesting question raised by defendant.

The judgment is affirmed.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

MYRTLE E. BOWEN

v.

PRUDENTIAL INSURANCE COMPANY
OF AMERICA, Appt.

(— Mich. —, 144 N. W. 543.)

Insurance — approval of application — delivery of policy.

1. Where a applicant for life insurance agreed that the policy should not take effect until issued and delivered, the approval of the application and execution of the policy by the insurer creates no liability, in default of its actual delivery.

Same — constructive delivery.

2. The transmission of a policy of life insurance to a general agent of the insurer for delivery to the applicant, with instructions not to deliver it to the applicant unless in good health, is not such constructive delivery thereof as will put the policy in force, where the applicant has agreed that the policy shall not become operative until it shall be issued and delivered, and the first premium paid thereon in full, while the applicant's health is in the same condition as described in the application.

Same — delivery to special agent.

3. The receipt of a life insurance policy by a special agent, through whom the negotiations for insurance had been conducted, two days after the death of the insured, is not a constructive delivery to the insured which will satisfy a stipulation in the application that the policy shall not take effect until issued and delivered while the health of the insured is in the same condition as described in the application.

Note. — The subject of the effect of stipulation in application or policy of life insurance, that it shall not become binding unless delivered to assured while in good health, is covered in the notes to Roe v. National L. Ins. Co. 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1144, and Connecticut General L. Ins. Co. v. Mullen, 43 L.R.A. (N.S.) 725.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Montcalm County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a life insurance policy. Reversed. The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Kleinhans, Knappen, & Uhl, for appellant:

Applicant's agreement was binding, and the policy was of no effect unless delivered.

Unterharnscheidt v. Missouri State L. Ins. Co. — Iowa, —, 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 743, 138 N. W. 459.

Steere, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff brought this action in the circuit court of Montcalm county to recover the amount of an insurance policy for $1,000, alleged to have been issued by defendant on the life of her husband, Eugene T. Bowen, who was accidentally killed on the 28th of January, 1911. Deceased resided in Montcalm county, near Howard City, which was his postoffice address. Said policy is dated the 24th day of January, 1911, and at the time of the death of deceased was in the hands of Charles McCready, state manager for defendant, located at Wichita, Kansas. Defendant was and is a foreign corporation organized under the laws of the state of New Jersey, with its home office at Newark in said state, being authorized to do business in the states of Kansas and Michigan, respectively.

The issue presented is whether or not said policy ever became operative. It is claimed by defendant that it had not yet become valid and binding because of non-delivery.

The facts in the case are practically undisputed. Eugene T. Bowen, deceased, made application on December 27, 1910, for insurance in defendant company, naming plaintiff as the beneficiary. At that time his age on his nearest birthday was thirty-four years; he having been born on June 29, 1876. He asked to have his policy dated on the day he made his application. The application was solicited and taken by an acquaintance of deceased, named Van Ostrand, who was a special agent of defendant, apparently with a roving commission, but working under said McCready, the Kansas state manager of Wichita. Van Ostrand's home was in Marion, Kansas, and his position with defendant was superintendent of agencies under McCready. At the time of making his application Bowen paid Van Ostrand $21.43, which was an amount equal to the first premium on the policy applied for, taking a receipt, which provided that such payment would in no manner be binding on the company, except that it would be returned in case the company declined to issue a policy on the life of the applicant. A statement of physical examination for insurance made by a local physician not authorized by defendant accompanied the application; but the defendant company required an examination made by its own medical examiner. This examination was had on January 16, 1911, and the medical examiner's report duly forwarded to the home office of defendant. After this was received and approved, the policy in question was prepared, dated January 24, 1911, and mailed on that date, with instructions attached, to said Manager McCready, at Wichita, Kansas. It was received by McCready on Saturday, January 28th, some time during the forenoon. He also received about the same time a letter of instructions, dated January 25th, relative to an apparent discrepancy between the statements of age found in the application and report of defendant's medical examiner. This we regard as unimportant, inasmuch as it appears clearly there was no discrepancy in fact; deceased's nearest birthday having changed between the time of his application and the time of his last medical examination. Attached to the policy was a red slip of instructions to agents such as the company was in the custom of sending with all its policies, and receipt for the insured to sign. The latter was to be countersigned by the agent delivering the policy. The slip also gave directions not to deliver the policy unless the applicant was at the time in a satisfactory state of health. On the same day this policy was received by McCready, Saturday, January 28th, Bowen was killed, some time between 2 and 3 o'clock in the afternoon, while working in the field near his home in Montcalm county, hauling stumps with a team, having apparently been struck by the root of a stump on which he was working. When last seen alive by his father shortly before the accident on the same afternoon, he was in good health, and had been so continuously from the time he made application for insurance. As far as shown his death was entirely accidental. On Monday, January 30th, McCready, having no knowledge of the applicant's death, mailed the policy, with the red slip of instructions, premium receipt, and letter of instructions relative to the discrepancy in the age to B. D. Van Ostrand, superintendent of agencies, Topeka, Kansas; that being his business address. Forwarding these papers to the agent who secured the application, for delivery to the applicant according to inclosed instructions, was in pursuance of the usual custom of defendant. Bowen being dead when Van Ostrand received these papers, he returned the same to Manager McCready on February 3d, notifying him of the situation, at the same time remitting the amount paid him by Bowen to meet the first premium. This was sent to Bowen's family on February 24th, with a request for return of the receipt for same given by Van Ostrand to Bowen on December 27, 1910. This receipt contained the following clause: "It is understood that this payment is in no way binding upon the said company, except that said company agrees to return the amount mentioned hereon in case the company declines to grant a policy on the life of said applicant." This amount was again sent to McCready on April 11th by plaintiff's attorney, who insisted that defendant was liable upon the policy under a completed contract of insurance.

Plaintiff's declaration contains two counts; one alleging delivery of the policy on January 28th to plaintiff "or some person for and in his behalf," the second basing a claim of liability on acceptance of the application and execution of the policy.

Defendant pleaded the general issue, and gave special notice of defense, alleging agreement that there should be no contract of insurance until delivery of the policy, and that the same was never delivered to said Bowen or anyone in his behalf prior to his death or at any other time; also giving notice of payment into court of the money received by Van Ostrand from applicant, a tender of which had been kept alive in the meantime.

At the close of plaintiff's evidence, and again at the close of all the testimony in the case, defendant's counsel moved for a directed verdict in its behalf on the ground of nondelivery of the policy. This was denied by the court, and verdict directed in favor of the plaintiff on the ground that there had been full performance on the part of deceased, following which the company had executed the policy, transmitted it from the home office to its agent for delivery, and therefore, deceased being in a legal position at the time of his death to have demanded and compelled delivery of said policy, the same was valid and binding.

Plaintiff's claim that approval of the application and execution of the policy by defendant created a liability in the absence of delivery cannot be sustained. In his application, over his own signature, Bowen expressly agreed "that the policy herein applied for shall be accepted subject to the privileges and provisions therein contained, and said policy shall not take effect until the same shall be issued and delivered by the said company, and the first premium paid thereon in full, while my health is in the same condition as described in this application."

This is plain language, easily understood. The application was initiative of the proposed contract, would become a part of it when consummated, was binding on the applicant, and fixed the time when his policy should become operative and his insurance begin. It is presumed to have been understandingly made. Van Buren v. St. Joseph County Village F. Ins. Co. 28 Mich. 398; American Ins. Co. v. Stoy, 41 Mich. 385, 1 N. W. 877.

While it is generally held, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, that actual delivery is not a prerequisite of insurance, provided the contract is otherwise complete, and it is evident that the parties intended it should be effectual without manual delivery of the policy, although the ultimate issue of one was contemplated, it is also well settled that, "if there be a provision or an agreement that the policy shall not be in force until actual delivery to the insured, the contract is not consummated nor the company bound in the absence of such delivery." 1 Joyce, Ins. § 98. "A contract of insurance never becomes complete until the last act necessary to be done by either party has in fact been done, although one side or the other may conditionally bind itself by a proposition which, when unconditionally accepted, ripens the negotiation into a contract. In the case of fire insurance contracts there is often a contract before the policy is issued or before it is delivered to the insured; but this is seldom so with life insurance agreements, because there is usually, in the applications as well as the policies, a stipulation that the policy shall not be binding until delivery to the assured while in good health, and payment of the premium by him. Such conditions are valid and binding, and will be enforced." 1 Bacon, Ben. Soc. 3d ed. § 272.

A contract of insurance rests upon and is controlled by the same principles of law applicable to any other contract. What the contracting parties intended, mutually agreed to, and their minds met upon, is the measure of their obligations. They could agree that the policy, though approved and executed, should have no effect until delivered, or till a certain time had arrived, or until some other condition had been performed, and when this is established the courts have no authority to make the contract binding upon either party contrary to their intention and the terms of their express agreement.

Here it was plainly agreed in writing that the policy in question should not take effect until issued and delivered to Bowen while he was in as good health as when he applied for the insurance.

It is contended in behalf of plaintiff that under the circumstances shown there was in contemplation of law such constructive delivery of the policy as complies with the terms of the contract. This is based on approval of the application, execution of the policy, and mailing it to the general agent in Kansas for delivery. Numerous cases are cited where it has been held that, if the premium is paid or acknowledged, and the policy, signed in accordance with the application, transmitted to the applicant or the company's agent for delivery, the contract is complete, although the insured failed to receive it; the agent, in case it was sent to him, being regarded as agent or trustee for the insured. Most of the cases so holding are readily distinguishable from the one before us in the particular that the contract of insurance is bare of any provisions that the policy shall not become operative until the same is delivered to the insured while in good health, and it was therefore forwarded for unconditional delivery; the contract being complete in all its essentials, and nothing remaining to be done but put it into the hands of the insured. The principle deducible from those authorities is thus stated, in May, on Insurance, 4th ed. vol. 1, § 60: "To constitute a delivery of a policy, it is not necessary that there should be an actual manual transfer from one party to the other. The agreement upon all the terms, and the issue and transmission to the agent of a policy in accordance therewith, for delivery without conditions, is tantamount to a delivery to the insured."

Can it be said here that the policy was transmitted to the agent for unconditional delivery? While the word "issued" is often loosely used in relation to the execution and transmission of a document, issuing and delivering are in this connection equivalent legal terms. A policy of insurance is the formal, written instrument in which a contract of insurance is embodied, and in its nature such as to be within the general rule of law that a contract in writing cannot be varied or altered by parol testimony. When the contract provides that it shall not be operative until the instrument is delivered to the assured, delivery means, as in case of delivery of muniments of title, a surrender of possession and control, the transfer of the instrument from the grantor to the grantee, or some person in his behalf, in such a manner as to deprive the grantor of the right to recall it at his option. Bou- vier's Law Dict. There are two essentials to such a delivery,—an intention to deliver, and an act evincing a purpose to part with control of the instrument. It is difficult to gather such intention from the undisputed facts in this case. The contrary is the natural inference. The policy was not mailed to the insured, who lived in Michigan, nor to a local agent there, but to the general manager of defendant in Kansas, under whom the canvasser who secured the application worked, and who also resided in Kansas. It was sent from the head office to a subordinate office of defendant in due course of business and according to the general custom, addressed to the manager under whom the soliciting agent acted, accompanied by positive written instructions that it should not be delivered to the applicant except upon certain conditions, one of which was that he should be in as good health as when he applied for insurance. This condition the applicant knew of, and had consented to as a part of his contract. It is true that he would not be bound by any secret instructions to the agent, of which he had no knowledge, and in relation to which he had not contracted; but of this condition he did have knowledge and had so contracted. That he knew his application was tentative, at the option of defendant, and subject to certain conditions, and that in the regular course of business some time must elapse before his insurance would become effective if finally granted, is clearly indicated. Defendant had once refused to accept the application without a further medical examination, to which he had subsequently submitted, in Howard City, Michigan, but twelve days before his death, and the physician's report had thereafter been forwarded to defendant's office in Newark, New Jersey. The instructions sent with the policy are competent and persuasive evidence of an intent tending to negative the claimed inference, from its being mailed to the Kansas manager as a step towards ultimate delivery, that it was in effect sent to the local agent for "delivery without conditions." Usage and accompanying instructions are proper to be taken into account as aids in discovering intent when considering the question of delivery.

Bowen did not receive the policy, and had no notice that his application was accepted, during his lifetime. On the day of his death, and shortly before it occurred, the policy was received in Wichita, Kansas by McCready, who had nothing to do with taking the application and no previous dealings with Bowen. There were no personal relations between them in connection with placing the insurance which made McCready Bowen's agent to receive and hold the policy for him. Busher v. New York L. Ins. Co. 72 N. H. 551, 58 Atl. 41. Van Ostrand, who had conducted the negotiations, was the only representative of defendant Bowen knew or was known to. To him naturally, and according to the usual custom of defendant, would be intrusted the duty of closing the contract and delivering the policy. He did not receive it until over two days after the applicant's death, and certainly could not become the agent of one then deceased.

In the numerous cases which have been passed upon by various tribunals where it was shown insurance policies had been forwarded to local agents for delivery, the courts, in determining whether or not there was a constructive delivery and completed contract, have, as a rule, recognized and been guided by the distinction between those cases in which, pursuant to a completed contract, the policy had been forwarded for unconditional delivery, and those where, by the terms of the contract, something yet remained to be done by the agent as a condition precedent to delivery.

Authorities are to be found where the claim of constructive delivery has been sustained under the particular facts shown in special cases in which the local agent, through whom the application was made, having received a policy for conditional delivery, after ample time and opportunity in which to act, neglected or failed to make the delivery. The leading cases along that line, and which it is contended are controlling here, are New York L. Ins. Co. v. Babcock, 104 Ga. 67, 42 L.R.A. 88, 69 Am. St. Rep. 134, 30 S. E. 273, and Unterharnscheidt v. Missouri State L. Ins. Co. — Iowa, —, 45 L.R.A. (N.S.) 743, 138 N. W. 459.

In the latter case the application contained a provision that the insurance should not take effect unless the policy was delivered and accepted during the life time and good health of the applicant. The applicant resided in Sioux City, Iowa, and transacted the business with a resident agent of the defendant. A policy dated July 8, 1910, was mailed from the home office of the company to the local agent in Sioux City, with an accompanying letter of instructions not to deliver the same "unless settlement has been received and applicant in good health." The letter bore date July 19, 1910, and would reach him in due course of mail not later than July 20th; but the local agent left Sioux City, July 15th, and did not return until August 7th following. The letter, with policy inclosed, was delivered at his office and remained there unopened until his return. Some days after it was delivered at the agent's office the applicant sickened, and died August 2, 1910. With-not attempting to review and reconcile, or fully accepting as applicable to this class of cases, all that is said in that opinion, we fully indorse the controlling, fundamental principle there declared that a party cannot take advantage of his own wrong nor profit by his own delinquencies, upon which ground the decision could well rest under the circumstances shown. It also finds support in an Iowa statute referred to. Among other things, the court said of delivery to an agent: "It is quite obvious that this may or may not be true according to the circumstances under which the policy is placed in the agent's hands. If the premium is paid when the application is presented, and such application is approved and policy executed as of that date, and nothing remains but to deliver the paper to the insured, it may well be held that the sending of it to the agent, to be by him given over to such insured person, constitutes a sufficient delivery in law. To say the least, the neglect or omission of the agent under such circumstances to perform the manual act of placing the policy in the hands of the insured will not serve to suspend or postpone the obligation of the company upon its contract. In other words, delivery in law is not necessarily manual delivery. . . . In other words, the applicant had complied with all the requirements of the contract on his part, and was entitled to receive the policy. He was not responsible for the voluntary absence of the agent, and his rights cannot be abridged or lost by the failure of the agent to perform his duty in the premises. . . . Our statute relating to life insurance provides that, where an applicant submits to medical examination by the company's physician, and is pronounced a fit subject of insurance, such company, in the absence of fraud, shall be estopped from pleading that the insured person 'was not in the condition of health required by the policy at the time of the issuance or delivery thereof.' Code, § 1812. No fraud is pleaded, and none is shown in testimony."

In New York L. Ins. Co. v. Babcock, supra, which is quoted from extensively and followed in the Unterharnscheidt Case, Babcock made application for insurance to the local agent at Dalton, Georgia, where both resided. He paid the first year's premium, and took from the agent a receipt therefor, which provided that the company assumed no responsibility except to return the money, unless, among other things, the policy was issued and delivered to him while in good health. The application which he signed contained no such condition. In its opinion the court intimates that the condition in the receipt as to delivery while in good health was no part of the contract, 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

but thereafter discusses certain aspects of the case as though it was. The application was approved, and a policy executed and mailed to the local agent at Dalton for delivery, without instructions and unconditionally, so far as shown. It was received by the local agent about 2 P. M. November 30, 1895. Babcock's office was near by the agent's; but no effort was made to deliver the policy to him, and it remained in the agent's possession until after Babcock's death, he having been shot and killed in his office on the afternoon of December 1, 1895. The court, after declaring the rule that "the fundamental question to be determined in legal construction of all contracts is, What was the real intention of the parties?" discussing the condition in the receipt, said: "Assuming that this condition constitutes a part of the agreement between the parties, it then becomes a material question as to whether or not such delivery was affected before the death of the insured. This is also a question of intention, and must be determined from the facts and circumstances in the case. . . . On the other hand, where a person parts with dominion and control over a thing by transmitting it, for example, through the mails or otherwise, with the intention that it shall pass unconditionally into the hands of another, and in the course of transportation it has become lost, the delivery is nevertheless complete in law." The court then, after reviewing numerous authorities and discussing them at length, apparently concludes from the facts in the case before it that the company intended to and did forward the policy to its local agent for unconditional delivery, saying: "When his application was accepted at the home office in New York, and a policy issued thereon was placed in the mails for the sole purpose of ultimately reaching his hands, the company parted with its possession and control of the paper. The intention to deliver was complete." A statutory provision of that state is also referred to as having an important bearing; the court saying: "But the contract may be otherwise proved, and, when it is shown to be in writing, it is ordinarily binding upon the company, though there should be no delivery whatever, either actual or constructive, of the policy, and though it should remain in the hands of the company. This principle is settled by the provisions of our statute, which declares: 'Such contract [fire insurance], to be binding, must be in writing; but delivery is not necessary if, in other respects, the contract is consummated.' Civil Code, § 2089. By § 2117 of the Civil Code the same principle is made applicable to life insurance." In the concluding paragraph of its opinion the court says: "In any view, then, that we take of this case, whether the receipt given by the local agent to the applicant constitutes a part of the contract of insurance or not, the defendant company was liable. The insured had complied with every condition and had done everything required of him in order to obtain insurance upon his life. The company had unconditionally accepted his application, and issued a policy to be unconditionally delivered to him. That policy was received by its local agent, who, through negligence or in disregard of his obligations both to his company and to the other contracting party, failed, without excuse and without authority, to hand the policy to its real owner. In consequence of this failure and negligence, the company contends it is not liable. It thus seeks to take advantage of the wrong of its own agent by virtually pleading his negligence as a defense to this action."

The strong, sound, underlying principle in both of the foregoing decisions, and which, standing alone, justifies the results reached, is that the defendants could not escape liability by relying on their own wrongs, and are estopped by their misconduct and negligence, or that of their local agents through whom the applications were made, from denying a delivery which they should have made, and therefore the court could and did say that there was a constructive delivery.

The facts here differ in material particulars from those shown in the two cases just referred to, and we have no such statutory provisions in this state as gave support to those decisions. We find nothing in this case to take it out of the general rules applicable to insurance contracts as digested, from prevailing authorities cited, in 25 Cyc. pp. 718, 719. It is there said: "Likewise the placing of the completed policy in the hands of the agent for delivery without condition to the insured completes the contract, although the actual delivery by the agent to the insured is not made before the death of the insured. But, if the delivery to the agent of the company is with the understanding that it is to be delivered by the agent to the insured only after the performance of some condition, then, until the condition is performed, and it becomes the duty of the agent to deliver the policy to the insured, the contract is not completed. . . . It is a usual condition of a life insurance policy that the delivery shall not be effectual to create a binding contract unless the insured is alive and in good health when the policy is delivered and the first premium paid, and under such conditions the death of the insured before the delivery of the policy will prevent its becoming effectual. And this is true, even in the absence of such a condition, if the policy is not to take effect until delivery, for the death of the insured makes a subsequent contract with him impossible."

A leading case supporting the rule that conditional delivery to the agent is not delivery to the applicant is McCully v. Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. 18 W. Va. 782, in which deceased applied to the local agent of his home city, Wheeling, West Virginia, for a policy of $1,000 life insurance. The application which he signed contained a provision that "this application shall be completed by delivery of the policy." A policy was sent to the local agent about September 1st. It contained a provision that it should take effect when countersigned by the local agent. It was not countersigned by the agent, nor ever delivered to the applicant, who was taken ill after the policy was received by the agent, and died on September 28th. Various questions were raised in the case; but it was disposed of on the ground that there was no completed contract of insurance because the policy was not countersigned by the agent nor delivered to the applicant. The court said in part: "All of these conditions, whether wise or not, reasonable or unreasonable, are within the power of the insurer to impose. The insurer is not bound to accept the proposal made, and may impose such additional requirements to create the contract as it sees fit. . . . The applicant in this case agreed that no contract should be consummated except upon delivery of the policy. This was a most important stipulation. Many troubles might arise between the application and the delivery which would induce the company not to contract. The party's health might fail; his habits might become such as to make him an undesirable person to insure; it might be ascertained that the answers made in the application to important questions were untrue. . . . It seems to me, therefore, that, if the policy in this case had not in fact been delivered to McCully, no contract had arisen between him and the company. . . . In no view of this case can I see that a contract was at any time consummated between the parties. The mere sending of the policy to the agent did not make the contract. Beyond the policy itself there was no evidence of a willingness to contract. It is unlike those cases where there was an antecedent complete contract, and the policy was but the mere formal expression of the previous contract. . . . McCully had no notice, actual or constructive, of the acceptance of his proposal, and, according to the authorities, at any time before such notice, if there had been an acceptance, it could have been withdrawn. The conditions upon which, by the terms of the policy, it was to take effect, were never complied with, and the negotiations between the parties were never terminated by a mutual agreement between them."

That case was more favorable to plaintiff than this in the particular that the policy was in the hands of the local agent through whom the business had been transacted at a time when the applicant was alive and well; while here the special agent who took the application was not located in the same town or state, and did not receive the policy during the applicant's lifetime. There is nothing in this case to indicate that Bowen was in any way deceived or misled, or that he understood he would be insured until his policy was delivered to him while in good health, as agreed in his contract.

We are constrained to hold, under the documentary history and undisputed facts of this case, that the tentative contract of insurance was never consummated by delivery of the policy to the applicant during his lifetime.

The judgment is therefore reversed, and no new trial granted.

It is not intended in this note to discuss the recovery by the client from his debtor of stipulated attorney's fees, and the citation of a few cases of this character is only by way of illustration.

Where the contract between attorney and client does not fix the compensation, its measure is what the services are reasonably worth. If the matter were to be decided by strict logic, it would seem that the stipulation in the contract between the debtor and creditor had nothing to do with matters between the creditor and his attorney. CROSS APPEALS from a judgment of the District Court for Chaves County in plaintiff's favor in a suit to recover attorney's fees alleged to be due and unpaid; defendant appealing from the judgment, and plaintiff appealing from an order denying affirmance of the judgment of a Justice of the Peace before whom the cause originated. Reversed on defendant's appeal.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. E. Rogers for plaintiff.

Messrs. Reid & Hervey for defendant.

Roberts, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellee instituted suit before a justice of the peace in Chaves county to recover the sum of $85, alleged to be due him from the appellant as attorney's fees. In the justice court appellant interposed a plea to the jurisdiction of the justice of the peace, which was overruled, and thereupon it declined to plead further, and judgment was rendered in favor of appellee for the sum prayed for in his complaint. Appellant appealed to the district court, and there conceded the jurisdiction of the justice of the peace, whereupon appellee moved for judgment of the district court affirming the judgment of the justice of the peace, which stipulated in the contract between debtor and creditor, owing solely to the deficiency in the proceeds of the property liable, or to the inability of the debtor to pay, the strict logic of the situation is properly applicable, as in ROGERS v. KEMP LUMBER Co., where it would seem clear that the court correctly decided that the attorney was not entitled to recover the amount stipulated in the mortgage for attorney's fees.

Where creditor has collected attorneys' fees.

But where the creditor has collected from his debtor the amount stipulated for in the contract, and attorney and client have no agreement fixing the amount of the attorney's compensation, may the attorney then motion was overruled, and which ruling of the court is assigned as error by appellee upon a cross appeal. The assignment is wholly without merit, as the case in the district court is triable de novo upon the merits under our statute.

The facts necessary to be stated to understand the question raised by appellant by his assignment of errors may be briefly stated as follows: Appellant held a power of sale mortgage, securing a note which provided, upon default, for 10 per cent additional upon the amount of principal and interest unpaid "for attorney's fees, if placed in the hands of an attorney for collection." The mortgagor being in default, appellant consulted appellee as an attorney, relative to the procedure to be taken by it to foreclose the mortgage and its rights under the mortgage, and had him draw a pencil memorandum of a notice of sale, which appellant caused to be published, as required by law. Appellant sold the property under the notice of sale for $850, which was sufficient to cover the principal, interest, and costs of sale, not including any charge, however, for attorney's fees. Appellee claims that he is entitled to 10 per cent of the amount due on the note at the time of sale as attorney's fees, by reason of the stipulation in the note above set out. Appellant, on the other hand, insists that he is only entitled to reasonable compensation, and as the evidence introduced upon the trial in the district court, without dispute, shows that recover the amount of "attorney's fees" which was stipulated for between the debtor and the creditor, and which the creditor has collected? It would seem that in this case the answer to the question does not depend upon strictly logical rules, but is governed by the view obtaining in the particular jurisdiction with reference to the recovery upon stipulations for attorneys' fees in contracts; that is to say, is such recovery allowed as liquidated damages, or is it allowed only as an indemnity?

Where such fees are considered purely as liquidated damages, it would seem that the logical rule should apply, that the principal contract has no connection with the relations between attorney and client. This would seem to be indicated by cases sustaining the theory of liquidated damages where the question arose between debtor and creditor. Thus, for example, in Barbee v. Aultman, 102 Iowa, 278, 71 N. W. 235, the court described the situation which existed in Iowa before the statute regulating the matter as follows: "Whether the plaintiff had a contract with his attorney for more or less than was recovered on the note was entirely immaterial, and whether the attorney was paid for his services was also regarded as unimportant. . . . The judgment for fees was not held in trust for the attorney, for, in the absence of a contract between himself and his client, he had no interest in the amount recovered."

So, in Scholey v. De Mattos, 18 Wash. 504, 52 Pac. 242, it was held that the fact that the attorney was to receive less than the sum stipulated as fees in the contract was no defense to the debtor against paying such stipulated sum, under the old statute, providing that "in all judgments on promissory notes and similar instruments in writing, whether secured by mortgage or not, an attorney's (fee) may be allowed when specially contracted to be paid by the terms of the note or mortgage, in any amount so specially contracted."

But the situation is different where the theory of indemnity applies, for there the creditor is only allowed to recover these fees upon the theory that he has to pay them over to his attorney. Thus, for example, we find it has been held that, to entitle a plaintiff in foreclosure to recover attorney's fees where the same are stipulated for in the mortgage, he must show an agreement to pay his attorney a fixed or reasonable sum for his services, and the reasonableness of the fee agreed upon, or what is a reasonable fee in such an action. Porter v. Title Guaranty & S. Co. 17 Idaho, 364, 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 111, 106 Pac. 299; that an agreement by the plaintiff with his attorney for a sum smaller than is stipulated for attorney's fees in the principal contract will limit his recovery for attorney's fees to such smaller sum (Kennedy v. Richardson, 70 Ind. 524; Dunovant v. Stafford, 36 Tex. Civ. App. 33, 81 S. W. 101, obiter); that the holder could recover on the note only such amount for attorney's fees as his attorney could recover from him for his services, as in such case the attorney could recover only the reasonable value of his services, and that should be the measure of the recovery which the holder of the note could obtain against the maker (Texas Land & Loan Co. v. Robertson, 38 Tex. Civ. App. 521, 85 S. W. 1020); that the maker of a note stipulating for 10 per cent attorney's fees was estopped, in the absence of fraud or mistake, from claiming that the amount was not reasonable against his creditor, who had already contracted to pay his attorneys that amount (Dunovant v. Stafford, supra). So there are statutes requiring an affidavit of the attorney that there has been no agreement between the attorney and any other person to divide the fee before any allowance of attorney's fees shall be made by the court. Wilkins v. Troutner, 66 Iowa, 557, 24 N. W. 37.

Probably the decision in ROGERS v. KEMP LUMBER Co. would have been for the attorney if the client had collected the fees from his debtor, as the same court said in Exchange Bank v. Tuttle, 5 N. M. 427, 7 L.R.A. 445, 23 Pac. 241, in sustaining a judgment on a note, including 10 per cent attorney's fees, such being stipulated in $25 is the reasonable value of the services performed by appellee, his recovery should be limited to that amount. There was some claim made by appellant to the effect that there was an account stated between the parties for $10 as compensation; but, as appellee testified that this sum was for only a part of the work done by him, viz., drawing the notice of sale, and did not include advice and consultation, we will not consider the question, but will treat it as not being involved in the case.

It will thus be observed that the question in the case is as to whether or not the stipulation in a note of fixed percentage as attorney's fees is the measure of compensation between attorney and client, where a dispute arises between them as to the attorney's compensation, in the absence of a contract, express or implied, fixing such amount as compensation. Upon the question no authorities have been cited by either party, but on principle it would seem that the question must be answered in the negative. The stipulated amount in the note is the limit of the payee's right to recover from the payor, and is inserted solely for his benefit, and to compensate him for damages and expense entailed upon him by reason of the payor's default. As between payee and his attorney, in the absence of a contract, express or implied, the attorney is not limited to the percentage stated in the note, nor does it measure his compensation. He is entitled to recover only the reasonable value of his services.

As the undisputed facts in this case show that the reasonable value of appellee's services, based upon the quantum meruit, are $25, this cause is reversed, and the District Court is directed to enter judgment in appellee's favor for said sum; and it is so ordered.

Hanna and Parker, JJ., concur.

the note: "The amount has been fixed by the contract, and we must presume that the amount fixed was the reasonable value of the services rendered, until the contrary appears. The amount being fixed and value reasonable, the court below committed no error in giving judgment for the amount provided for in the note."

The question of attorney's fees arose directly between attorney and client in Thayer v. Harbican, 70 Wash. 278, 126 Pac. 625, where the terms of the notes and mortgage do not appear, but a foreclosure suit upon them was settled upon payment of principal, interest, costs, and "an attorney's fee of $300," and it was held that the attorney was entitled to collect the entire $300, from his client for his fees. The attorney, said the court, had no right to exact that sum from the debtor, nor the client to receive it, "except as a reasonable attorney's fee for the work done. They are both, under these circumstances, estopped to say that the amount so exacted and paid was not the reasonable value of the attorney's services. The rights of the parties being thus established by the admitted facts, the plaintiff was entitled to judgment as a matter of law. . . . While a valid contract might have been made between the parties here, as attorney and client, for more than the amount exacted from the mortgagor as an attorney's fee, no valid contract could have been made which contemplated less. Since the act of 1895 (Laws 1895, p. 81; Rem. & Bal. Code, § 475), the amount of the attorney's fee which may be collected from a mortgagee is no longer the subject of binding stipulation in the mortgage or note, though prior to that time it was. Since that act, a reasonable fee only can be exacted in any event; and manifestly no sum larger than that received by the attorney would be a reasonable fee. Any other construction of that statute would allow the attorney's fee collected from the mortgagor to be made a cloak for usury. In any event, therefore, the respondent, having collected $300 as an attorney's fee, was estopped to claim it, or any part of it, as his own. There could, hence, be no bona fide dispute that that sum, at least, was due to the appellant."

In Thayer v. Harbican the court, in saying that the client was "estopped" to deny that the services of the attorney were reasonably worth the sum which the client had collected as attorney's fees, probably does not mean that there was any technical estoppel. Probably the recovery of the fees by the client as an indemnity has generally occurred when the services have been practically finished, so that but little was intended to be left to conjecture, and it may be that in case of recovery which designedly resulted substantially to the client's own benefit, the debtor might have an action against him for money had and received. But while the decision in the Thayer Case seems fair and reasonable, and is within the practical common sense of the situation, it is not easy to state precisely on what legal grounds it rests. Apart from the question of technical estoppel or technical logic, it seems probable that the courts will decline to permit the client who has recovered attorney's fees upon the theory of indemnity against his counsel's charges, to retain them for his own benefit, and thus profit by his dishonesty to his debtor with the assistance of the court.

As stated above, where the theory of indemnity does not obtain, the situation is entirely different.

NORTH DAKOTA SUPREME COURT.

T. J. ATWOOD, Respt.,
v.

CHARLES ROAN

and

G. A. TUCKER et al., Garnishees, Appts.

(26 N. D. 622, 145 N. W. 587.)

Writ — substituted service — sufficiency of affidavit.

1. An affidavit for publication of summons filed under § 6840, Rev. Codes 1905, requiring the "stating the place of defendant's residence, if known to the affiant, and, if not known, stating that fact," as a basis for substituted service, is not complied with by filing an affidavit stating "that the last-known postoffice address of the defendant is unknown."

Same — validity.

2. Such an affidavit for publication is not a substantial compliance with such statutory requirement, and is void.

Headnotes by Goss, J.

Note. — Right of garnishee to attack judgment against principal defendant for lack of jurisdiction.

This note presupposes that the judgment, so far as the principal defendant is concerned, is void for failure of statutory service or notice upon or to him, and does not go into the questions whether the defect is an irregularity rendering the judgment voidable, or one that renders it void. The expressions "service" or "legal" or "statutory service" or "notice" as used in this note are intended to include constructive or substituted service or notice.

The question of the relation of the garnishment proceeding to the principal suit, and the consequent nature of the attack by the garnishee upon the principal judgment as direct or collateral, is beyond the scope of this note. See, for example, Tabor v. Bank of Leadville, 35 Colo. 1, 83 Pac. 1060; Dennison v. Taylor, 142 Ill. 45, 31 N. E. 148; Simmons v. Missouri P. R. Co. 19 Mo. App. 542; Erwin v. Heath, 50 Miss. 795; Melloy v. Deal, 124 Pa. 161, 16 Atl. 747; Keystone Brewing Co. v. Canavan, 221 Pa. 366, 70 Atl. 785.

It is not in general intended to include cases holding that void judgments in the principal case are no protection against the garnishee.

It would seem to be clear that a court has no power to compel a debtor to pay his debt to a third person unless he will be protected, at least within the court's jurisdiction, in so doing, and as payment under a void judgment is no protection to the debtor, the garnishee is entitled to a day in court to attack the judgment against the principal debtor as void. Consequently, if the garnishee claims that such judgment is void for lack of service or notice upon or Garnishment — void publication of summons — effect.

3. Personal service of regular garnishment proceedings upon resident garnishee defendants was had, who defaulted, and thereby admitted liability. Subsequently, attempted substituted service of summons by publication was had upon a void affidavit for publication. Judgment was entered against both defendant and garnishee by default. Held:

(a) Such judgment as to both defendant and garnishees was void as entered without jurisdiction.

(b) Judgment against the garnishee defendants cannot be entered by default until after entry of a valid judgment against the principal defendant, the garnishment proceedings not being an independent action, but wholly ancillary to the main action against the principal defendant.

(c) Garnishee defendants by defaulting in answer are not concluded from raising the question of jurisdiction over the principal defendant by motion to vacate the judgment against the principal defendant and themselves for want of jurisdiction.

(d) Such a motion to vacate is a direct, to the principal defendant, he may raise that question in the proceedings against himself. Hinman v. Andrews Opera Co. 49 Ill. App. 135; Littlestone v. Goldenberg, 66 Ill. App. 673; Czyston v. St. Stanislaus Parish, 131 Ill. App. 161; McKey v. Cobb, 33 Miss. 533; Hinds v. Miller, 52 Miss. 845; Smith v. McCutchen, 38 Mo. 415; McCloom v. Beattie, 46 Mo. 391; Smith v. Montoya, 3 N. M. 13, 1 Pac. 175; Sun Mut. Ins. Co. v. Sceligson, 59 Tex. 3 (obiter); Beaupre v. Brigham, 79 Wis. 436, 48 N. W. 596; see also other cases infra.

So, he may raise the question that there is no judgment at all against the principal defendant. Hauptman v. Richards, 85 Mo. App. 188.

In Pierce v. Carleton, 12 Ill. 358, 54 Am. Dec. 405, the court, while deciding that there had been jurisdiction by publication to enter judgment against the principal defendant, said: "The first question arising on this record is whether a garnishee who sues out a writ of error to reverse a judgment rendered against him may inquire into the legality and regularity of the previous proceedings against the defendant in attachment. In one respect, he unquestionably can. In a suit by attachment, the court must acquire jurisdiction, and proceed to enter a judgment against the defendant, before it can pronounce any judgment against a party summoned as garnishee. If the previous proceedings are unauthorized and void, there is no sufficient basis to support the judgment against the garnishee. He would not be protected in the payment of a judgment obtained under such circumstances. It would be regarded as a voluntary, and not a compulsory, payment, and the defendant might compel him to pay a second time. It is clear, therefore, that a garnishee should be permitted and not a collateral, attack upon the purported judgment.

(e) Default of garnishee defendants cannot clothe the court with jurisdiction in the main action, or validate void proceedings taken against the principal defendant, and the proceedings against the garnishees fall with the failure of jurisdiction in the main action against the principal defendant.

(January 21, 1914.)

APPEAL by the garnishees from an order of the District Court for Stutsman County denying their application for the vacation of a judgment against them and the principal defendant for want of jurisdiction in an action of garnishment. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. George H. Stillman, for appellants:

The court was without jurisdiction to entertain the plaintiff's action.

to inquire into the validity of the previous proceedings in the case. If such proceedings are void, the judgment against the garnishee may for that cause be reversed on error."

The garnishee must see that there is jurisdiction over the principal defendant (Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Parish, 6 Ind. App. 89, 33 N. E. 122); he may object to the record of the original judgment when offered in evidence, in that it does not show service on the principal defendant the statutory length of time before judgment could be entered upon it (France v. Evans, 90 Mo. 74, 2 S. W. 141); he may attack the principal judgment on the ground that the attachment on which it was based was issued by the clerk as such an attachment was void as to the defendants in attachment, who were nonresidents and had not appeared (Flash v. Paul, 29 Ala. 141); he may plead to the jurisdiction where the service against the principal defendant, a corporation, was made on a simple stockholder (Tabor v. Bank of Leadville, 35 Colo. 1, 83 Pac. 1060); and he may raise the question that the principal defendant, a corporation, had been dissolved before the judgment against it, although such judgment was by default (Farmers' & M. Bank v. Little, 8 Watts & S. 207, 42 Am. Dec. 293).

The proceeding against a trustee in trustee process should be dismissed on his motion where there is no service on the principal (Washburn v. New York & V. Min. Co. 41 Vt. 50); and the garnishee may move to quash the writ of garnishment for lack of service upon the principal defendant in the principal suit appearing upon the record (Hedrix v. Hedrix, 103 Mo. App. 40, 77 S. W. 495, where the principal judgment preceded the garnishment). See also Steel

The garnishment proceeding authorized by our statute is not a proceeding in rem, but one strictly in personam, and the judgment against the garnishees must be preceded by a personam judgment against the defendant in the principal action.

A judgment against garnishees without a valid judgment against the principal defendant is a nullity.

v. Goodwin, 113 Pa. 288, 6 Atl. 49, where it was said obiter that, on motion of the garnishee, the court may quash the writ of attachment if the proceedings are void or grossly irregular.

And where the statutory plea for the garnishee under scire facias was limited to "no goods," etc., it was held that under it he might raise the absence of judgment in attachment. Welsh v. Blackwell, 15 N. J. L. 55.

In Blake v. Jones, 7 Mass. 28, it was held that a trustee should not plead lack of jurisdiction over the principal, unless he has effects of the principal, when he may plead in abatement lack of such jurisdiction.

There are but few cases which question the right of the garnishee to question the principal judgment as void.

In Minor v. Cook, Kirby, 157, the court refused to permit the garnishee to plead no service, on the principal defendant stating that the garnishee would not be prejudiced, as he would be indemnified against any recovery by the principal defendant to the amount he had to pay in garnishment.

In Black v. Nease, 37 Pa. 433, a case without the scope of this note, it was stated that in execution attachment, as in foreign attachments, there could be no issue raised as to the validity of the principal judgment; but the later rule in Pennsylvania would seem to be that the garnishee may attack the principal judgment whenever the principal defendant might attack it. Melloy v. Deal, 124 Pa. 161, 16 Atl. 747; Keystone Brewing Co. v. Canavan, 221 Pa. 366, 70 Atl. 785.

It may be here noted that in Foster v. Jones, 1 M'Cord, L. 116, in overruling a motion to open a judgment against the garnishee on the ground of his attorney's neg-

Messrs. Oscar J. Seiler and A. W. Aylmer for respondent.

Goss, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In September, 1908, plaintiff, Atwood, began an action in district court against defendant Roan, and obtained personal service of a garnishment upon Tucker, Wallis, and Goyden, as garnishee defendants, within Stutsman county. Personal service was not had on defendant Roan, but after service of the garnishee defendants, plaintiff filed a defective affidavit for publication of lect, it was held that the garnishee could not, if the judgment were opened, attack the principal judgment for irregularity, as his payment under order of court would protect him. Followed in Camberford v. Hall, 3 M'Cord, L. 345 (a case without the scope of this note), apparently holding that a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction is voidable, not void.

Time of attack.

It is not too late for the garnishee, after he has pleaded non assumpsit and nulla bona, to move to quash the writ of attachment on the ground of lack of legal notice to the principal defendant. Stone v. Magruder, 10 Gill & J. 383, 32 Am. Dec. 177.

But in Carrington v. Eastman, 1 Pinney (Wis.) 650, the court said: "Many other errors are complained of, such as defects in the affidavit upon which the writ was allowed; total want of legal service, etc., to all of which the ready reply is that, if ever it were competent for the garnishees to take advantage of such defects, it is too late for them to do so after their appearance to the scire facias, and plea to the merits." The court does not state whether the defects were mere irregularities or whether they rendered the judgment void.

Upon an order on the garnishee to show cause why judgment should not issue against him, he may show that the attempted service by publication upon the principal defendant was defective, and so there was no valid judgment against the principal defendant. Everett v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 4 Colo. App. 509, 36 Pac. 616.

It may be noted that where the garnishee pleaded nulla bona, he was allowed, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

summons, reciting "that the last-known post-office address of the above-named defendant, Charles Roan, is unknown," instead of stating "the place of the defendant's residence, if known to the affiant, and, if not known, stating that fact," as required by § 6840, Rev. Codes 1905. The affidavit omits to state the place of defendant's residence, or that his residence was unknown. Instead, it does allege that his last known post-office address is unknown, the equivalent of saying that he does not know what his last postoffice address was. This affidavit was the basis for substituted service by publication of summons. The garnishee defendants defaulted in answering the garnishee summons. Judgment was entered March 2, 1909, against the defendant Roan for $289.35 costs and damages upon such substituted service, and judgment was also then taken for said amount against all of the garnishee defendants. On September 23, 1911, the garnishee defendants moved to vacate the judgment taken against the defendant and themselves, basing the motion upon an affidavit reciting the alleged invalidity of the after verdict, and on payment of costs, to move to quash the proceedings on the ground that the attachment was void as the principal defendant was in the county when the attachment was issued and served. Webb v. Opera Co. 3 Pa. Dist. R. 825.

Where both principal defendant and garnishee defaulted, the plaintiff entered judgment against the principal defendant and then brought an action against the garnishee for failing to answer, and it was held that the action must fail on the defense of the garnishee that there was no legal service upon the principal defendant in the suit against him. Pope v. Hibernia Ins. Co. 24 Ohio St. 481.

It is the theory in Georgia that the garnishee cannot attack the judgment against the principal defendant until judgment is about to be entered against him (the garnishee). Merchants' & Mfrs. Nat. Bank v. Haiman, 80 Ga. 624, 5 S. E. 795, cited in Ingram v. Jackson Mercantile Co. 2 Ga. App. 218, 58 S. E. 372, followed in terms in Whaley v. Kear, 139 Ga. 16, 76 S. E. 390, where it is not as clear as it might be that the rights of the garnishee are preserved by this practice.

In Dennison v. Taylor, 142 Ill. 45, 31 N. E. 148, the court sustained the garnishee's motion in arrest of the judgment against him, on the ground of lack of jurisdiction in the principal suit by failing therein to make the statutory mailing of the notice to the principal defendant.

Upon statutory trials de novo on appeal.

Upon a trial de novo on appeal from a justice's court, the garnishee may for the first service of summons by publication in the main action, and upon the entire record, contending that the entire proceeding is void, as had without jurisdiction of the defendant Roan or any subject-matter. This motion was denied by order dated February 3, 1912, and judgment thereon entered reaffirming the judgment sought to be vacated, with added costs taxed in the sum of $15. From this order and judgment defendants appeal, staying proceedings pending appeal.

Two main questions are presented: (1) Is the affidavit for publication of summons a substantial compliance with the requirements of § 6840, or, on the contrary, is it a nullity; (2) if said affidavit be fatally defective, can the garnishee defendants, in default in answer after personal service had upon them, and who offer no answer or defense on the merits as against the purported judgment taken against them by default, now urge that the judgment taken by the plaintiff against them as garnishee defendants is invalid?

As to the first contention, it is elementary that where constructive service of summons is had, the statute governing it must be strictly complied with. The attack here made on this judgment is direct, and not collateral. Phelps v. McCollam, 10 N. D. 536, 88 N. W. 292; and Freeman v. Wood, 11 N. D. 1, 88 N. W. 721. So we are not confronted with any presumptions applicable as tending to support the validity of a judgment against collateral attack. The affidavit for publication speaks for itself, and it is not contended that there is any presumption that any other affidavit of publication was ever filed. The fact that the plaintiff may have known the place of the defendant's residence and still have been able to truthfully declare on his oath that defendant's "last-known postoffice address is unknown" to him, in itself, is enough to condemn the affidavit as invalid as a sub-time raise the question of lack of service on the principal defendant. Segar v. Muskegon Shingle & Lumber Co. 81 Mich. 344, 45 N. W. 982.

It is not too late for the garnishee to show on a trial de novo in the appellate court, that the principal judgment was obtained against an unrepresented minor, and was therefore void. Johnson v. Murphy, 124 La. 143, 49 So. 1007.

After judgment against garnishee.

It would seem reasonable that one who is brought into court by process cannot be required to take notice of subsequent events unless they occur in the proceeding in which he is brought into court, or unless actual notice of such subsequent events is given to him. Consequently, where, at the time of process against the garnishee, there is no judgment in the principal action, a subsequent judgment in the principal action should be open to attack by the garnishee after he has actual notice of it. And if judgment is entered against the garnishee before he has actual notice of the judgment against the principal defendant, he ought to be able to attack such principal judgment after judgment against himself.

The cases of Holbrook v. Evansville & T. H. R. Co. 114 Ga. 1, 39 S. E. 937; Hefernan v. Grymes, 2 Leigh, 512; and Central of Georgia R. Co. v. Wright, 5 Ga. App. 514, 63 S. E. 630, are sufficiently dealt with in ARWOOD v. ROAN. The same holding as in the Wright Case viz., that the garnishee after judgment against him may not attack the principal judgment, was repeated in Farmers' & T. Bank v. University Pub. Co. 9 Ga. App. 128, 70 S. E. 602.

—on scire facias upon judgment against garnishee.

It has been held (in trustee process) that 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) on a scire facias upon a judgment against the trustee, he might set up lack of legal service on the principal defendant. Cota v. Ross, 66 Me. 161; Thayer v. Tyler, 10 Gray, 164; Pratt v. Cunliff, 9 Allen, 90.

In Thayer v. Tyler, supra, the principal debtor and the trustee had both defaulted, and the court's decision was upon the ground that the trustee had had no day in court to raise the question of jurisdiction. The same theory prevailed in Pratt v. Cunliff, supra, where the trustee had answered, as he might properly assume that legal service would be thereafter made upon the principal defendant before the entry of judgment against the latter. In Cota v. Ross, supra, there was a jury trial, the nature of the garnishee's answer not appearing; but the court cites the foregoing Massachusetts cases.

It was held in St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. McDermitt, 91 Ark. 112, 120 S. W. 931, that a garnishee should set up defective service in the principal case as a defense, and if he has defaulted he should appeal, and he may not have the judgment questioned on certiorari.

—on appeal.

It has been held that the garnishee might raise the question for the first time on appeal.

In Schaller v. Marker, 136 Iowa, 575, 114 N. W. 43, it was held that the garnishee might raise for the first time on appeal, although he had answered below, an objection that the statutory notice had not been given to the principal defendant in the suit against him to obtain jurisdiction as to him, the defect appearing on the face of the record. The court said: "It is urged that stantial departure from statutory requirements.

An examination of the authorities is conclusive against respondent's contention that the terms "residence" and "postoffice" are interchangeable and synonymous; and that the statutory requirement of a disclosure as to the fact of residence is not complied with by a showing of fact of "last-known post-office address." See the recent cases of Gibson v. Wagner, — Colo. App. —, 136 Pac. 93, and Norris v. Kelsey, 23 Colo. App. 555, 130 Pac. 1088. The Colorado statute required the fact to be stated in the affidavit for publication that the postoffice address was unknown, and the affidavit filed stated the residence as unknown. The judgment entered thereon was held void under collateral attack, following Empire Ranch & Cattle Co. v. Gibson, 23 Colo. App. 344, 129 Pac. 520; Empire Ranch & Cattle Co. v. Howell, 22 Colo. App. 389, 125 Pac. 592; and Empire Ranch & Cattle Co. v. Coldren, 51 Colo. 115, 117 Pac. 1005, and numerous holdings cited in these opinions. See also Ruby v. Pierce, 74 Neb. 754, 104 N. W. 1142, where a return showing "last" usual place of residence was held not to be a compliance with the statutory requirement of service at the usual place of residence, and that the word "last" constituted an added unauthorized qualification to the return of service, and rendered the judgment entered thereon void. See also Wick v. Rea, 54 Wash. 424, 103 Pac. 462; Gilmore v. Lampman, 86 Minn. 403, 91 Am. St. Rep. 376, 90 N. W. 1113, where it is also pointed out why the California cases cited by respondent, particularly San Diego Sav. Bank v. Goodsell, 137 Cal. 420, 70 Pac. 300, and Hanson v. Graham, 82 Cal. 631, 7 L.R.A. 127, 23 Pac. 56, decisions under the provisions of §§ 412, 413, of the California Code of Civil Procedure, do not apply under our practice, inasmuch as under the California practice the affidavits and want of jurisdiction was not raised by the garnishee until the objection is now made for the first time on appeal, and many cases are cited to the proposition that an objection not raised nor in any way presented in the trial court cannot be considered in the appellate court; but these cases on examination are found to be those in which the error relied upon might have been cured by some action of the trial court, if there presented. Absolute want of jurisdiction of the court could not have been cured by any action which might have been taken. The court could not proceed in a case in which it had no jurisdiction to render any judgment which would have validity, and it is immaterial, therefore, that the objection was not urged before the judgment was rendered."

It may be noted that in Mahon v. Fansett, 17 N. D. 104, 115 N. W. 79, where the principal defendant had appeared in the garnishment proceeding, and the garnishee had answered admitting indebtedness to him, it was held that there could not be raised for the first time on appeal the question that no judgment had been entered against the defendant in the principal action. The court said: "It is also contended that the judgment should be reversed for the reason that no judgment had been entered against the defendant in the principal action. This question is raised for the first time on appeal. The attention of the trial court should have been called to that fact, if true, by some objection, and that court given an opportunity to rule thereon. It is too late to present the question now for the first time."

It has been held that the garnishee might replevin his property taken in execution upon the judgment against him, where there had been no legal service upon the principal debtor in the principal suit. Iron Cliffs Co. v. Lahais, 52 Mich. 394, 18 N. W. 121 (where the judgment against the garnishee was rendered after a disclosure without any subsequent summons requiring it to show cause); Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Morris, 153 Mo. App. 667, 134 S. W. 1027 (where, after answer by the garnishee and denial of it by the plaintiff, judgment had been taken against the garnishee by default).

In Friedman v. First Nat. Bank, 39 Okla. 486, 49 L.R.A.(N.S.) 548, 135 Pac. 1069, an action upon an order of garnishment failed where the judgment against the principal defendant in the suit against him was absolutely void, as there had been no legal service upon him. It does not appear whether or not the question was raised by the garnishee in the garnishment proceedings.

In Matheney v. Earl, 75 Ind. 531, the court overruled a demurrer to a complaint to enjoin a judgment entered against a debtor of the principal judgment debtor, alleging lack of service on the principal debtor in the action against him, the court stating that while the proceedings against the injunction plaintiff were not proceedings in attachment, as the moving party therein and the justice had so treated them, they ought to be so treated.

But on the other hand it was stated in Peters v. League, 13 Md. 58, 71 Am. Dec. 622, that the court would not enjoin a judgment against a garnishee on the ground that the judgment against the principal defendant was rendered by a justice without authority, as the validity of that judgment could not be assailed collaterally in the injunction suit.

order for publication are not an essential part of the record in the case. Besides, under our practice and statutes, no order for the publication is required in obtaining substituted service of summons, since the change made in 1895 from the former practice and statutory procedure requiring such an order. In many jurisdictions an order for publication is a necessary step in constructive service, and decisions are found giving force to the presumption that proper evidence of nonresidence is presumed to have been exhibited or the order for service by publication could not have been obtained, and judgments void without such a presumption obtaining have been held valid. But no presumption to this effect has ever been indulged in this state, but rather the contrary was the law when an order for publication was essential. Simensen v. Simensen, 13 N. D. 305, 100 N. W. 708, passing on the validity of a judgment entered in 1893. Manifestly, if there be any relaxing of the rule as to essentials, it would be found in such jurisdictions, instead of in those like ours, where the affidavit for publication is a necessary part of the record, and the contents of which must affirmatively establish the right to proceed further with constructive service. Though it is held in San Diego Sav. Bank v. Goodsell, supra, that the term "address" may be, for the purpose of their procedure, considered as sufficient compliance with the statute requiring the residence of a nonresident defendant to be disclosed to the court, upon an application for an order for service by publication, with direction to be made in such order for mailing of summons, that holding is not authority to the effect that an affidavit stating, as here, that the "last-known postoffice address is unknown," is the equivalent of a statement as required by our statute that the place of the defendant's residence is unknown. A glance at the many authorities cited under "residence" in vol. 7, Words & Phrases, will disclose that the term "residence" has a definite legal meaning, i. e., as a place of one's abode, dwelling, home, or habitation. Conceding that the term "address" is synonymous with "abode" or "residence," as is intimated in the California case above cited, the qualification wherein affiant swears to defendant's last-known postoffice address may or may not in fact be a compliance with the requirements of the statute that the affidavit shall state "the place of defendant's residence, if known to the affiant, and, if not known, stating that fact," according to whether the postoffice address does or does not properly designate the place of the defendant's residence. For instance, one's residence may be within one state and his postoffice within another, in which case, if the postoffice be taken as his residence, an attachment could not issue or service by publication could not be had, while with the actual place of defendant's residence stated either or both would be available. This is not only possible, but perhaps frequent as to those domiciled in either state who reside alongside of or near a boundary line between two states. We cannot hold a postoffice address to have been meant or intended to be synonymous with the mandatory statutory requirement that the place of defendant's residence, if known, shall be stated, and, if not known, that fact shall be stated, all as a basis for further proceedings in obtaining substituted service. For further cases on this subject, see North Star Lumber Co. v. Johnson (D. C.) 196 Fed. 54, appealed and affirmed in — C. C. A. —, 206 Fed. 624, discussing a similar statute of Oregon in proceedings in rem under attachment, although it seems publication is there made upon an order therefor, and Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. ed. 565. If we depart in one particular from the plain statutory requirement, on a matter concededly jurisdictional, under a theory, as here advanced, of substantial compliance, not only is the rule, consonant with all previous decisions on such jurisdictional questions, disregarded, that such requirements are to be strictly construed (see Soderberg v. Soderberg, 1 Dak. 503; Whaley v. Carter, 1 Dak. 504; Chamberlain v. Hutchins, 1 Dak. 506; Beach v. Beach, 6 Dak. 371, 43 N. W. 701; Rhode Island Hospital Trust Co. v. Keeney, 1 N. D. 411, 48 N. W. 341; Yorke v. Yorke, 3 N. D. 343, 55 N. W. 1095; Birchall v. Griggs, 4 N. D. 305, 50 Am. St. Rep. 654, 6 N. W. 842; Severn v. Giese, 6 N. D. 523, 72 N. W. 922; Simensen v. Simensen, 13 N. D. 305, 100 N. W. 708), but there is imported an element of uncertainty as to jurisdictional requirements in this and kindred proceedings in rem, where, if the plain language of the statute be adhered to as the guide, there can be neither uncertainty nor ambiguity.

We conclude that the affidavit for publication was void; that consequently no valid proceedings were thereafter had in the main action against the defendant, and that the only jurisdiction remaining in the court immediately after the filing of this purported affidavit for publication was such as was conferred upon it in a limited sense by the provisional remedy of garnishment and proceedings had thereunder. This takes us to the discussion of the garnishment side of the case.

The second question, as to the right of the garnishee defendants to attack the default judgment, involves a more extended discussion of our statutes and the general law of garnishment. The controlling sections of the statute are § 6972, expressly authorizing the service of a summons by publication upon the defendant, where service of garnishee summons has been had, and § 6977, providing that "if any garnishee, having been duly summoned, shall fail to serve his affidavit [of nonliability], . . . the court may render judgment against him for the amount of the judgment which the plaintiff shall recover against the defendant in the action for damages and costs, together with the costs of such garnishee action," and also § 6982, providing that "the proceedings against a garnishee shall be deemed an action by the plaintiff against the garnishee and defendant as parties defendant," and prescribing the procedure, and that "when the garnishment is not in aid of an execution, no trial shall be had of the garnishee action, until the plaintiff shall have judgment in the principal action, . . . and if the defendant has judgment the garnishee action shall be dismissed with costs. The court shall render such judgment in all cases as shall be just to all the parties, and properly protect their respective interests, and may adjudge the recovery of an indebtedness, . . . or personal property disclosed or found to be liable to be applied to the plaintiff's demands, or . . . when proper, direct . . . any money or other thing paid over or delivered to the clerk or officer. The judgment against a garnishee shall acquit and discharge him from all demands by the defendant, or his representative, for all money, . . . delivered or accounted for by the garnishee by force of such judgment."

These statutes authorize the service by publication of a summons against the principal defendant after the service, as here had, of the garnishee summons and proceedings upon the garnishee defendant; and answer the contention of counsel for the appellant that valid garnishment cannot be had in an action wherein the service of the summons against the principal defendant must be had by publication. It is argued with some force that, inasmuch as the judgment against the garnishee defendant cannot be entered until the entry of judgment in the main action against the defendant, the court under substituted service, being without jurisdiction of the person of defendant, and powerless therefore to enter a personal judgment against him, can enter no valid judgment against the garnishee defendants. Such is not the construction to be placed upon these statutory provisions. The portions of § 6982 authorizing the court to "adjudge the recovery of an indebtedness . . . found to be liable to be applied to plaintiff's demand" plainly have relation to the form of a judgment to be entered under § 6977 and as supplementary to that section; or, in other words, it provides that the judgment to be entered in proceedings where substituted service of the defendant is had shall be a judgment in rem (Hartzell v. Vigen, 6 N. D. 117, 35 L.R.A. 451, 66 Am. St. Rep. 589, 69 N. W. 203) against the fund to be applied to satisfy the indebtedness found to exist in plaintiff's favor against the principal defendant, and is analogous to similar proceedings under attachment. In either case, the property is subjected to the payment of the lien, whether obtained by attachment or garnishment, and the court does not, in a strict sense, render any judgment against the defendant, but merely adjudges the prima facie amount of plaintiff's recovery, and subjects the property lien in garnishment or attachment to its payment.

It is here noticeable that this defect, destroying jurisdiction over the res, the subject-matter in the main action, and of the power to proceed therein, is one of record. It does not depend upon any question of whether the record as made reflects the truth as to service, but, instead, it plainly appears from the jurisdictional papers that the affidavit for publication is insufficient to perpetuate the jurisdiction of the court over the res, already temporarily acquired by garnishment, beyond the sixty-day period after such garnishment, and upon the expiration of which period such limited jurisdiction of the court must fall in the absence of personal service in the main action, or of the first publication of a valid substituted service of the summons after the filing of a valid affidavit as a basis therefor. "Such service is a condition precedent to the preservation of such jurisdiction." Rhode Island Hospital Trust Co. v. Keeney, 1 N. D. 411, 48 N. W. 341; Gribbon v. Freel, 93 N. Y. 93. This time limit is prescribed by §§ 6844 and 6850, Rev. Codes 1905. Within sixty days after the garnishment and the jurisdiction thereunder acquired under § 6850, without a valid publication of this summons having been made upon a valid affidavit for publication, all jurisdiction, either of the res or of the garnishee defendants, was wholly divested by lapse of time, under the provisions of § 6844, Rev. Codes 1905. This must be so, unless the proceedings against the garnishee defendants are to be treated as a separate action or proceeding which may legally proceed to judgment independent of the outcome of the principal action. Section 6982 provides that the proceedings against a garnishee shall be deemed an action, and that the garnishee defendant is a party defendant, but also provides that no trial of the garnishee action shall be had until the plaintiff shall have judgment in the principal action. Rights acquired by default of the garnishee defendant must be held in abeyance and be without force upon which to enter a judgment against the garnishee until after the judgment is entered against the principal defendant. Under our statute and under the general law, garnishment proceedings are "purely ancillary to the suit against the principal defendant, dependent upon it for their existence and validity. If for any reason the court fails to get jurisdiction of the principal suit, the garnishment must inevitably fall with it. This principle is universal. It is all the same whether the lapsing came from failure to get personal service of the summons in the principal suit upon the defendant therein in the time and manner prescribed by law, or from failure to comply with the statute directing the mode of obtaining substituted service thereof by publication or otherwise.

. . . The garnishee may raise and rely upon the objection [of want of valid judgment against the principal defendant] at any stage of the proceedings. He does not waive it by answering and going to trial. If judgment has been rendered against the defendant, but is absolutely void, of course, it cannot support the garnishment proceedings, and the garnishee should move the court that he be discharged on that grounds.

. . . On the other hand, if the court has jurisdiction of the principal suit, the garnishee can inquire no further, for no errors or irregularities therein not jurisdictional will in any manner impair the protective force of the garnishment judgment, and beyond this the garnishee has no interest." Rood, Garnishment, §§ 224-226. To the same effect, see Shinn, Attachm. & Garnishment, §§ 707-713: "No valid judgment can be entered against a garnishee until a valid judgment is first entered against the principal defendant. Therefore a judgment against the garnishee entered upon a judgment against the principal defendant which is void will be no protection to the garnishee when he is thereafter sought to be held liable on his indebtedness to the principal defendant." See also Waples, Attachm. & Garnishment, §§ 474-479: "The plaintiff's right of action, the effectiveness of the judgment, and the protection of the garnishee from subsequent attack after payment under judgment, depend upon the principal action, its rightful institution, rightful judgment thereon, and rightful execution of the judgment." And again: "The suit against the garnishee is hypothetical. The right of action depends upon the right of the plaintiff in the main suit. If the plaintiff is the creditor of the principal defendant, and has a right of action against the garnishee, he may step into the shoes of the principal defendant and so become the creditor of the garnishee. In other words, he has no right to recover of the garnishee unless he can show that he ought to be subrogated to the right of the garnishee's creditor and empowered to sue on that creditor's right. . . . He [garnishee] is held chargeable if the plaintiff should make out his main case. The decree, though literally positive and free from all contingency, is qualified by law so as to render it dependent upon the principal judgment. . . . He is sued by one not a party to the contract by which he became indebted, and is required to perform his contract obligations by violating them; at least the letter of the contract is disregarded by the law which diverts the payment." See also §§ 545, 546, and 552 of same authority. "Garnishment is in no sense a new suit, but is a special auxiliary remedy for more effectually reaching defendant's credits, and is always ancillary to the main action under which it is brought." 20 Cyc. 1146. In 20 Cyc. 1146, we find: "Where payment is made under a judgment which is void by reason of the court not having jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the parties, such payment is regarded as voluntary, and will not be available to the garnishee as a defense," citing many cases.

But respondent contends that, though such defense might have been availed of by the garnishee defendant at any time prior to judgment taken against him, he cannot after entry thereof be heard to urge want of jurisdiction, and that the entry of judgment against him gives rise to a conclusive presumption that a valid judgment has been rendered against the principal defendant in the main action, citing 20 Cyc. 1140; Holbrook v. Evansville R. Co. 114 Ga. 1, 39 S. E. 937; Heffernan v. Grymes, 2 Leigh, 512, cited in Cyc. as supporting its text announcing such to be the general rule. An investigation of these cases discloses that neither sustain the text that a garnishee defendant is concluded by the judgment rendered against him from questioning the validity of the judgment rendered against the principal defendant, if the text has reference to such a proceeding as this, where the judgment against the principal defendant is not a judgment, but is void for want of jurisdiction. The text must be taken as announcing a rule under a judgment where a jurisdiction in the principal action was had in the court rendering it. This statement at 20 Cyc. 1140B must be considered with 20 Cyc. 1074, subdvs. 2 and 3, and 20 Cyc. 1144, subdvs. 3, b, c, d. The first case above (Holbrook v. Evansville R. Co.) was a review of certiorari proceedings on a record in which jurisdiction affirmatively appeared, and an attack on the record disclosing jurisdiction in the main action was made by the garnishee to establish as a fact that service in the main action had never been had, and therefore no jurisdiction existed in the main case, and hence the garnishee judgment was void. And this question of fact of service was actually tried on the garnishee's application in the court entering the judgment, and determined in favor of the fact of service and the validity of the judgment before certiorari was instituted. The holding, then, is, in effect, simply that the garnishee under those circumstances had his day in court on the very question of fact of whether service had been had, the basis for jurisdiction, and he was concluded thereby on the facts as disclosed by the record reviewed in certiorari. There is much said in the opinion that would sustain respondent's contention in this case, and that may have caused the unqualified statement in the text in 20 Cyc. at 1140B. But the decision in the case cited turned on another point entirely. No authorities are cited or reviewed in that case, and the obiter is clearly contrary to fundamentals.

Likewise Heffernan v. Grymes, supra, is not authority for the proposition that a garnishee defendant, after judgment against him, cannot question jurisdiction of person or subject-matter in the main action. What is there said under garnishment and attachment is pure obiter, as the judgment against the garnishee defendant is in fact reversed on the merits, as was also the finding of the lower court, of liability of the absent and defaulting principal defendant to the plaintiff on the merits. However, in this connection, a later case of Central of Georgia R. Co. v. Wright, 5 Ga. App. 514, 63 S. E. 639, squarely supports respondent's contention that this garnishee is estopped by the judgment against him to question jurisdiction in the main suit against the principal defendant. But this case cites no authority. The opinion reasons in a circle, i. e., "while it is true that there must be a valid judgment against this principal debtor . . . before a valid judgment can be rendered against the garnishee, still," because a "judgment is rendered against the defendant, the court is presumed to have had before it proof of jurisdiction and proper evidence on which to render it, and the garnishee is concluded." Because a court must have jurisdiction before rendering a valid judgment, it is there conclusively presumed that it must have had it because it purported to render a judgment. And this was said in the face of a direct attack on the judgment on grounds of a want of jurisdiction, by a party who is not protected in payment, but is a volunteer therein, if he pays without the court having actually (not presumptively) had jurisdiction in the principal case. The very statement of the fallacy of such reasoning ought to be sufficient to condemn it. But let us see the possible consequences to this garnishee defendant of announcing a rule barring him, upon any mere presumption, from questioning jurisdiction of the court in the main action under this direct attack on jurisdictional grounds. Should we hold him to be so concluded, he must and does pay the judgment against him. Suppose he removes to Minnesota or some other state. The defendant there demands payment of this debt still owing to him from the garnishee, unless these garnishment proceedings protect the garnishee defendant against compulsory repayment. Payment is refused. Suit follows. The foreign court examines the record made in this case there offered by this garnishee, there a principal defendant, upon whom there rests the burden of establishing a defense of his payment of a judgment against him taken under valid garnishment proceedings, and the foreign court scans the offered record of this case, and discerns at once from the record that no jurisdiction was ever here obtained in the principal action to proceed by substituted service in rem against the fund temporarily lienied by garnishment. The sole question always open in a defense or suit upon a foreign judgment is the question of fact, Did the foreign court have jurisdiction? Needless to say, the defendant there would not be concluded by these proceedings, void because of want of jurisdiction. Jurisdiction must there appear to have been here had to protect this garnishee, a defendant there. Though by circuitous reasoning, amounting but to judicial fiat, he might be here held concluded to question jurisdiction in this suit, that fact would not avail in such an inquiry there into jurisdiction, with the consequent and inevitable result that he would be called upon by legal proceedings to pay the debt the second time. Such a condition should be avoided, and all that is necessary to obviate it is an application of the usual and elementary rules applying to jurisdiction.

The defendant can urge want of jurisdiction of person or subject-matter at any stage of proceedings, and no good reason exists why a garnishee defendant should not be permitted to do likewise. A garnishee defendant has liabilities by contract and operation of law in common with the defendant. He is held to an exercise of good faith toward his defendant, in any disclosure he may make under garnishment, and in many courts circumstances may compel him to defend in behalf of the defendant. 20 Cyc. 1143. Though on this a conflict exists. He is charged to know the record facts concerning jurisdiction in the main action, to enable him to know whether a payment under a purported judgment against himself as a garnishee is a legal payment of the debt of the defendant, or whether it is, on the contrary, a volunteer payment to a party not in privity of law by judgment with himself and the principal defendant. 20 Cyc. 1146.

On the question of the record concluding an attack for want of jurisdiction, consult Black on Judgments, §§ 275 and 276, holding the better rule to permit even collateral attack on jurisdictional grounds. We quote therefrom: "The pith of the argument extracted from them [cases like those cited by respondent, holding recitations in a record or judgment conclusive upon jurisdiction], and which is truly as applicable to one class of judgments as to the other [having reference to judgments in personam and judgments in rem], is that to say that the paper relied on is a record because it recites the defendant's appearance, and that he cannot deny the jurisdiction over him because the paper is a record, is reasoning in a vicious circle; and that unless a court has jurisdiction, it can never make a record such as to import absolute verity, and the party ought not to be estopped by any allegation in a supposed record from proving any fact which goes to establish the truth of a plea alleging want of jurisdiction." The leading case on this subject is Ferguson v. Crawford, 70 N. Y. 253, 26 Am. Rep. 589. If this is the law as to collateral attack, which question we do not decide, it certainly should be here applied, where the attack as here is direct by motion by a party to the proceedings.

On the conclusiveness of this judgment, see § 229, Rood on Garnishment: "The writer has found but few reported cases deciding the question whether the statements contained in the record of the main action are conclusive upon the garnishee. These all seem to have been rendered by courts adopting the doctrine that the record is conclusive. They hold that the garnishee cannot dispute the record of the main action. Whatever may be the law between the parties, or even between one of the parties and a stranger to the suit, the writer is of very firm conviction that this indisputable presumption should never be applied against a garnishee, who, from his position, can never raise the question directly, and whose property may be taken from him upon that judgment, or proceedings ancillary to it, without any assurance of protection from future liability in another state. It is generally admitted that the record of any judgment may be contradicted, to show want of jurisdiction, where such judgment was rendered by a court of another state, and this has often been done in garnishment proceedings. Adding to this the well-settled principle that payment of a garnishment judgment rendered by a court having no jurisdiction affords the garnishee no protection, what assurance has the garnishee that he will not again be required to pay in a suit in another state?" The validity of a garnishment "depends upon the pursuit of the steps prescribed by law for its prosecution, and no aid can be lent to it by the voluntary acts of the garnishee. Like attachment by seizure, its validity depends upon the proper performance of each and every act prescribed by the statute, and without the performance of any one of them the court is without jurisdiction, and the whole proceeding is void and will be reversed on error."

If no act of the garnishee can lend validity to the garnishment proceedings, certainly no act of his can indirectly accomplish the same purpose in the proceedings attempted in the main action, when the court is, on the face of the record, without jurisdiction. Either the judgment in the main action binds both defendant and garnishee, and this independent of any act of the garnishee, whether defaulting or otherwise, or it binds neither defendant nor garnishee, being invalid as to both. It is hard to consistently reason that the garnishee defendant may be bound by his own act in defaulting in answer, and thereby be obligated to pay plaintiff a sum as a debt belonging to the defendant, and at the same time the defendant be not bound for want of jurisdiction, which concededly he may raise at any time. To so hold is to, in effect, by legal proceedings, confiscate the property of the garnishee defendants for the benefit of a third party, and to deny to him the command of the statute (§ 6982), that the court shall only render such a judgment "as shall be just to all the parties, and properly protect their respective interests." It is only a valid judgment, entered with jurisdiction and in strict compliance with statutory requirements, that operates to "acquit and discharge him [garnishee] of all demands by the defendant." It is only such a judgment with plain record proof of jurisdiction, that a foreign jurisdiction will recognize, and the record of the domestic judgment should affirmatively disclose jurisdiction, that a garnishee compelled to pay a debt to another thereunder may exhibit the judgment record with proof of our statutes in the foreign jurisdiction, and be protected there as well as at home. He should not be forced to disgorge on some theory of estoppel against raising jurisdictional defects conceived by the domestic court, which theory the foreign court will not be obliged to respect if it follows the fundamentals governing jurisdiction. We hold the determination as to indebtedness, as well as all other proceedings had in the main action, were void for want of compliance with statute governing substituted service of summons; that all proceedings had in garnishment were merely ancillary thereto, and had for their source as to authority to enter judgment against the garnishee defendants the necessity of valid proceedings in the main action, and all fell with the failure of the qualified jurisdiction once obtaining in the main action; and that the garnishee's default in answer in nowise validated the judgment against the principal defendant, which, if void, rendered the judgment against the garnishees void, and that the garnishee is not estopped, by default in answer, to question the conclusiveness, on jurisdictional grounds, of the main judgment.

The order and judgment appealed from is ordered set aside, and all proceedings dismissed as void, for want of jurisdiction.

STATE OF OKLAHOMA.

Intoxicating liquors — taking orders for foreign dealer — liability.

Where a liquor house situated in another state has a representative in a town in Oklahoma, who receives orders for whisky, and writes letters to the house, directing that whisky be sent to persons who give such agent orders, and the whisky is sent to such persons, and the bill is sent to the agent of the house, to collect payment for the same, this in law constitutes a sale of intoxicating liquors in Oklahoma, and such agent is liable to prosecution and conviction for violating the prohibitory law of the state.

(June 14, 1913.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the County Court for Carter County, convicting him of violating the prohibitory liquor law. Affirmed.

Statement by Furman, J.:

The case was tried upon the following agreed statement of facts: "That on the 15th day of June, 1911, Ed Smith approached the defendant, Virgil Landrum, in the city of Ardmore, and requested him, Landrum, to order for him, Smith, one gallon of whisky; that he wrote a letter at Smith's request, and signed Smith's name to said letter, same being addressed to H. Brann & Company of Ft. Worth, Texas, who are lawfully licensed and engaged in the sale of intoxicating liquors at Ft. Worth, Texas; that this order was received by H. Brann & Company, who passed upon said order and accepted same, and shipped by Wells Fargo Express one gallon of whisky to said Smith, at Ardmore, Oklahoma; that a bill for this was sent to Virgil Landrum, who afterwards collected from Smith the sum of $3.75, the price of said whisky; that Landrum was not in any way interested in the whisky, but remitted the amount collected to H. Brann & Company; that H. Brann & Company alone had authority to pass upon orders received by them, and accept or reject such orders, as they saw fit; that Virgil Landrum was a collector for H. Brann & Company, and receives a commission on all money collected for them, and received his regular commission on the above money."

Messrs. Sigler & Howard for appellant.

Mr. C. J. Davenport, Assistant Attorney General, for the State.

Furman, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

If the agreed statement of facts is susceptible of a reasonable construction which would warrant the conviction of appellant, it is our duty to affirm this judgment.

It appears that Ed Smith had requested appellant to order for said Smith one gallon of whisky, but it does not appear that said Smith made any request of appellant as to the person or place from which the whisky should be ordered, or made any agreement with appellant as to how the whisky was to be sent or paid for. That thereupon appellant, of his own motion, selected H. Brann & Co. of Ft. Worth, Texas, and wrote a letter to them to which he signed Smith's name, ordering a gallon of whisky to be sent to said Smith at Ardmore. Said H. Brann & Company received the letter and shipped the whisky by Wells Fargo Express to said Smith at Ardmore; that the bill for this whisky, which amounted to $3.75, was sent by H. Brann & Company to appellant at Ardmore, and that appellant collected for the same from said Smith. It further appears that appellant was a collector for H. Brann & Company, and received a commission on all money collected by him for them.

In many respects there is a manifest difference between the case at bar and the case of Williams v. State, 5 Okla. Crim. Rep. 206, 114 Pac. 624. In Williams's Case the purchaser of the whisky requested Williams to write a letter to E. G. Stafford & Company of Sparta, Missouri, ordering the whisky in question. The record does not show that Williams was the agent of or had any connection whatever with E. G. Stafford & Company, or had ever represented them in any business transactions, or that he collected the money for the whisky ordered, or that he was even known to said E. G. Stafford & Company, or that he ever received a commission or compensation for his services. It simply presents a case of one friend writing a letter for another friend to entire strangers. Such is not the case at bar. Here appellant was the authorized agent of H. Brann & Company, and represented them in Ardmore. It was at his suggestion the order was sent to H. Brann & Company, and he wrote the letter directing H. Brann & Company to send the whisky to Smith at Ardmore, and he received a commission upon the sale made. The fact that appellant was in no way interested in the whisky in no manner militates in his favor. He was prosecuted and convicted, not for having an interest in the whisky, but for participating in the sale of the whisky. If he did this, although he received no compensation therefor, he would still be guilty. But the agreed statement of facts show that he did receive a commission on this sale. He therefore not only participated in the sale, but was financially interested therein. The fact that H. Brann & Company alone had authority to pass upon orders received by them, and to accept or reject such orders as they saw fit, does not in any manner excuse appellant. In the regular course of business this right exists in all cases where drummers are authorized to take orders which they send to the houses they represent. In all such cases the house has the option to accept or reject the order, as it sees fit. Far from helping appellant, the statement which we are now discussing 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) clearly points to his guilt, for it is an admission that he was receiving orders for whisky in Oklahoma as agent of H. Brann & Company.

The trial court was authorized to find from the agreed statement of facts that this entire transaction was a cunningly devised subterfuge, deliberately planned for the purpose of defeating the law. This case is but an illustration of the fact that men who are engaged in the illegal sale of intoxicating liquors in Oklahoma will resort to any expedient or subterfuge for the purpose of carrying on their illegal business. If this judgment is reversed, every liquor house in the United States could establish an agent in every town in Oklahoma, to whom persons could apply, and get such agent to write letters, and sign the name of the purchaser, and forward them to his house, which, seeing the letter written in the handwriting of their agent, would take it as an indorsement of the solvency of the purchaser, and would, upon receipt of such letter, ship whisky to entire strangers of whom they knew nothing. If this can be done, the prohibitory law of Oklahoma will become the laughing stock of all intelligent persons, and this court would be open to the most severe censure for its misconstruction of the law. It is our duty in good faith to so construe the laws of Oklahoma as to enable them to be enforced with reasonable certainty.

Under all the circumstances appellant is clearly guilty of the crime charged.

The judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND, & PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

CHARLEY EVANS, by Next Friend.

(— Okla. —, 138 Pac. 804.)

Carrier — entering car to transact business — trespasser

1. A person who enters a passenger train at a station, without ticket or money to pay

2. A railroad company is liable for injury wilfully and wantonly inflicted upon a trespasser or licensee on one of its passenger trains.

Same — excessive force.

3. If, in ejecting a trespasser or licensee from one of its passenger trains, the servants and employees of the company use more force than is reasonably necessary, or if, after he is ejected, they wantonly and wilfully injure him, the company is liable for such injury.

(February 10, 1914.)

ERROR to the District Court for Seminole County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries caused by alleged forcible and wrongful ejection from defendant's train. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. C. O. Blake, H. B. Low, R. J. Roberts, W. H. Moore, and Willmott & Dean, for plaintiff in error:

The obligation to a passenger is not to eject him from the train with unnecessary force. To a licensee, a carrier owes a higher degree of duty than to a trespasser.

The servants of the carrier, in ejecting a person guilty of unlawful conduct and endangering the safety and peace of the passengers of the carrier, may use force to overcome resistance which might, under some circumstances, be held to be unnecessary force, and which was made necessary by the resistance of the plaintiff himself.

Messrs. B. B. Blakeney, G. C. Crump, A. M. Fowler, and J. L. Skinner, for defendant in error:

While railroad companies are authorized to remove trespassers from their trains, such removal must be made with reasonable and ordinary care; and, if unnecessary force is used, or if it is done in a wilful and wanton manner, in such a way as to imperil the trespasser's life or limb, the railroad company is liable in damages to such person.

Galbraith, C., filed the following opinion:

This was an action instituted by Charley Evans, a minor, by his father and next friend, for damages for personal injuries on account of an alleged forcible and wrongful ejection from one of the defendant's passenger trains between Holdenville and Wewoka, Oklahoma. Issue was properly joined, and there was a trial to the court and jury, and a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff against the defendant for $1,945, from which an appeal was properly perfected to this court by petition in error and case-made.

Error is assigned in overruling the motion for a new trial and in rendering judgment for the plaintiff. It is urged by the plaintiff in error that the trial court erred in its instructions to the jury, and in refusing to give a requested instruction, and that the judgment is excessive.

It appears from the evidence that the plaintiff, who was a young man, nineteen years of age, boarded one of the plaintiff's passenger trains at Holdenville for the purpose of collecting a debt from one Mike Ryan, a passenger on said train, and that after he boarded the train he engaged in a controversy with Mike Ryan, and the train pulled out of Holdenville and continued on its journey toward Shawnee, and, when some 3 or 4 miles from Holdenville, the plaintiff, still engaged in his controversy with Mike Ryan, became boisterous and was creating a disturbance with the passengers on the train, and, the conductor's attention being then called to the disturbance, he went back to the part of the train where the plaintiff and Ryan were and attempted to quiet the plaintiff. The auditor then asked plaintiff for his ticket. The plaintiff said he had no ticket, wasn't going anywhere," and had no money to pay his fare, and the conductor, then failing to quiet him, gave the signal and stopped the train, and called the brakeman and a railroad detective, by the name of Burnett, to assist him, and proceeded to eject plaintiff from the train. The plaintiff put up a vigorous fight, but was finally ejected, and when he was jerked from the steps of the car to the ground he was then at the top of an embankment or fill, variously estimated by the witnesses from 10 to 20 feet deep. A witness for the plaintiff testified that Burnett then grabbed the feet of the plaintiff and whirled him down the embankment. The brakeman testified for the defendant that Burnett pushed the plaintiff and that caused him to roll down the embankment. At any rate, he rolled down to the bottom of the fill. The train was then started, and a physician who was aboard the train suggested to the conductor that, for the protection of the company and plaintiff, he ought not to be left in that place, and suggested that the train be backed up and he be placed in the baggage car and taken to the next station, which was Wewoka, and turned over to the authorities. The train was then stopped and backed up, and the plaintiff was helped up, or got up, and without assistance walked and got into the baggage car, and rode there until the train arrived at Wewoka, where he was turned over to the county physician. All this occurred on May 25, 1909. The evidence shows that on August 2d following the plaintiff was adjudged insane by the insanity board of Pittsburg county, where his father resided, and where he was taken after this incident, and sent to the insane asylum at Norman, where he was still confined at the date of the trial, February 1, 1911. It was contended on behalf of the plaintiff that the force and violence used in ejecting him from the train and after he was ejected was the proximate cause of his subsequent insanity.

It is clear from the testimony that the plaintiff was not a passenger on the defendant's train, and that he did not intend to become a passenger when he entered the train. He neither purchased a ticket before entering nor provided himself with money to pay his fare from the station where he entered to the next station. The railroad company, therefore, did not owe him that high degree of care it owes a passenger on one of its trains. Its servants had a right to eject him in a proper manner and at a proper place for failure to pay his fare, or to produce a ticket, and on account of the boisterous conduct and annoyance he caused to the passengers on the train. Rev. Laws, 1910, § 813.

In instruction No. 2, complained of by the plaintiff in error, the court told the jury that the servants of the defendant had a right to eject the plaintiff from the train or to remove him from the passenger car to some other part of the train, but in so doing they were bound to use only such force as was reasonably necessary under the circumstances to remove and eject him.

In the third instruction of the court to the jury, also complained of by the plaintiff in error, the court told the jury, in effect, that the plaintiff was not a passenger on the train, and he could not recover for such ejection without unnecessary force.

It is said by Commissioner Sharp in Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Stone, 34 Okla. 368, 125 Pac. 1122: "Railroad companies are bound to exercise their dangerous business with due care to avoid injury to others; and when they fail to do so they are liable for damages, even to a trespasser, who has not been guilty of contributory negligence. White, Personal Injuries on Railroads, § 1075. A reckless disregard of consequences may be so great as to imply a willingness to inflict an injury, such as to entitle a trespasser to recover, although there is no actual intent to harm him. Id. § 1078. On the contrary, it is the general rule that the railroad company is not liable to a trespasser on its property, in the absence of any wantonness and wilfulness or gross negligence. Under settled rules of public policy, railway companies are not to be made liable for injuries received by trespassers upon their trains, unless the injury is inflicted under circumstances indicating wantonness or wilfulness in the servants of the companies. The rule seems to be almost universally recognized and approved, and is in consonance with reason and right." See cases cited.

It does not seem to be material in this case whether the plaintiff was a trespasser or a licensee; so long as he was not a passenger, the company's duty to him would not be any different, since it would be liable for injury wantonly and wilfully inflicted upon either trespasser or licensee.

The instruction requested by the plaintiff in error and refused by the court was as follows: "If you feel and believe from the evidence in this case that the plaintiff was a trespasser upon the passenger train of the defendant, then the defendant, through its employees and servants, was only bound to the duty of not wilfully and intentionally injuring the plaintiff." While this instruction requested by the plaintiff in error was possibly a correct statement of the rule of law as to the duty a carrier owes a trespasser on one of its trains, still, if the court in its instructions covered this duty in different language and in different form, it was not prejudicial error to deny the requested instruction. Finch v. Brown, 27 Okla. 217, 111 Pac. 391, and cases cited.

The court told the jury in instruction No. 3 that the plaintiff was not a passenger on defendant's train, and that the defendant's servants had a right to eject him without unnecessary force, and that he was not entitled to recover for such ejection; and in instruction No. 2 told the jury that the servants of the plaintiff in error had a right to remove the plaintiff from the train, or from the passenger car to some other part of the train, but that in so doing they were bound to use only such force as was reasonably necessary under the circumstances. The jury doubtless understood from these instructions that the company was not authorized to use wanton or wilful violence toward the defendant, even though he were a trespasser, and that the company was only liable for injury resulting from wanton and wilful violence used in ejecting the plaintiff from the train.

The instructions of the court to the jury seem to reasonably cover the law of the case and the respective rights and duties of the parties under the circumstances, and we cannot hold that the refusal to give the requested instruction was prejudicial.

A careful reading of the entire record convinces us that the railroad employees did not use wanton and wilful force in ejecting the plaintiff from the train; that he put up a vigorous fight; and that they only used the necessary force to overcome his resistance, but that, after he was ejected and on the ground by the side of the car, the defendant's servant, Burnett, caught him by his feet and turned him a somersault, causing him to roll down the embankment. The jury may have found that this act of Burnett was wanton, wilful, and unnecessary violence, and if they so found, under the law, the company would be liable for any injuries that may have resulted to the plaintiff. Moore v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 26 Okla. 682, 110 Pac. 1059; Folley v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 16 Okla. 32, 84 Pac. 1090; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Radford, 36 Okla. 657, 129 Pac. 834; St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Lee, 37 Okla. 549, 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) 357, 132 Pac. 1072.

It is also urged that the judgment is excessive. While the evidence fails to show that the plaintiff suffered any great bodily injury, still we cannot put our judgment as to the amount he was entitled to recover against that of the jury. He suffered some injury. The trial court in instruction No. 4 gave the jury the proper rule for measuring his injury and for estimating the reasonable damage resulting therefrom. The jury may have found that the plaintiff's insanity was due to heredity, or that the proximate cause thereof was the wanton and wilful act of Burnett in tumbling him down the embankment after his ejection from the train.

No sufficient reason appears for disturbing the finding of the jury. We therefore recommend that the judgment appealed from be affirmed.

Per Curiam:

OREGON SUPREME COURT.

N. B. SORENSON, Respt.,

v.

CHARLES A. SMITH, Appt.

(65 Or. 78, 129 Pac. 757.)

Broker — right to employ assistant.

1. A real estate agent employed by a non-resident to sell land located in the state of the agent's residence, who assumes authority to grant options on the property, has no power to employ an assistant at the expense of his principal.

Principal and agent — claim of authority — binding principal.

2. The claim of a real estate agent to be acting under his general authority from his principal in employing an assistant does not show that he undertook to bind the principal to compensate the assistant for services.

Evidence — ruling out question after answer is given — effect.

3. Ruling out a question after the witness has answered it does not, without more, eliminate the answer from evidence.

Broker — option contract — right to commission.

4. The securing by a customer introduced by a real estate broker of an option upon the property for a specified time makes time of the essence of the contract, so that the agent's commission is not earned if the sale is not consummated within the time specified.

Statutes of fraud — acceptance of service — liability for compensation.

5. The acceptance by a property owner of the benefit of services rendered by one employed by a broker to assist in disposing of the property does not ratify the contract of employment so as to render him liable to make compensation for the services where the statute provides that an agreement employing an agent to sell real estate shall be void unless in writing.

On Petition for Rehearing.

Trial — failure to object to evidence — effect on determination of law questions.

6. That no objection was made to the admission of evidence tending to establish a cause of action by a subagent employed by a broker to assist in securing a purchaser of real estate, against the property owner for compensation for his services, does not prevent the court from determining that the contract sued on was within the statute of frauds, and incapable of ratification except by writing executed for that purpose, and that there could be no recovery because of absence of ratification.

Same — motion for nonsuit and directed verdict — rule for determining sufficiency of evidence.

7. The same rule for determining the sufficiency of the testimony to support a judgment in favor of plaintiff is applicable to a motion for nonsuit and one for directed verdict in defendant's favor.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Multnomah County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover a broker's commission for services alleged to have been performed by plaintiff's husband in the sale of real property. Reversed.

Statement by Moore, J.:

This is an action by Mrs. N. V. Sorenson against C. A. Smith to recover $15,000 as broker's commission for services alleged to have been performed by her husband and assignor, George Sorenson, in procuring purchasers who entered into a valid contract with the defendant, whereby they stipulated to pay him $300,000 for his interest in real property in Douglas county, Oregon. The cause, being at issue, was tried, resulting in a judgment for plaintiff as demanded in the complaint, and the defendant appeals.

Messrs. Giltner & Sewall, A. H. Tanner, and Edwin H. Flick, for appellant: Where there is but one construction to be placed upon the testimony by reasonable minds, and that construction is against plaintiff's case, the court should grant a nonsuit.

Moore J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is maintained that errors were committed in denying a motion for a judgment of nonsuit when the plaintiff had introduced her evidence and rested, and in refusing to direct a verdict for the defendant when the cause was finally submitted. There has been brought up a transcript of the entire testimony, which will be examined with reference to the application for an instructed verdict, since that request necessarily supersedes the motion for a judgment of nonsuit. The facts are that the defendant was the owner and holder of certificates issued by the Northern Pacific Railroad Company for 7,480 acres of timber land in township 27 south, of range 2 west, of the Willamette meridian. Smith, who, it appears, resided in Minnesota, employed F. A. Kribs, a real estate broker of Portland, Oregon, to negotiate a sale of his estate in the premises, which interest will be designated herein as lands. Kribs informed George Sorenson, who was engaged in the same business in that city, that these lands were for sale, and gave him a map on which the real property was represented. The plaintiff's assignor thereupon procured J. O. Storey, who, on September 28, 1906, was granted by Kribs an oral option of sixty days within which to purchase the premises at $25 an acre, on account of which he was to have paid $50,000 before the expiration of that limit, and the remainder at stated intervals. The time thus specified was allowed in order to permit an inspection of the quantity and quality of the timber growing on the real property so as to determine its value. After a partial examination, Storey was reasonably satisfied that the lands were worth the sum demanded; but, being unable to secure a complete cruise of several subdivisions of the tract within the time limited, he obtained from Kribs an extension for that purpose until December 15, 1906. In the meantime, Storey had engaged to sell the lands for $250,000 to other persons, in whose interest he on December 9, 1906, offered to pay Kribs $10,000 as evidence of good faith, but the proposal was declined. At the expiration of the time ultimately limited, but before a complete inspection of the timber could be made by Storey, and without his offering to pay the $50,000 required, Kribs, at the defendant's direction, withdrew the lands from sale, and so notified Sorenson and Storey. The latter on July 7, 1907, commenced an action against Kribs in the circuit court of the state of Oregon for Multnomah county to recover $63,000 as damages for an alleged breach of the agreement to sell and convey the land, and the further sum of $2,027 as expenses incurred in cruising the timber.

A written contract was prepared at Minneapolis July 23, 1909, whereby the defendant, in consideration of $300,000 to be paid as specified, stipulated to sell and assign all his interest in the real property to C. P. Bratnobar of that city, and the Storey-Bracher Lumber Company, an Oregon corporation, of which J. O. Storey and G. Bracher were respectively the president and secretary. This contract, referring to the purchasers and to the defendant, contained a clause as follows: "The vendees agree to save the vendor harmless from any claim or demand on him by anyone save and excepting Frederick A. Kribs of Portland, Oregon, for commissions in the sale of the certificates hereinbefore mentioned, and also agree to save the said Frederick A. Kribs harmless from any claim or demand made by anyone on him for commissions on account of the sale of said certificates." This contract was executed by the several parties to it at Albany, Oregon, September 2, 1909. Thereafter Sorenson assigned his claim for a commission of 5 per cent of the stipulated purchase price to the plaintiff, who instituted this action, which eventuated as hereinafter narrated.

George Sorenson testified, in substance, that after December 15, 1906, pursuant to Kribs' promise to pay him a commission of 5 per cent of the purchase price of the land, if a profitable sale thereof could be made, he continued to negotiate with Storey until July, 1909, when Kribs said to him, "If you can get Storey to give $300,000 I can put the sale through," declaring, however, that Smith should be personally consulted about the matter. This information was communicated to Storey, who immediately went to Minneapolis, where the terms of the contract were settled. Sorenson admitted he never conversed with the defendant until after the sale was consummated; nor did he have any writing authorizing him to procure a purchaser of the lands, or promising to pay him a commission in case of a sale. This testimony was corroborated in many particulars by that of F. A. Kribs, who was asked, in reference to Sorenson's efforts, originally to procure Storey as a purchaser, "You acted upon your general authority from Mr. Smith to sell the land?" He replied, "Yes, sir." After this answer was given, defendant's counsel said, "Now, if the court please, I object to that question." A ruling was then made as follows: "The objection is sustained." In obedience to a subpoena duces tecum, Kribs produced and identified copies of letters which he had written to the defendant, and also telegrams which the latter had sent to him. 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

These writings, having been received in evidence, show that, before the final bargain for the sale of the land was concluded, Smith knew that Sorenson claimed a commission for the services which he had performed.

J. O. Storey, referring to the visit at Minneapolis to confer with the defendant in July, 1909, testified as follows: "We had agreed on the negotiations for this land, and Mr. Sorenson, who was working with me at that time to get this land in our hands in some shape so we could jointly sell it again, telegraphed me and asked me what shape I had it, and replying I wired: 'Have Smith deal cinched. What can you get? Answer.'" Referring to that message, he said: "What I meant by that was, How much money can you get for the land?" This witness further said that the Storey-Bracher Lumber Company paid no money for the lands, and had no interest therein, except the right to sell the premises; that Mr. Bratnobar agreed to buy the property and allow us to sell it; but that neither Sorenson nor himself was able to find a purchaser at the price demanded. Storey received a letter written December 9, 1906, by Sorenson, wherein the writer, referring to Kribs and to the original option to purchase the lands, said: "He wanted to divide the commission with me and leave you out of the deal. I told him you was in on the deal, and that you was to get an equal division."

The foregoing is deemed to be a sufficient statement of all the material evidence involved in a consideration of the question whether or not, under the original option to sell the property, or by subsequent ratification, Smith became liable to Sorenson for the payment of a commission. It will be remembered that the defendant, a non-resident of Oregon, appointed F. A. Kribs, a real estate broker of this state, to sell lands therein. If Kribs had been a non-resident of Oregon, and Smith had known that he did not expect to come into the state, it might reasonably have been concluded that the selection of the agent, under such circumstances, carried with it, by necessary implication, the right to delegate his authority to a subagent. The modification of the general rule in this respect is founded on the assumption that, since the person originally appointed to negotiate a sale of land cannot, by reason of his nonresidence, be expected to visit and inspect the real property, he must of necessity select in his stead someone who can identify the premises to a prospective purchaser. Eastland v. Maney, 36 Tex. Civ. App. 147, 81 S. W. 574. This principle, however, can have no application to the case at bar, since Kribs resided in the state where the land is situated.

It is also to be kept in mind that Kribs originally allowed an option of sixty days, and further extended the time in which the timber might be inspected. The privilege thus granted implies a bestowal of power, the exercise of which evidences a personal trust and confidence that, in the absence of express authority, negatives a right to appoint a subagent, for a performance of whose services the principal would be liable. Story, Agency, §§ 12, 13; 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 972. From a careful examination of the entire evidence, it is believed that Sorenson was only a subagent, and that no privity existed between him and the defendant. This conclusion seems to be confirmed by Sorenson's letter to Storey, wherein he stated that Kribs wanted to divide with the writer the commission, and to exclude Storey from any participation therein. The statement in the letter that Sorenson had told Kribs that Storey "was in on the deal" and "was to get an equal division" reasonably implies that Kribs, Storey, and Sorenson were ratably to share the expected commission. The letter referred to unmistakably shows that, for the services originally performed by Sorenson, he must have believed a part of the compensation to be paid Kribs would be shared with him, and that he was only a subagent of the latter.

This deduction, in our opinion, is not defeated by Krib's reply to the inquiry, whereby he stated that, in giving Sorenson a plat of the lands and requesting him to procure a purchaser, he acted upon his general authority from the defendant. An objection was made to this answer after it was given; but no motion was made to strike it out. When a witness responds to a question before an attorney has had time to object to the inquiry, the proper practice is to move to strike out the answer, unless the court, in sustaining the objection, also directs the jury not to consider the reply given. The testimony referred to was not properly eliminated; but, in our opinion the answer was a legal conclusion, and not the statement of a material fact. In any event, the reply to the inquiry does not show that Kribs undertook to bind his principal, nor does it negative the conclusion that he employed Sorenson as a subagent, with whom Smith sustained no relation as a contracting party. Mechem, Agency, § 197; Barnard v. Coffin, 141 Mass. 37, 55 Am. Rep. 443, 6 N. E. 364.

The original offer to sell the land having been definitely limited, Storey's acceptance of the proposal made the period of time so stipulated of the essence of the agreement. Watson v. Brooks, 11 Or. 271, 3 Pac. 679; 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Hardy v. Sheedy, 58 Or. 195, 113 Pac. 1133. Where the employment of a broker is thus precisely fixed, his agency terminates with the end of the time specified. Zeimer v. Antisell, 75 Cal. 509, 17 Pac. 642; La Force v. Washington University, 106 Mo. App. 517, 81 S. W. 209.

Whatever the rule may be with respect to annulling a real estate broker's contract, it will be kept in mind that Sorenson testified that he was directed by Kribs to continue his efforts to consummate a sale of the premises after the original option was declared canceled. Any services, however, that were performed pursuant to the latter order, must be construed as acts done by a subagent at the command of an agent, and for the payment of which the principal would not be liable.

This conclusion leaves for consideration the question of Smith's acceptance of the purchase price that was partly paid, and his consummation of a valid bargain for the sale of the land, with full knowledge of the benefit which he probably derived from Sorenson's endeavor to procure a purchaser. When a principal, with entire comprehension of a usurpation of authority by a person who pretends to act for him in dealing with his property, accepts the advantages which might accrue, he thereby ratifies the unwarranted conduct and renders himself liable for all the burdens that may result. Hahn v. Guardian Assur. Co. 23 Or. 576, 37 Am. St. Rep. 709, 32 Pac. 683; Connell v. McLoughlin, 28 Or. 230, 42 Pac. 218; Rumble v. Cummings, 52 Or. 203, 95 Pac. 1111. Any unauthorized act by an agent for his principal that tends to impair the public health or to corrupt the public morals is void ab initio, and for that reason it is incapable of ratification, since any attempted approval of the transaction would necessarily be contaminated with the original illegality, thereby making the principal in pari delicto with the agent. Clark & S. Agency, § 115. In the same section of the work referred to, it is said: "If, however, the act or contract was one merely voidable in its nature, it may be subsequently ratified by the principal, although unauthorized." Another text-writer, in discussing this subject, observes: "An act, to be capable of ratification, must be voidable or defeasible only, and not void. That an act which could not have been authorized in the first instance cannot be ratified seems clear, and upon this point the adjudications are in full accord." Reinhard, Agency, § 98.

It is sometimes said that any unjustifiable conduct of one person in disposing of, or procuring property for, or prejudicial or beneficial to the rights of, another, which act could have been previously authorized by the latter, may subsequently be ratified by him. This observation is not universally applicable, for where a statute declares a particular act to be void, and its performance without authority is denounced as a misdemeanor in the enactment, which also prescribes a penalty upon conviction for a violation thereof, the word "void," as thus used is occasionally held to mean what its technical sense would imply, and not voidable, thereby rendering the unauthorized act incapable of ratification. 8 Words & Phrases, 7332. Thus, under a statute making it a misdemeanor on the part of a broker to earn a commission for the sale of real property without written authority, it was held that, in the absence of a writing of that kind, no action could be maintained. Adler v. Schaumberger (Sup.) 84 N. Y. Supp. 235; Charles v. Arthur (Sup.) 84 N. Y. Supp. 284; Kronenberger v. Quinn (Sup.) 86 N. Y. Supp. 139. It has also been ruled that, without such written authority, no recovery could be had on a quantum meruit. Blair v. Austin, 71 Neb. 401, 98 N. W. 1040; Rodenbrock v. Gress, 74 Neb. 409, 104 N. W. 768; Barney v. Lasbury, 76 Neb. 701, 107 N. W. 989; Whiteley v. Terry, 39 Misc. 93, 78 N. Y. Supp. 911.

Under a section of a statute of frauds declaring that "no broker or real estate agent selling or exchanging land for or on account of the owner shall be entitled to any commission for the same, or exchange any real estate, unless the authority for selling or exchanging such land is in writing, signed by the owner or his authorized agent, and the rate of commission on the dollar shall have been stated in such authority," it was determined that, in the absence of a previous written contract, a subsequent written promise to pay the commission was without consideration and void. Leimbach v. Regner, 70 N. J. L. 608, 57 Atl. 138; Stout v. Humphrey, 69 N. J. L. 436, 55 Atl. 281; Bagnole v. Madden, 76 N. J. L. 255, 69 Atl. 967. A different conclusion was reached in the case of Muir v. Kane, 55 Wash. 131, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 519, 104 Pac. 153, 19 Ann. Cas. 1180, where, in construing a statute providing that any agreement authorizing a broker to sell or purchase real property for a commission should be void unless the contract or some note or memorandum thereof was in writing, it was decided that the performance of the services under an oral agreement, void under the statute of frauds, raised a moral obligation which was a sufficient consideration to support a subsequent written promise to pay the stipulated compensation. When an enactment expressly declares that an agreement for the payment of a commission for securing a purchaser of land is void unless it is in writing and signed by the owner of the real property, the rule is well established that, in the absence of a written contract, a full performance of the services by the broker does not take the case out of the statute of frauds. Myres v. Surryhne, 67 Cal. 657, 8 Pac. 523; Shanklin v. Hall, 100 Cal. 26, 34 Pac. 636; McGeary v. Satchwell, 129 Cal. 389, 62 Pac. 58; Dolan v. O'Toole, 129 Cal. 488, 62 Pac. 92; *Beahler v. Our statute of frauds, providing that, "in the following cases the agreement is void unless the same or some note or memorandum thereof, expressing the consideration, be in writing and subscribed by the party to be charged, or his lawfully authorized agent; evidence, therefore, of the agreement shall not be received other than the writing, or secondary evidence of its contents in the cases prescribed by law"—was amended February 9, 1909, by adding the following: "An agreement entered into subsequent to the taking effect of this act, authorizing or employing an agent or broker to sell or purchase real estate for compensation or a commission." L. O. L. § 808. This supplemental clause went into effect after the original option referred to herein was given, but before the final bargain for the sale of the land was concluded.

A text-writer, in discussing the phraseology of the common designation of a very celebrated English statute, enacted in 1677 (29 Car. II. chap. 3), and which has been adopted in a more or less modified form in nearly all states of the Union, says: "It may be said that an oral contract within the statute of frauds is not illegal or void, but is only voidable or nonenforceable. Such contracts have been likened to nuda pacta. The lack of a writing is merely matter of evidence." Reed, Stat. Fr. § 678; 20 Cyc. 284. Such an enactment simply annexes the necessity of a writing to the common-law requirement that a contract must be based upon an adequate consideration. 20 Cyc. 281. While there is an irreconcilable conflict in the decisions with respect to the proper methods of ratifying the act of an agent whose authority should originally have been in writing, it is believed that reason supports the rule that the approval by the principal of such act cannot be predicated upon the mere acceptance of the benefits of a bargain concluded for him; but, when the act is not declared by the statute to be a misdemeanor, the ratification must be evidenced by a writing, which mode of proving the act is made by the statute indispensable. Reed, Stat. Fr. § 382, and notes. An exception to this requirement exists in cases where possession of real property has been taken by a purchaser, who has made permanent and valuable improvements upon land pursuant to an oral contract to sell and convey the premises. This departure from the general precept is founded upon the principal that, unless specific performance was decreed in a suit instituted for that purpose, the purchaser could not be adequately compensated in an action at law to recover the damages sustained. Another reason is that, in suits to enforce the specific performance of an oral contract to convey land, the possession and betterment of which by a stranger to the title, when such occupancy and improvement are clearly traceable to the contract relied upon, afford indisputable evidence of the actual or constructive assent of the owner, thereby establishing the purchaser's right, and sufficient in law to take the case out of the statute of frauds. Brown v. Lord, 7 Or. 302; Wagonblast v. Whitney, 12 Or. 83, 6 Pac. 399.

The purpose sought to be accomplished by the enactment of the English statute mentioned was to prevent the practice of frauds which were supposed to be perpetrated, and to preclude a resort to perjuries which were believed to have been committed, when oral contracts respecting certain matters could be enforced upon evidence existing only in the recollection of witnesses. It is thought that the primary object that induced the enactment of our statute, hereinbefore quoted, demands that, where the original contract respecting the broker's compensation was not in writing, as required, the ratification can only be by a writing. The plaintiff's assignor never having been employed by Smith, nor the services rendered by Sorenson ratified in the manner indicated, it follows that error was committed in refusing to direct a verdict for the defendant.

The judgment should therefore be reversed, and the action dismissed, and it is so ordered.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, Moore, J., on April 29, 1913, handed down the following response (65 Or. 91, 131 Pac. 1022):

It is maintained in a petition for rehearing that, since no exception was taken to the introduction of any testimony tending to establish the plaintiff's cause of action, errors were committed by this court in determining that the contract sued upon was within the statute of frauds and incapable of ratification by the defendant, except by the execution of some writing adopted for that purpose, and in concluding that the motion for a directed verdict in Smith's favor should have been allowed.

It was said in the former opinion that the request for a directed verdict, made after all the evidence had been reviewed, superseded the denial of a motion for a judgment of nonsuit interposed when the plaintiff introduced her testimony and rested in chief. Based on this deduction the petition states generally that it must be supposed that the court assumed a difference between the two motions, and refused to apply to the request for a directed verdict the rules of law governing motions for a judgment of nonsuit. The latter motion probably called attention to the particular defect in the evidence whereby it was asserted that a cause of action had not been established sufficient to be submitted to the jury. The motion for the nonsuit having been denied, the deficiency in the evidence, to which notice had been attacked, would be remedied if possible by the introduction of testimony on the particular subject.

A motion for a judgment of nonsuit and a motion for a directed verdict in the defendant's favor are tantamount to demurrers to the evidence, and the same rule for determining the sufficiency of the testimony is alike applicable to each. A motion for a directed verdict for the defendant, however, is generally less hazardous to the plaintiff's rights than is a motion for a judgment of nonsuit.

In the former opinion the testimony admitted without exception was deemed competent, and it was also considered that the statute of frauds, as far as it related to Sorenson's employer, was waived by not objecting to the admission of testimony tending to show that the contract sued upon was not evidenced by any writing. From an original examination of the entire transcript of the evidence it was not thought, nor from a re-examination thereof is it now believed, that the testimony so received without objection or exception, together with all the inferences and presumptions reasonably deducible therefrom, was sufficient to establish a cause of action to be submitted to the jury; because George Sorenson, the plaintiff's assignor, was employed by, and was the subagent of, F. A. Kriba, that no privity of contract existed between such substituted agent and the defendant, Charles A. Smith, and the latter, never having stipulated in writing to pay a commission to the subagent, did not, by negotiating the sale of the lands to C. P. Bratnobar and the Storey-Bracher Lumber Company, ratify Krib's employment of Sorenson.

We are compelled to adhere to the former opinion, and the petition for a rehearing is denied.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

ARTHUR KING

v.

TENNESSEE CENTRAL RAILROAD COMPANY.

(— Tenn. —, 164 S. W. 1181.)

Railroads — signals — statutory duty upon backing into station.

1. The statutes governing the duty of railroad companies to keep lookouts ahead and to give signals and stop trains upon the appearance of a person on the track do not apply in case of the backing of a train into

Note. — To what places and operations does statute or ordinance requiring lookout on trains apply.

As to the duty to maintain lookout on railroad train, generally, see note to Smith v. Norfolk & S. R. Co. 25 L.R.A. 287.

Operations in railroad yards and depot grounds.

A statute requiring some person upon the locomotive always upon the lookout ahead does not apply to railway employees about the yards and depots of the railroad. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Robertson, 9 Heisk. 276. There is no occasion in this case to extend the rule further than employees, and the court limits itself to that situation. This case is cited and followed in Haley v. Mobile & O. R. Co. 7 Baxt. 239.

The general question, however, as to what persons the railroad is liable to under statutes requiring lookouts, is not within the scope of this note.

In Southern R. Co. v. Pugh, 95 Tenn. 419, 32 S. W. 311, an action for injuries by detached cars making a running switch in railroad yards, it is held that the above statute does not apply "when the employees of a railway company are engaged in the distribution of detached cars, in the making up of trains, and in other necessary switching in and upon its yards, depot grounds, and side tracks."

And the same statute is held not to apply to an engine running backwards in a depot yard in the process of pumping water from the tender into the engine. Cox v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 2 Leg. Rep. 168, 1 Shannon, Cas. 475.

So, the Federal circuit court of appeals, in a case involving the above statute, holds that it does not apply to the operation of backing in order to reunite the two sections of a train which has broken in two a station which it has run past a short distance before coming to a stop.

Carrier — overshooting station — negligence of passenger in following train.

2. One desiring to take a train at a flag station at night is negligent in attempting to walk down the track to board it when it passes the station before stopping, and is slowly backing to the regular stopping place, which will preclude his holding the carrier liable for injury due to collision with the train in the dark.

CERTIORARI by both parties to the Court of Civil Appeals to review a judgment reversing a judgment of the Circuit Court for Wilson County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries for which defendant was alleged to be responsible. Plaintiff's petition denied. Defendant's petition granted.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

upon a side track in the depot grounds. Although the train had merely been waiting for another train to pass it, and had broken in two upon starting to leave the side track, the court bases its decision upon the ground that the Tennessee statute does not apply when a "train is being made up in the depot grounds, as this one was." Payne v. Illinois C. R. Co. 83 C. C. A. 589, 155 Fed. 73.

But this statute is held to apply to a fully organized train backing out of a passing track, where it has been waiting for another train to pass, although it has been switching on adjacent tracks in order to let out or take in some cars immediately before going into the passing track. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Davis, 88 C. C. A. 414, 161 Fed. 334.

As to the applicability of this statute to a passenger train which has overshot the station, and is backing to the proper position for taking up passengers, see KING v. TENNESSEE C. R. Co.

And this statute is held applicable to a through train upon the main track, not engaged in switching, although it is passing through the railroad yards or station grounds. Mobile & O. R. Co. v. House, 96 Tenn. 552, 35 S. W. 561.

And in some jurisdictions it is held that a statute making it the "duty of all persons running trains upon any railroad to keep constant lookout" applies to trains in a railroad yard. Little Rock & H. S. W. R. Co. v. McQueeney, 78 Ark. 22, 92 S. W. 1120; Kansas City Southern R. Co. v. Morris, 80 Ark. 528, 98 S. W. 363, 10 Ann. Cas. 618; St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Graham, 83 Ark. 61, 119 Am. St. Rep. 112, 102 S. W. 700. In the first of these cases, the court says: "To sustain this contention [against applicability of statute] it will be necessary to hold that the tracks in the yards do not constitute a part of the railroad. . . . The act was obviously in-

An ordinance providing that no train shall be run backward without a watchman on the rear thereof applies to the private switch yard of a railroad. Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. v. Peterson, 156 Ind. 364, 59 N. E. 1044.

And Bennett v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 3 Ont. Rep. 446, contains dictum to the effect that a statute requiring a lookout on the last car of a train moving reversely applies to the station grounds of the company.

Operations in private railroad yards of manufacturer.

An ordinance providing for a lookout is inapplicable to the operation of trains within an inclosed, private railroad yard used by a manufacturer of railroad cars in moving cars erected at the plant. Western Steel Car & Foundry Co. v. Nowalaniak, 135 Ill. App. 137. The court said: "The track where appellee was injured was not a railway track within the meaning of the ordinance, although it was of the same width and construction as ordinary railways, and a locomotive was operated upon it for the purpose stated. It was wholly within appellant's private yard or inclosure. It was not a common or public highway. It did not cross or run upon a public highway. It was not used for transportation of freight or passengers for the public. It was used exclusively by appellant, in the processes of manufacture."

Operations at public crossings.

"It is made by statute the duty of a railroad company to keep a lookout; and especially is this duty incumbent upon it at 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) and was there prosecuted to judgment in favor of King for the sum of $2,500 and costs. It was then taken to the court of civil appeals by the railroad company. That court reversed and remanded the cause for a new trial; and, based on that judgment, two petitions for certiorari have been filed in this court,—one by King, insisting that the judgment of the trial court should have been affirmed; and one by the railroad company, insisting that both the trial court and the court of civil appeals were in error in not holding that it was entitled to a directed verdict, which was seasonably requested by it at the close of the evidence in chief offered by King, and again at the close of all evidence in the trial of the case in the circuit court.

The cause of action is predicated on personal injuries sustained by King as the result of a collision with a passenger coach; to wit, loss of an arm and other less serious injuries. The declaration was in two public crossings." Louisiana & A. R. Co. v. Ratcliffe, 88 Ark. 524, 115 S. W. 396.

And in Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Hardy, 131 Ga. 238, 62 S. E. 71, it is held inferentially that the Tennessee statute requiring a lookout ahead upon a locomotive applies to a switch engine upon a public crossing, not in the railroad yards.

See also Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. McNeil, 34 Ind. App. 310, 69 N. E. 471, on former appeal in 66 N. E. 777, under "Running backwards," infra.

Running backwards.

The Tennessee statute mentioned in the following cases is to the effect that "every railroad company shall keep the engineer, fireman, or some other person upon the locomotive always on the lookout ahead, and when any person, animal, or other obstruction, appears upon the road, the alarm whistle shall be sounded, the brakes put down, and every possible means employed to stop the train and prevent an accident."

That this statute cannot be complied with when an engine is pushing cars before it does not make the statute inapplicable, but, on the contrary, renders such operation an infraction of the statute, for which the liability is absolute. Little Rock & M. R. Co. v. Wilson, 90 Tenn. 271, 13 L.R.A. 364, 25 Am. St. Rep. 693, 16 S. W. 613. As to the reason for this rule, the court says: "The lookout must be kept ahead on the locomotive, and the locomotive must, of course, be kept there for him to be upon or he cannot be upon it and kept in the place required. The keeping of the locomotive there, therefore, is one of the parts of the observance, like all others, absolutely essential to constitute the whole observance."

And it is held in Iron Mountain R. Co. v. Dies, 98 Tenn. 655, 41 S. W. 860, 3 Am.

counts,—the first averring a breach by the company of its common-law duty; the second averring a failure on its part to observe the statutory precautions as the proximate cause of the injuries. To this declaration the company pleaded not guilty.

By the evidence of King, and otherwise, it appears that, at the time he was injured, he was living with Mr. Smith, who resided about 1 mile from Eagansville, a flag station on the line of the railroad company, and in company with Henry Wood, colored (King being also colored), he went to Eagansville to take passage on the passenger train bound for Lebanon, where he expected to attend a supper; that he had often prior to that time taken passage on that train at Eagansville, his habit being to go to Lebanon from that station every two weeks; that he knew how to get on the train, which way was by flagging the train by means of lighting a piece of paper, which was done on the night he was injured, the flagging being done on that night by Henry Wood, who stood in the middle of the track and lighted the paper; that on the former occasions the train had always stopped at the station, but on the night he was injured it ran beyond the station about 100 yards and stopped. He saw it when it stopped, knew it had stopped, and, instead of waiting where he was until the train came back, he concluded that it was waiting for him, and that he would go up and board it where it stood; and so he and his companion, Henry Wood, left the station and walked up the track toward the train without notice to those in charge of the train; and the latter, expecting to find those intending passengers who had flagged the train at the flag station, began to back the train to that point, and while so backing the rear car of the train collided with King, knocked him down, cut off his arm, and otherwise injured him. No comprehensible reason is given either by King or his companion, Wood, for their failure to observe the backing train as it moved slowly back at the rate of 3 or 4 miles an hour to the flag station. It was after dark; the back door of the rear car was open; there were lights in the car. King and his companion do not deny these facts, and yet they say they did not see the rear car as it backed down the track toward them; and King says that the first knowledge he had of its movement toward him was when it struck him. He testifies that after his injuries, and manifestly while the car was still in motion, he crawled out from under it, and laid beside the track while the train passed on, and while it stopped at the flag station; and while, after it stopped at the flag station, it again started on its way to Lebanon, during all this time he was lying close to the rails, where he had received his injury.

King testifies that the point where he was struck by the train was "mighty nigh

Neg. Rep. 273, that the same statute renders a railroad company absolutely liable for injuries by an engine which has been detached from an incoming train and is being returned to the roundhouse over tracks not within the railroad yards, with the tender preceding the engine. The court, in discussing the decision in the preceding case, says: "It is further held, and such is the inevitable logic of the other propositions, that when the train is being run backwards or by means of an engine placed elsewhere than in front, the liability of the company for injuries inflicted is absolute, because the statutory precautions can only be complied with when a train is moving forward by means of an engine in front." The court agrees with this holding in the following language: "To hold a doctrine different from this would be virtually to annul the provisions and requirements of the statute."

Knoxville, C. G. & L. R. Co. v. Acuff, 92 Tenn. 26, 20 S. W. 348, cites the Wilson Case and follows it, holding that the statute applies to a train operated with the cars preceding the engine.

But it is held, in Southern R. Co. v. Simpson, 65 C. C. A. 563, 131 Fed. 705, that, under the same statute, it is immaterial that the engine is running backwards, provided the view of the lookout is not obstructed and every precaution required by the terms of 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

the statute is observed. This is on the theory that the statute does not specifically provide against running backwards, and that the actual terms of the statute may sometimes be as well complied with when running backwards as forwards. The court attempts to reconcile its holding with those of the Wilson and Dies Cases on the grounds that in each of those cases the position of the engine obstructed the view and prevented compliance with the statute. In so doing the court seems to overlook the specific language of the opinions of those cases as set out above.

And in Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Davis, 88 C. C. A. 414, 161 Fed. 334, supra, the railroad, in accordance with the preceding case, is held liable, not merely because the train was moving backward, but because of the inability to keep the required lookout on account of a long train of intervening cars.

But, in Towles v. Southern R. Co. 103 Fed. 405, where an engine was pushing cars ahead of it into the company's yard from a switch built to serve an industrial plant, it was held that the statute did not apply, since, under the existing conditions, compliance was impossible. The court said that "whenever the company is compelled by the conditions to run train or cuts of cars backwards without an engine in front, as the statute contemplates, the statute never ap-100 yards" from the flag station. He admits that he made no outcry to attract the attention of employees in charge of the train when he received his injury, while the train passed on its way to the flag station, and during its stop at the flag station, or during the time the train passed him after it stopped at the flag station on its way to Lebanon. His companion, Henry Wood, also admits that he in no way made his presence known to the train crew during the time the train was making the movements aforesaid. He testifies that, when the train struck King, he (Wood) sprang from the track, and thus escaped injury; and after the train had gone on its way to Lebanon, he found his injured companion, and with him went back to the farm of Mr. Smith about one mile from the flag station, where King had been living, and where during the same night King received surgical attention.

The failure of King and Wood to make known to the employees in charge of the train the injuries which King had received is entirely unexplained upon this record. The explanation which King offers is that he was in misery. No such explanation can be offered for Wood, and so far as King is concerned, it is an explanation which does not explain. Their apparent concealment of their presence, and of the injury which King had sustained, at a time when he was manifestly in desperate need of immediate surgical attention, brings seriously into question the truth of their entire evidence in the cause.

The flagman on the train testifies in substance that he was on the rear end of the rear car as the train was backed toward the flag station with a white light in his hand, and that, as the train backed, the air whistle on the rear end was blown at short intervals from the time the train started backing until it reached the station; that during all this time he was looking ahead to see if anyone was on the track and saw no one; that he could see some 10 or 12 feet down the track by means of the reflection from the light in his hand and of the light from the rear coach; that there were lights on the rear of the train, which showed red from the rear and green from the front; that the inside of the coach was lighted; that the rear door of the rear coach was glass above the handle; that the train, upon backing up, reached the flag station, it stopped, and that he was still on the rear platform; that nobody got on at the flag station, and the train pulled out therefrom.

His evidence is corroborated on most of these points by other employees in charge of the train, but the evidence of these witnesses was contradicted by evidence introduced on behalf of King; but it is undisputed in the record that the train was backing very slowly toward the station, the rate plies, no matter how remote from a switching yard the exigency may arise."

Ordinary care as well as the spirit of an ordinance providing for lookouts on top of the cars farthest from the engine while backing within the city limits demand that, when a train is backing at midnight into a chute where a man cannot with safety ride on the foremost car, a man precede the train on foot. Peperkorn v. St. Louis Transfer R. Co. 171 Mo. App. 709, 154 S. W. 836.

And an ordinance requiring a lookout at the rear of trains running backwards applies where a train has been cut in two at a crossing, and one section of it is backing over the crossing, to be connected with the other section. Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. McNeil, 34 Ind. App. 310, 69 N. E. 471, on former appeal agreeing upon this point in 66 N. E. 777.

A statute providing for the stationing of a brakeman on the last car of a train running reversely requires the stationing of a brakeman on cars being connected with a train and forced backward by the concussion made in coupling. Helson v. Morrissey, F. & M. R. Co. 1 D. L. R. 33, 19 West. L. Rep. 835, 17 B. C. 65. This is upon the theory that the newly connected cars become immediately a part of the train.

The general question as to what constitutes a train within the meaning of such 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

statutes is not within the scope of this note.

For other cases of backing trains, see supra, under "Operations in railroad yards and depot grounds," Bennett v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 3 Ont. Rep. 446; Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. v. Peterson, 156 Ind. 364, 59 N. E. 1044; Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Davis, 88 C. C. A. 414, 161 Fed. 334; Payne v. Illinois C. R. Co. 83 C. C. A. 589, 153 Fed. 73; Cox v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 2 Leg. Rep. 168, 1 Shannon, Cas. 475.

Miscellaneous operations.

An ordinance requiring lookouts within the city limits does not apply to a desolate, uninhabited part of the city where there are no crossings. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. State, 62 Md. 479, 50 Am. Rep. 233.

Nor does a statute requiring a lookout on the rear car of every freight train apply to work trains. Bacon v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 194 Mass. 489, 80 N. E. 458.

The Tennessee statute requiring "the engineer, fireman, or some other person upon the locomotive" to be constantly upon the lookout "ahead" has no application to cars which become detached from the rear of a motive shall be sounded at the distance of behind. Patton v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. 89 Tenn. 370, 12 L.R.A. 184, 15 S. W. 919.

of speed being not more than 3 or 4 miles an hour. King says "it was eased along."

The first point for decision under these facts is whether the rights of the parties to this suit should be determined under §§ 1166-1168, of the Code of 1858, now appearing as §§ 1574*-1576, Shannon's Code, or whether such rights are to be determined according to the principles of the common law.

We think the statutes above mentioned do not apply in the present case.

In Patton v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. 89 Tenn. 372, 12 L.R.A. 184, 15 S. W. 919, where the person injured was walking upon the track, and was overtaken by a train of freight cars, and stepped aside until the train passed, when he returned to the track and resumed his journey in the rear of the train which had passed him, and was overtaken and killed by some freight cars which had belonged to the train which had just passed him, but had become detached therefrom, and were following down-grade at the time of the injury, this court, speaking through Judge Lurton, held that the statutes above mentioned did not apply, saying: "The case provided for by the statute is that of a train pulled by a locomotive, and the precautions are those required to be observed by those servants upon the engine, and have regard to obstacles on the track in front of or ahead of the engine," etc.

In East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Rush, 15 Lea, 150, construing these statutes, it was pointed out by Judge Cooper, speaking for this court, that, in view of the stringent terms of the statutes and the manifest object of the legislature, the court had not extended their provisions to every case which might be embraced in their general language; and it was there said that the statutes were intended for the benefit of the general public, and not for the servants of the company whose negligence caused or contributed to cause the accident. Cases illustrative of the exceptions to the operation of the statutes are cited in the opinion, and it is there noted that the statutes do not apply for the benefit of a stranger when the company is making up a switching train within its yards; the case of Cox v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 2 Leg. Rep. 168, 1 Shannon, Cas. 475, being cited to sustain the point.

The case of Southern R. Co. v. Pugh, 95 Tenn. 421, 32 S. W. 311, is very much in point. There the plaintiff relied in his declaration upon an averment that he was struck and seriously injured by certain detached cars of the defendant while he was walking between the side track and depot platform at Charleston, and that the collision and injury resulted from the making of a running switch, by which the cars were driven by the depot at an excessive rate of speed, having no one on the lookout ahead. This court, in disposing of that case, held that the statutory precautions did not apply in cases where employees of a railroad company were engaged in the distribution of cars in the 'making up' of trains, and in other necessary switching in and upon its yards, depot grounds, and side tracks;" the reason given for the ruling being that "it is not possible, in such cases, to have the engine always in front of the moving portions of the train, yet the doing of the things indicated is absolutely indispensable to the efficient operation of railroads."

We think the present case falls clearly within the principle announced in the case last above referred to. In that case, as above shown, the injury occurred to one not an employee of the company, but who was at the time of receiving the injury at one of the depot places of the company. In the present case, the movement of the train by which King was injured was, within the meaning of our cases, a movement

*§ 1574, which has been 1166 and 1298 in former Codes, and which declares the duty of the railroad company, is as follows:

Accidents on railroads, precautions to prevent.—In order to prevent accidents upon railroads, the following precautions shall be observed:

(1) The overseers of every public road crossed by a railroad shall place at each crossing a sign marked, "Lookout for the cars when you hear the whistle or bell;" and the county court shall appropriate money to defray the expenses of said signs; and no engine driver shall be compelled to blow the whistle or ring the bell at any crossing, unless it is so designated. (1855-56, chap. 94, § 6.)

(2) On approaching every crossing so distinguished, the whistle or bell of the locomotive shall be sounded at the distance of 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

one fourth of a mile from the crossing, and at short intervals till the train has passed the crossing. (Id. § 6.)

(3) On approaching a city or town, the bell or whistle shall be sounded when the train is at the distance of 1 mile, and at short intervals till it reaches its depot or station; and on leaving a town or city, the bell or whistle shall be sounded when the train starts, and at intervals till it has left the corporate limits. (Id. § 5.)

(4) Every railroad company shall keep the engineer, fireman, or some other person upon the locomotive, always upon the lookout ahead; and when any person, animal, or other obstruction appears upon the road, the alarm whistle shall be sounded, the brakes put down, and every possible means employed to stop the train and prevent an accident. (Id. § 8, 1857-58, chap. 44, § 3.)

of the train at one of the depots of the company. The station at which the injury occurred was, to be sure, a flag station; but this fact can make no difference in the application of the principle. To that station King had gone for the purpose of taking passage upon the train which injured him. To his signal given at that station the engineer of the train had responded by stopping the train. It is an undisputed fact in the record that the failure to stop in the first instance immediately at the flag station was due entirely to the fault of complainant and his companion, who gave the signal to the engineer when the train was only 150 feet from the station, and after receiving the signal the train was stopped as soon as practicable. It is also clear that, in obedience to this signal which the engineer had received, the train at the time of the injury was backing to receive as passengers King and his companion, who had given the signal.

King had no legal right to suppose that the company would accept him as a passenger at a point 150 yards beyond the platform, where he says the train stopped in obedience to his signal; nor had he the right to act upon this supposition, in the absence of an express invitation of the company so to do. It was the right of the company to select the place where it would receive King as a passenger.

The movement of the train backward from the point where it first stopped was, within the meaning of Southern R. Co. v. Pugh, supra, a switching in and upon its depot grounds, and in the execution of that movement, and in the injury which King suffered, the common law, and not the statutes, measures the rights of the parties. It is clear that the legislature, in the passage of the statutes, never intended them to apply to a case like this. In proper cases for their application the statutes are wise and beneficent, but to apply them here would work a gross and manifest miscarriage of justice.

Turning now to a consideration of the rights of the parties under the principles of the common law, we hold that under the facts of this record the gross negligence of King was the proximate cause of the injuries which he received. Had he remained at the flag station, as it was right and his duty to do, his signal would have been obeyed and he would have been able to board the train without injury. We have already observed that he had no right to suppose or act upon the supposition that the company would receive him as a passenger at the point where the train first stopped.

His act in abandoning a place of safety, walking down to meet an approaching train, without heed or care apparently of the consequences, can only be characterized as one of gross negligence, and clearly the proximate cause of his injuries.

It results that the company was entitled to the peremptory instruction which it requested at the trial of this cause, and therefore the petition for certiorari filed by King is denied. The petition of the company is granted, the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals is reversed, and the suit dismissed at King's cost.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT. (Department No. 1.)

CATHERINE D. STIRTAN et al., Appts.,
v.

A. J. BLETHEN, Resp't.

(— Wash. —, 139 Pac. 618.)

Contract — to institute recall election — validity.

1. A contract employing an agent to institute and carry out a movement for a recall election against certain officers, without disclosing the true motives and real parties behind the movement, and undertaking to pay necessary expenses therefor, is contrary to public policy and void.

Same — illegal contract — right to reimbursement for expenses.

2. An agent who expends money to institute and carry out a recall election, under promise of his principal to defray the expenses, cannot, upon the contract being declared invalid, hold the principal liable to reimburse him for his outlay on the theory that when an agreement has been fully executed, the one profiting by it will not be permitted to defeat an action by the other party for money had and received upon the ground of illegality.

Same — reliance on illegal contract — effect.

3. A plaintiff who, to make out a case, must rely on an illegal contract, cannot recover, although the other party has received a benefit from his act.

filed to enforce a contract for the institution and carrying out of a movement for a recall election against certain municipal officers. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Parker & Brown, for appellants:

The defendant, by his solemn promise, caused the said $1,500 to be paid to his own use, and the plaintiffs to be thereby deprived of that amount of money; and by reason thereof the law charges the defendant with a solemn and binding obligation, which he cannot shake off or evade, and which can be discharged only by making restitution to the plaintiffs.

Ellis, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought to recover expenses incurred by the plaintiff Catherine D. Stirtan at the instance of the defendant in promoting a recall movement against certain officials of the city of Seattle. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained. The plaintiffs electing not to amend, the action was dismissed. They appeal.

The complaint alleges the adoption by the city of Seattle of a charter prescribing the procedure for effecting the removal of elective officers; that, among other things, it provides that a petition signed by voters equal in number to at least 25 per cent of the entire vote at the last preceding election, for all candidates for the office, the incumbent of which is sought to be removed, demanding an election of a successor to such person, shall be filed with the city clerk. It is then alleged: "That on or about the 20th day of June, 1911, the said defendant, under and by virtue of said charter provision, was desirous of recalling, and having successors elected to, certain officers in said city of Seattle, to wit: George W. Dilling, mayor of said city of Seattle, Max Wardall, J. Y. C. Kellogg, E. F. Blaine, and F. Steiner, councilmen of said city of Seattle, and employed the said plaintiff, Catherine D. Stirtan, by an oral contract, as his agent and representative, to institute and carry out a movement to recall said officers of said city, and then and there, to wit, on or about the day last aforesaid, ordered and directed the said Catherine D. Stirtan to lay out and expend certain money necesary to promote and carry it to a successful termination, the said recall movement, to wit, to hire an office for the transaction of certain business incident to said movement, to pay the necessary office expenses, to hire canvassers to circulate petitions for the recall of said officers among the voters of the city of Seattle, and solicit signatures of such petitions, to hold public meetings, and to do all that might and would be necessary to promote and advance said recall movement, but without disclosing the name of her principal, the said A. J. Blethen, but at all times to exercise great care and caution to keep his name secret, and in no event to disclose his connection with the said movement, and then and there undertook, and solemnly promised the said plaintiff Catherine D. Stirtan that he, the said A. J. Blethen, would pay and be responsible for all such expenses and disbursements, and that he would promptly and fully and without delay pay the same from time to time as the same accrued, arose, or were incurred by the said Catherine D. Stirtan for the purposes aforesaid." This is followed by allegations that Catherine D. Stirtan, pursuant to this contract, hired an office, held public meetings, hired canvassers, and secured sufficient names to petitions to procure a recall election in the case of each of the officers named; that on June 1, 1912, defendant caused to be filed a number of the names with the city clerk, withholding others, and subsequently withdrew the petitions and abandoned the movement; that defendant paid the expenses as they accrued without objection, down to a short time prior to the discontinuance of the movement; that a short time before such discontinuance, the defendant ceased paying the expenses, and there accumulated salaries of canvassers and other necessary expenses in the amount of $1,500; that this fact was reported to the defendant, who directed Mrs. Stirtan to pay the same, and promised to reimburse her within a short time; that she paid these expenses in the sum of $1,500, by reason whereof the defendant became and is liable to the plaintiffs in that sum.

Two questions are presented by this appeal: (1) Was the contract in question contrary to public policy? (2) Assuming that it was, can the plaintiffs recover from the defendant money expended in the prosecution of the enterprise?

1. The appellant insists that the contract pleaded violated no sound canon of public policy. It is argued, in substance, that a recall election is not contrary to public policy; that it is a means by which society may protect itself against undesirable public servants; that to hire an office, hold public meetings, circulate petitions among the voters, and solicit signatures is within the express or implied authority conferred by the law relating to recall elections; that these things are incidental to popular government; that it therefore follows that any means by which the public may recall undesirable officers is wholesome and for the public good. Stripped to its essentials, the naked thought which underlies the argument is just this: That because a recall is not contrary to public policy, a contract secretly to finance a movement to create a factitious sentiment in favor of recall, without divulging the true motives or the real personality behind the movement, is to be commended as in furtherance of the public good, rather than condemned as against public policy. It seems to us that a policy which would justify such a contract, even on a plea of a good motive, would open wide the door to secret contracts of the same character in furtherance of the most sinister and corrupt purposes, since the true motive on either side would be difficult to prove, and, if corrupt, would hardly be announced from the housetops. The insidious tendency of the agreement is made manifest by the very fact that public knowledge of its existence would tend largely to defeat its purpose. The very secrecy enjoined by the contract should be held a conclusive badge of corrupt motive. The recall, as an instrument of popular government, is of recent application in this country, and we are cited to no decisions passing upon the validity of such a contract as that here involved. An analogy, however, is found in contracts to influence elections and contracts to influence legislation. The purpose and genesis of the recall make this analogy plain. It cannot be questioned that the recall and its usual concomitant, the referendum, are wholesome means to the preservation of responsible popular government. They embody a principle as old as the English Constitution. The frequent appeals of the English ministry from a vote of Parliament to a vote of the people on a given measure, requiring the members of Parliament to stand for re-election upon that measure as an issue, the continuance or resignation of the ministry being dependent upon the result, is obviously but a recall as to the personnel of the government and a referendum as to the given measure. It is patent, therefore, that every secret compact looking to the advancement of private personal ends by the financing of a recall is just as inimical to a sound public policy as it existed at the common law as would be the same course of conduct when applied to an election itself, or as would be a contract to influence legislation by a secretly paid lobby. That contracts to influence elections or appointments to public office are void as contrary to public policy is sustained by ample authority. In Keating v. Hyde, 23 Mo. App. 555, a contract intended to influence a primary, though not falling within the express prohibition of any statute, was held void because contrary to public policy. The court said: "There is a clear distinction between the purchase of services to be devoted only to an advertising of the fact that one is, or desires to be, a candidate, and the purchase of service to be employed in advocating his peculiar merits and eligibility, so as to influence the choice of the voter." See also Whitman v. Ewin, — Tenn. —, 39 S. W. 742; Nichols v. Mudgett, 32 Vt. 546. There can be no sound distinction between a contract intended to influence the election of an official and a contract intended to influence the recall of an official after he is elected. The employment of hired canvassers to bring about either result has an inevitable tendency to corrupt the electorate.

Contracts to influence legislation have been almost universally condemned. In Sussman v. Porter (C. C.) 137 Fed. 161, the plaintiff declared upon a contract whereby his assignor had undertaken to obtain from municipal authorities a franchise for a trolley line and the consent of property owners thereto, and pay the necessary expenses in connection therewith. The court held the contract void as contravening public policy, and denied a recovery. After citing many authorities sustaining its judgment, the court said: "Cases to the above effect might be cited indefinitely, and very many are cited in the cases already referred to. It is clearly deducible from them that a contract to procure or influence legislation is bad, whatever the intention of the parties may have been, and whether the influences actually exerted thereunder were honest or corrupt. It is the temptation to corruption and dishonesty which the courts will not tolerate. It will be noticed, too, that some of the cases cited lay great stress upon the fact that a contingent fee is dependent upon the success of the service. The rule of law in all these and similar cases is that the court will not aid either party to the contract, but each will be left in the position in which he has placed himself. Judicial aid will not be given to either party to a corrupt agreement. This is not because the court desires to favor either party, but because the agreement is corrupt 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) and tainted." See also Sweeney v. McLeod, 15 Or. 330, 15 Pac. 275; Marshall v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 16 How. 314, 14 L. ed. 953; Crichfield v. Bermudez Asphalt Paving Co. 174 Ill. 466, 42 L.R.A. 347, 51 N. E. 552; Richardson v. Scott's Bluff County, 59 Neb. 400, 48 L.R.A. 294, 80 Am. St. Rep. 682, 81 N. W. 309, Hazleton v. Sheckells, 202 U. S. 71, 50 L. ed. 939, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 567, 6 Ann. Cas. 217.

Here, again, there can be no sound distinction between a secret contract to influence legislation and a secret contract to influence the removal of the noncompliant legislators. The tendency of both is to corrupt the public service. The recall was intended to place in the hands of the people an orderly means of combating just such secret and sinister influences, not to cloak a new avenue for their exercise. To hold valid a secret contract to foment a recall through hired canvassers would be to place in the hands of powerful private interests, with unlimited means, a weapon for secret intimidation and covert attack against executive and legislative officers sufficient to deter upright and self-respecting men from accepting the public trust. The legislature of this state, in 1913, doubtless moved by these considerations, has declared just such practices as those contemplated by the contract here in question gross misdemeanors. Laws of Washington 1913, chap. 146, § 16. This legislation merely declares criminal those practices which the common law has always recognized as contrary to public policy. While the parties to this contract and their hired canvassers are not subject to punishment as for a crime, by reason of the lateness of the act, the contract itself is none the less subject to the ban of the common law. We hold this contract contrary to public policy, void, and unenforceable.

2. The appellants claim that, though the contract was contrary to public policy, the agent should be permitted to recover the money which she advanced in its prosecution. They rely upon the familiar rule that where the agreement has been fully executed, the agent or partner who has received the proceeds or profits of an illegal business or transaction will not be permitted to defend against an action of the principal or other partner for money had and received, upon the ground of such illegality. In such a case, the right of recovery is referable to an independent implied contract of deposit. McDonald v. Lund, 13 Wash. 412, 43 Pac. 348; De Leon v. Trevino, 49 Tex. 88, 30 Am. Rep. 101; Pfeuffer v. Maltby, 54 Tex. 454, 38 Am. Rep. 631; Planters' Bank v. Union Bank,

There is, however, another rule equally familiar, the complement of that just stated. It is this: Where a plaintiff, to make a case, must rely upon the illegal contract itself, he cannot recover. The law will aid neither party to an illegal agreement, but will leave the parties where it finds them. Reed v. Johnson, 27 Wash. 42, 57 L.R.A. 404, 67 Pac. 381; Hoffman v. McMullen, 45 L.R.A. 410, 28 C. C. A. 178, 48 U. S. App. 596, 83 Fed. 372; Smith v. David B. Crockett Co. 85 Conn. 282, 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1148, 82 Atl. 569; Samuels v. Oliver, 130 Ill. 73, 22 N. E. 499; Gibbs v. Consolidated Gas Co. 130 U. S. 396, 32 L. ed. 979, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 553.

Typical of the authorities cited by the appellants in this connection is the decision of this court in McDonald v. Lund, 13 Wash. 412, 43 Pac. 348. In that case, both of the rules above stated are recognized, and the principles upon which they rest are clearly announced. There, the plaintiff and defendant had been partners in certain gambling games, each contributing one half of the money invested. When they had ceased operations, it was understood and agreed between the parties that the plaintiff was entitled to certain moneys, the proceeds of the games, in the defendant's hands, but which he refused to pay to the plaintiff. The court permitted a recovery on the ground that the plaintiff was not compelled to rely upon the illegal contract of partnership, but was entitled to recover upon the admission that the defendant held money belonging to the plaintiff, which raised an implied contract to pay it. The court said: "Again, this is not a case to enforce any illegal contract, but it is to assert title to money which was accumulated under such illegal contract. If the plaintiff here had brought an action against the defendant for not complying with his contract in running these games, of course it would fall within the rule claimed by the respondent, but here the real contract on which he sues, it seems to us, is a contract of deposit. Under the stipulated facts the illegal transaction which these parties had agreed to pursue had ended. The partnership for that purpose was no longer in existence. The business was no longer being carried on. A determination of the amount of money due from the defendant to the plaintiff had been reached. It was agreed that the defendant owed the plaintiff the sum of money sued for, and that he was entitled to that amount, and the plaintiff's portion was simply left with the defendant on deposit. . . . This distinction, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) viz., the difference between suing on, or trying to enforce, the illegal contract itself, and a suit to recover money which is admitted to be due, although it may have been obtained by prosecuting an illegal enterprise,—has always been respected by the courts from its announcement in the cases we have above cited up to the present time. . . . In the case at bar it is conceded by the statement of facts that the defendant has in hand a thing of value that belongs to plaintiff. It certainly does not belong to defendant, and he has no right, either moral or legal, to keep it. If the question were between the plaintiff and the parties from whom this money was obtained, of course another principle would intervene, but to allow a depository of a person's money to refuse to turn it over to him because the owner of the money had violated some law in obtaining it would be little short of encouraging robbery."

The distinction between suits in which reliance must be placed upon the original illegal contract and a suit for money had and received on an independent implied contract runs through all of the decisions.

In Reed v. Johnson, 27 Wash. 42, 57 L.R.A. 404, 67 Pac. 381, the plaintiff sued to enforce specific performance of a contract held violative of public policy. The court denied relief on the ground that, the contract being contrary to public policy, the court would refuse either party its aid, quoting from the supreme court of Georgia in Howell v. Fountain, 3 Ga. 176, 46 Am. Dec. 415, as follows: "The law leaves the parties to such a contract where it found them. If either has sustained a loss by the bad faith of a particeps criminis, it is but a just infliction for premeditated and deeply-practised fraud, which, when detected, deprives him of anticipated profits, or subjects him to unexpected losses. He must not expect that a judicial tribunal will degrade itself by an exertion of its powers, by shifting the loss from one to the other, or to equalize the benefits or burdens which may have resulted by the violation of every principle of morals and of laws."

In Hoffman v. McMullen, 45 L.R.A. 410, 28 C. C. A. 178, 48 U. S. App. 596, 83 Fed. 372, the plaintiff and the defendant had entered into a contract to stifle competition in bidding for public work, the agreement being that if either should get the contract, the profits and losses should be divided equally between them. The defendant secured the contract. The plaintiff sued for a division of the net profits. The court held that he could not recover because he could not make a case without reliance upon the illegal agreement, using the following language: "The distinction between the cases where a recovery can be had and the cases where a recovery cannot be had of money connected with illegal transactions, to be gleaned from all the authorities, is substantially this: That wherever the party seeking to recover is obliged to make out his case by showing the illegal contract or transaction, or through the medium of the illegal contract or transaction, or when it appears that he was privy to the original illegal contract or transaction, then he is not entitled to recover any advance made by him in connection with that contract, or money due him as profits derived from the contract; but that when the advances have been made upon a new contract, remotely connected with the original illegal contract or transaction, and the title or right of the party to recover is not dependent upon that contract, and his case may be proved without reference to it, then he is entitled to recover." In Smith v. David B. Crockett Co. 85 Conn. 282, 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1148, 82 Atl. 569, it was held that a contract providing that an employer would reimburse a salesman for money paid as bonuses or bribes to purchasing agents to secure contracts of sale was illegal and opposed to public policy, and that the salesman could not recover from his employer any sums paid out by him for such purpose. In Samuels v. Oliver, 130 Ill. 73, 22 N. E. 499, the supreme court of Illinois held that an agent who knowingly aids his principal in effecting an unlawful combination cannot recover from his principal advances made for such illegal purposes.

Applying these principles to the case before us, it is plain that the plaintiffs cannot recover. The money which Mrs. Stirtan advanced was for the purpose of hiring canvassers to circulate recall petitions. This purpose, as we have seen, was contrary to public policy. The money she advanced was for an illegal purpose, under the admitted facts. The contract between Mrs. Stirtan and the respondent has never passed beyond the executory stage. The appellants allege that Mrs. Stirtan has fully performed her part of the contract, namely, the undertaking to organize the recall movement and secure the necessary signatures, but they also allege that the respondent has not performed his part, namely, the undertaking to pay the necessary expenses of the recall movement. The appellants, in their effort to recover the money which Mrs. Stirtan has paid out in furtherance of the illegal agreement, were compelled to plead, and did plead, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) as ground of their action, the original agreement between Mrs. Stirtan and the respondent. Without that agreement, there would be no consideration whatever, illegal or otherwise, for a promise on the respondent's part to repay the money so advanced. Without pleading the original agreement, the payment by Mrs. Stirtan to the canvassers would conclusively appear to be a payment of her own debt, a discharge of her own undertaking to her own employees. Manifestly, in order to connect the respondent with the transaction in any manner, she was compelled to plead the original illegal agreement between herself and the respondent.

The case is clearly distinguished from McDonald v. Lund, supra, upon which the appellants mainly rely. The money sought to be recovered here was not fruits of the illegal venture, nor profits of a closed illegal transaction. It was money expended in furtherance of the illegal contract itself. The situation of Mrs. Stirtan is precisely the same as that of the plaintiff in the case of Smith v. David B. Crockett Co. supra. She was the agent of the respondent under the contract pleaded. She claims that she, as such agent, advanced money which the respondent had agreed to pay in his undertaking to finance the recall. As said in that case: "It is contrary to public policy. It is illegal, and the time spent and the expense incurred by the plaintiff in so accomplishing or attempting to so accomplish sales were as much a part of the illegal transaction as was the actual payment of the bonus itself. If such was the real character of this provision, the plaintiff could neither recover for services rendered, nor for expenses incurred, nor for bonuses paid in making the sales." As said in Samuels v. Oliver, supra: "To say, in such a case, that the agent employed to aid his principal in an illegal enterprise cannot recover of his principal for services or money advanced in execution of the illegal purpose, or under his employment, is a correct statement of the law; but the like rule is equally applicable to the principal as to the agent. . . . When the employment of an agent relates to the performance of an immoral or illegal act, it is said by Wharton in his work on Agency, § 25, neither party can make the contract the basis of a suit against the other. Advances for illegal purposes fall within the same rule, and cannot be recovered by the principal of the agent, or the agent of the principal. Id. § 319."

The contract here involved being contrary to public policy, none of its provisions will be enforced in favor of either party. We must leave the parties where we find them.

The judgment is affirmed.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

H. A. REASNOR, Plff. in Err.,
v.

WATTS, RITTER, & COMPANY.

(— W. Va. —, 80 S. E. 839.)

Master and servant — contract of employment — duration.

1. An employment upon a monthly or annual salary, if no definite period is otherwise stated or proved for its continuance, is presumed to be a hiring at will, which either

Headnotes by LYNCH, J.

Note. — Duration of contract of hiring which specifies no term, but fixes compensation at a certain amount per day, week, month, or year.

This note is a continuation of one on the same subject appended to Warden v. Hinds, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 529.

The recent cases do not show such a conflict as appears in the former note. The tendency is apparently toward the rule that a hiring at so much per year, month, or week is, in absence of other circumstances controlling its duration, an indefinite hiring only, terminable at the will of either party.

Thus, it is held in Watson v. Gugino, 204 N. Y. 535, 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1090, 98 N. E. 19, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 215, reversing 140 App. Div. 33, 124 N. Y. Supp. 321, that a contract specifying a weekly salary, without stipulating a definite period of service, is a hiring at will, and that the master may discharge the servant at any time.

So, where an employee's salary is calculated on a semi-monthly basis, the hiring is at will, and he may be discharged at any time. Gibney v. National Jewelers' Bd. of Trade, 144 N. Y. Supp. 321.

And "a hiring at the rate of so much per year, no time being specified, is an indefinite hiring; and such a hiring is a hiring at will, and may be terminated at any time by either party." Feiber v. Home Silk Mills, 143 N. Y. Supp. 1014.

It is likewise held in Alger v. New York Post Graduate Medical School & Hospital, 140 N. Y. Supp. 394, that a stipulation as to a monthly payment, in the absence of the fixing of a definite period of service, constitutes only a hiring at will.

The acceptance of a proposition for employment at a specified rate per year does not constitute an employment for a year, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

party may at any time determine at his pleasure without liability for breach of contract.

Evidence — burden of proof — duration of hiring.

2. The burden of proving that such hiring was obligatory for a year rests on the party who seeks to establish that the contract covered that period.

Master and servant — termination of relation.

3. Unless the understanding was mutual that the service was to extend for a certain fixed and definite period, it is an indefinite hiring, and is determinable at the will of either party.

but merely at will. Cuppy v. Stollwerck Bros. 158 App. Div. 628, 143 N. Y. Supp. 967.

Where the testimony of an employee is that "I told him (the employer) that the least I would go for was $1,500 a year," such evidence can be construed only to establish an employment at will at the specified rate. Chadwick v. Morris, 170 Ill. App. 569.

A hiring at a thousand dollars per year, without specifying the term of the employment, is a hiring at will, and may be terminated by either party at any time. Brookfield v. Drury College, 139 Mo. App. 339, 123 S. W. 86.

"That wages are payable at a stipulated period raises the presumption that the hiring is for such period," by the terms of a Georgia statute.

Under this statute it was held in Webb v. McCranie, 12 Ga. App. 269, 77 S. E. 175, that the fact that wages are payable weekly raises the presumption that the contract of hiring is by the week.

And in Phillips Lumber Co. v. Smith, 7 Ga. App. 222, 66 S. E. 623, it is held: "That wages are paid at a stipulated period raises the presumption that the hiring is for such period, if nothing in the contract shows that the hiring was for a longer or shorter period."

Mason v. New York Produce Exch. 127 App. Div. 282, 111 N. Y. Supp. 163, holding that a contract of employment "at a salary of $2,500 for the first year, and if your services prove satisfactory, . . . your remuneration for the second year and thereafter will be $3,000 per annum," constituted a hiring from year to year, which is cited in the note to Warden v. Hinds, is affirmed without opinion in 196 N. Y. 548, 89 N. E. 1104. E. L. D.

Mr. George S. Wallace, for plaintiff in error:

The employment of the plaintiff was a general or indefinite hiring, and not a contract or employment by the year.

Wood, Mast. & S. p. 272; Hotchkiss v. Godkin, 63 App. Div. 468, 71 N. Y. Supp. 629; Copp v. Colorado Coal & I. Co. 20 Misc. 702, 46 N. Y. Supp. 542; Edwards v. Seaboard & R. R. Co. 121 N. C. 490, 28 S. E. 127; Chadwick v. Morris, 170 Ill. App. 569.

The form of contract between plaintiff and defendant being a question of fact, upon which there was a conflict of evidence, and having been submitted to a jury, the court was not warranted in setting aside the verdict of the jury.

Coalmer v. Barrett, 61 W. Va. 237, 56 S. E. 385; Miller Supply Co. v. Crane, 61 W. Va. 658, 57 S. E. 268.

Messrs. Holt, Duncan, & Holt for defendant in error.

Lynch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Upon the general issue in assumpsit, the jury found in favor of plaintiff $576.83, claimed by him as a balance due under a contract of employment. The court, on motion of defendant, set aside the verdict as "contrary to the law and the evidence," and awarded a new trial. By his writ of error, plaintiff asks reversal of this ruling and a judgment here upon the verdict. His contention is that the contract proved is a general or indefinite hiring, terminable at will; that, upon voluntary withdrawal therefrom, he is entitled to the compensation then earned, represented by the sum sued for. Defendant, on the other hand, claims the employment was for the definite period of one year, and that, having quit before full performance, plaintiff cannot recover on the contract or on a quantum meruit. The terms of the contract, except its duration, are clearly proven. In the latter part of 1907, plaintiff entered the employment of defendant, a wholesale dealer in dry goods and notions, as traveling salesman, upon an agreement for a monthly salary and expenses, and the further compensation of 5 per cent commissions in excess of salary and expenses, on goods sold by him, the excess to be ascertained and paid on settlements made at the end of each year. No definite duration was fixed for the employment. Plaintiff worked until December, 1908, when he was paid the commissions due for the year, and a new contract made with the same terms, except that the monthly salary was increased and new territory added. Watts, president of the company, says the contract was "for one year," but he does not further indicate there was a mutual agreement to that effect. Plaintiff continued to work under this contract until the close of 1909, except that his commissions were reduced by Watts in February from 5 to 3 per cent. Upon the annual settlement at the close of 1909, no commissions were due plaintiff, his commissions being $10 less than the aggregate of his salary and expenses for that year. Both he and Watts say no new arrangement was made for 1910; that the agreement for 1909 continued without change. During the employment defendant rendered monthly statements to plaintiff, showing both the sums paid him as salary and expenses and the amount of goods sold by him during the preceding month. Plaintiff continued in the employment of the company until May, 1910, when, having become interested as stockholder in another similar company, he notified Watts of his intention to discontinue his previous engagements, and, without objection by defendant, quit its service. He had then earned in that year $576.83 in commissions in excess of salary and expenses. To recover this balance, he instituted this action, having already received all salary and expenses then due. These are the facts from which we must determine whether the employment was for a year or at will. This is the crucial test of plaintiff's right to recovery. No proof defines the duration of the employment. It is general, not definite. Being of such indefinite character, it is necessary to ascertain by construction the extent of the engagement.

The authorities, while not wholly in accord, generally state the doctrine applicable to such cases to be that an employment upon a weekly, monthly, or annual salary, if no definite period is otherwise stated or proved for its continuance, is presumed to be a hiring at will. Many authorities so hold. Edwards v. Seaboard & R. R. Co. 121 N. C. 490, 28 S. E. 137; Currier v. W. M. Ritter Lumber Co. 150 N. C. 694, 134 Am. St. Rep. 955, 64 S. E. 763; Finger v. Koch & S. Brewing Co. 13 Mo. App. 310; Evans v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 24 Mo. App. 114; Hotchkiss v. Godkin, 63 App. Div. 468, 71 N. Y. Supp. 629; Speeder Cycle Co. v. Teeter, 18 Ind. App. 476, 48 N. E. 595; Bentley v. Smith, 3 Ga. App. 242, 59 S. E. 720; Prentiss v. Ledyard, 28 Wis. 131; Haney v. Caldwell, 35 Ark. 156; Booth v. National India Rubber Co. 19 R. I. 696, 36 Atl. 714; Orr v. Ward, 73 Ill. 318. Labatt on Master & Servant, vol. 1, § 159, says: "The doctrine applied by the great majority of the courts which have so far [1913] expressed an opinion on the subject consists essentially in a complete repudiation of the presumption that a general or indefinite hiring is a hiring for a year, and the substitution of another presumption, viz., that such a hiring is a hiring at will. . . . Under this doctrine, the burden of proving that such a hiring was obligatory for a year rests upon the party who seeks to establish that the contract covered that period." So, Martin v. New York L. Ins. Co. 148 N. Y. 117, 42 N. E. 416, says that "a hiring at so much a year, no time being specified, is an indefinite hiring; and such a hiring is a hiring at will, and may be terminated at any time by either party." Wood on Master & Servant, § 134, states the doctrine even stronger,—that "a hiring at so much a day, week, month, or year, no time being specified, is an indefinite hiring, and no presumption attaches that it was for a day even, but only at the rate fixed for whatever time the party may serve; . . . [and] in all such cases the contract may be put an end to by either party at any time, unless the time is fixed; and a recovery had, at the rate fixed, for the services actually rendered." Greer v. Arlington Mills Mfg. Co. 1 Penn. (Del.) 581, 43 Atl. 609, though with greater caution, declares that "a hiring at a certain sum a year, no time being specified, and unaccompanied by any facts or circumstances in proof from which a different intent may be inferred, and when the testimony as to the contract is not conflicting, is an employment for an indefinite period, and not for a year, and is determinable at any time at the option of either party thereto."

Application of this test does not lead to the conclusion that, upon the facts disclosed here, the contract required plaintiff to serve during the year 1910. Defendant changed its terms in February, 1909, from a 5 to a 3 per cent commission, conceding to its salesman the option to quit or further continue in its employment. It paid the salary and expenses, except commissions, at the end of each month, and commissions at the end of each year,—in case of the latter, only because until that time it could not ascertain whether the amount due to each salesman exceeded his salary and expenses. This postponement was thus a necessary convenience, solely for the purpose of an annual adjustment of accounts, and not an essential ingredient of the contract of employment.

For defendant, it is urged that plaintiff's testimony shows an annual employment. We do not reach that conclusion. His statement that the same arrangement was made or modified for the next succeeding year does not mean that when so made or modified it required his service for an entire year. Nor is defendant's testimony 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) on this subject in any degree convincing. It is true he says that at the end of each year the contract was renewed for the succeeding year, and was to cover a year. But for 1909 it did not thus continue, because altered, as we have seen, in February of that year. He then construed it as a contract at will, and therefore subject to alteration or revocation. Again, it is not sufficient for defendant to state only that the contract was for a year, and that he did not contract with his salesman for a shorter period, without more. He must, in view of the authorities cited, also show that plaintiff so understood and agreed to the contract as one requiring service during such period. "Unless their understanding was mutual that the service was to extend for a certain fixed and definite period, it is an indefinite hiring, and is determinable at the will of either party." Wood, Mast. & S. § 134; Kansas P. R. Co. v. Robertson, 3 Colo. 142, 146; McCullough Iron Co. v. Carpenter, 67 Md. 554, 557, 11 Atl. 176; Prentiss v. Ledyard, 28 Wis. 131; Orr v. Ward, 73 Ill. 318; Haney v. Caldwell, 35 Ark. 156. Here there is no such proof. To constitute an agreement, the minds of the parties must concur, or meet upon its terms; otherwise there is no agreement.

Besides, it was a question for the jury to say, by its verdict, under the instructions clearly presenting the theories of the parties, whether the contract required a year's service, which inquiry it thereby answered in the negative. Both by reason and authority, the burden to show a definite term of employment rested with defendant, as the contract did not expressly state the term. The court erred in disturbing the finding of the jury.

Our conclusion is that the contract proved was for an indefinite term, and therefore revocable at the will of either party. Being of that opinion, we reverse the judgment of the trial court, overrule defendant's motion for a new trial, and enter judgment on the verdict of the jury.

M. G. MUNN et al., Appts.,

v.

W. L. FINGER.

(— Fla. —, 64 So. 271.)

Municipal corporation — power of legislature to establish commission government.

The state Constitution expressly confers

Headnote by WHITFIELD, J.

upon the legislature authority to prescribe the powers of a municipality, and to alter or amend the same at any time; and a statutory enactment which in effect is that, upon stated affirmative favorable action taken by the city council and the electors of a municipality, and the due election of commissioners, a commission form of government for the municipality "shall become operative," is not unconstitutional, and such enactment is not void for uncertainty, since the intent is that the designated commissioners shall exercise the authority theretofore vested in the mayor and city council, the only elective officers under the charter acts.

(January 9, 1914.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Circuit Court for Polk County enjoining the election of a mayor and councilmen in the city of Lakeland. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Kelsey Blanton, for appellants:

A municipality can exercise only such authority as is expressly conferred upon it by the legislature, or such as is necessarily implied. The existence of authority to act cannot be assumed, and in cases where there is reasonable doubt as to the existence of authority, such doubt is resolved against the municipality.

Florida C. & P. R. Co. v. Ocala Street & Suburban R. Co. 39 Fla. 306, 22 So. 692; State ex rel. Worley v. Lewis, 55 Fla. 570, 46 So. 630; State ex rel. Ellis v. Tampa Waterworks Co. 56 Fla. 858, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 183, 47 So. 358; Hardee v. Brown, 56 Fla. 377, 47 So. 834; Porter v. Vinzant, 49 Fla. 213, 111 Am. A municipal office can be created only by the legislature, or by the municipality when expressly authorized. A city has no power to create an office other than that expressly provided for in the Constitution, law, or charter.

The earlier cases on the question are discussed in the note to State ex rel. Hunt v. Tausick, 35 L.R.A. (N.S.) 802, and that to State ex rel. Simpson v. Mankato, 41 L.R.A. (N.S.) 111.

Since the latter note the power of the legislature to establish a commission form of government for municipalities of the state has again been judicially declared in Jackson v. State, 102 Miss. 663, 59 So. 873.

Such a form of government is not a denial of representative government. Ibid.

Nor is it invalid as being a delegation of legislative power. Ibid.

The guaranty by the Federal Constitution of a republican form of government does not extend to municipal government, and therefore is not violated by a city charter establishing the commission form of government, and subjecting the commissioners to the control of the initiative, referendum, and recall. Walker v. Spokane, 62 Wash. 312, 113 Pac. 775, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 994.

Likewise, the declaration in § 42 of the Constitution of Alabama, that the powers of government shall be divided into three distinct departments, viz., the legislative, executive, and judicial, each of which shall be confided to a separate body, was held not applicable to municipal government, in State ex rel. Wilkinson v. Lane, — Ala. —, 62 So. 31.

The abolishing of certain offices by the establishment of the commission form of government for municipalities does not render the act so establishing this form of government unconstitutional. Jackson v. State, supra.

While the following points do not relate to the constitutionality of the commission 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

form of government as such, they bear on various provisions contained in commission government acts, and are therefore closely allied thereto; but on these points this note and those preceding do not purport to be exhaustive.

The provision in the Mississippi commission government act, that candidates for office shall be placed on the official ballot by the nomination of a party primary, does not restrict the constitutional right of voters to cast their ballots for whomsoever they please, since the law refers only to what should be printed on the ballot, and does not prevent the elector from writing the name of another candidate thereon. Ibid.

A commission charter which prohibited the designation of the political party or the affiliation of the candidates upon the ballot was held not to be an invasion of the rights of any political party, in State ex rel. Duniway v. Portland, 65 Or. 273, 133 Pac. 62.

The fact that the governor of the state is given the power by an act creating a commission form of municipal government, to appoint the first three members of the board of commissioners, does not render the act unconstitutional. State ex rel. Wilkinson v. Lane, supra.

The Wisconsin law providing for a commission form of government for cities was held not obnoxious to the Constitution because it did not apply to cities of the first class, in State ex rel. Bloomer v. Canavan, 155 Wis. 398, 145 N. W. 44.

The method of adopting an amendment changing the form of municipal government to the commission form of government was sustained in People ex rel. Moore v. Perkins, — Colo. —, 137 Pac. 55, but the constitutionality of this form of government was not raised. W. A. E.

Brown v. Blake, 46 Conn. 549; State v. Hillard, 42 Conn. 168; Lowery v. Lexington, 116 Ky. 157, 75 S. W. 202; State, Anderson, Prosecutor, v. Camden, 58 N. J. L. 515, 33 Atl. 846; Hoboken v. Harrison, 30 N. J. L. 73.

The sole power to make law is lodged in the legislature, with competency, however, to organize it by adopting an enactment complete in itself, and prescribing the conditions under which it shall be vitalized, as by a vote of the people at large, or those of a particular district, according to circumstances.

State ex rel. Mueller v. Thompson, 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 339 note, 149 Wis. 488, 137 N. W. 20, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 774; Elliott v. Detroit, 121 Mich. 611, 84 N. W. 820; State, Dexheimer, Prosecutor, v. Orange, 60 N. J. L. 111, 36 Atl. 706; State ex rel. Hunt v. Tausick, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 802, and note, 64 Wash. 69, 116 Pac. 651; State ex rel. Simpson v. Mankato, 41 L.R.A.(N.S.) 111, and note, 117 Minn. 458, 136 N. W. 264; State v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 56 Fla. 617, 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 639, 47 So. 969.

As a complete system of municipal government, § 70 is defective and void.

State ex rel. Wyatt v. Ashbrook, 154 Mo. 375, 48 L.R.A. 266, 77 Am. St. Rep. 765, 55 S. W. 627; McGuire v. District of Columbia, 24 App. D. C. 22, 65 L.R.A. 430; Augustine v. State, 41 Tex. Crim. Rep. 59, 96 Am. St. Rep. 765, 52 S. W. 77.

Mr. S. W. Lawler also for appellants.

Mr. Epps Tucker, Jr., for appellee.

Whitfield, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal is from a decree enjoining the election of a mayor and four councilmen in the city of Lakeland, Florida. The charter of the city (chapter 6363, Acts of 1911) provides elaborately for a municipal government by the usual officers and methods, and also contains the following: "The city of Lakeland is hereby authorized at any future time to establish a commission form of government and to elect its commissioners by popular vote, as it may determine. Such commission form of government shall be established in the following manner, to wit: Upon a two-thirds vote of the city council to adopt such commission form of government, the city council shall make a code of laws governing the city, which may be enforced by three commissioners. The said code shall be published for a period of thirty days in a newspaper published in the city. An election shall be called by the mayor and the city council for the purpose of submitting the question of ratification of such commission form of government to the voters of the city, which election shall be held not less than thirty days from the adoption by the city council." Chapter 6711, Acts of 1913, amends § 70 of the charter act, as follows:

"The city of Lakeland is hereby authorized at any future time to establish a commission form of government; to elect (5) commissioners by popular vote, one to be elected from each ward of the city of Lakeland, and one at large, to serve for two years each from the date of their qualification, or until their successors are elected and qualified.

"Such commission form of government shall be established in the following manner, to wit: Upon a two-thirds vote of the city council to adopt such commission form of government, an election shall be called by the mayor and the city council for the purpose of submitting the question of ratification or rejection of the commission form of government to the voters of the city, which election shall be held not less than thirty days from the adoption by the city council of such commission form of government.

"The provisions of said commission form of government shall include the powers commonly known as the initiative, the referendum, and the recall, same to be submitted to the voters for their acceptance or rejection.

"If the majority of the qualified electors voting at said election shall vote in favor of the commission form of government, the same shall become operative and of full force and effect as a method of government for the said city.

"In the event said commission form of government should be ratified, the commissioners so chosen shall have the right to employ a municipal manager to have complete control of the business interests of the said city as a business manager, subject always to the direction, supervision, and control of the said commissioners, at a salary fixed by said commissioners, and subject to be removed by them at their pleasure, with or without cause."

In the decree of the court is the following finding: "That the city of Lakeland has the power, under chapter 6711, Acts of Legislature of the State of Florida for 1913, to establish a commission form of government; that the election held on the 8th day of October, 1913, for the purpose of ratification or rejection of the commission government was regular, and that the five commissioners were duly and regularly elected as a commission for the government of the city of Lakeland, in accordance with § 6 of said charter. The court further finds that it was the intention of the legislature to vest the commission with power and authority to carry on the municipal government and affairs, and while the act fails to completely define the details of the government, yet it submits to the vote of the people for ratification 'a method of government' called commission form."

At an election called by a two-thirds vote of the city council for that purpose, a majority of the electors duly voted for a commission form of government.

It is contended in effect that the quoted amendment of the charter by the legislature of 1913 is inoperative and void, if it is designed that the commission form of government is to supersede the other and usual form provided for in the charter act, for the reason, it is argued, that there is in the statute or in this state no prescribed commission form of municipal government, and the power to establish a commission form of government is legislative, and cannot lawfully be delegated to the city itself.

The Constitution provides (§ 24, article 3): "The legislature shall establish a uniform system of . . . municipal government, which shall be applicable except in cases where local or special laws are provided by the legislature that may be inconsistent therewith." Also in § 8, art. 8: "The legislature shall have power to establish and to abolish municipalities, to provide for their government, to prescribe their jurisdiction and powers, and to alter or amend the same at any time."

Under these sections of the Constitution the legislature may, by law, confer upon a municipality any powers relating to its government that are not in conflict with other organic provisions; and a grant by the legislature to a municipality of the right to submit to its electors for adoption a commission form of government, upon which adoption the statute by its own terms makes such commission form operative, does not appear, beyond a reasonable doubt, to conflict with any provision or principle of the state or Federal Constitution.

The above-quoted organic provisions of this state contemplate varying powers for different municipalities, and expressly authorize the legislature to prescribe the powers of municipalities as varying exigencies may demand; and such express legislative authority carries with it a discretion in conferring powers upon a municipality that has no limitations in the Constitution affecting this case. The implied principle that the general lawmaking power of the legislature may not be delegated is not violated in the exercise by the legislature of its authority to prescribe the powers of a municipality. See Yazoo City v. Lightcap, 82 Miss. 148, 33 So. 949; 28 Cyc. 241; Dobbin 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

v. San Antonio, 2 Posey Unrep. Cas. (Tex.) 708.

The above-stated principle with reference to municipalities under our present Constitution was recognized in State v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 56 Fla. 617, 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 639, 47 So. 969, where it was held that the legislature could not lawfully delegate to the railroad commissioners power to enact a law, or to declare what the law shall be, or to exercise an unrestricted discretion in applying a law; but the legislature may enact a law complete in itself, and authorize designated officials, within definite limitations, to exercise discretionary authority in effectuating the law. In State ex rel. Mueller v. Thompson, 149 Wis. 488, 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 339, 137 N. W. 20, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 774, and other like cases, the state Constitution required a uniform system of municipal government; and authority conferred upon a municipality to change its charter would destroy the organic requirement of uniformity, as well as infringe upon the implied principle applied in such cases forbidding a delegation of legislative power. The only limitations upon the law-making power of the legislature are those contained in the Federal and state Constitutions, and it does not clearly appear that the power of the legislature, by law, to confer upon a municipality the authority here contested, is denied or limited by any provision or principle of the organic law.

Section 70 of the charter act of the city of Lakeland, as amended by chapter 6711, Acts of 1913, does not prescribe the details of the commission form of government which it authorizes the city to establish, but it does prescribe definitely the manner of establishing a commission form of government, and provides for the election of five commissioners "by popular vote." It is therein expressly provided that, "if a majority of the qualified electors voting at said election shall vote in favor of the commission form of government, the same shall become operative and of full force and effect as a method of government for the said city." The apparent intent of the law is that when the commission form of government is duly submitted by the designated city authorities, and affirmatively voted for by the electors of the city, then such form of government shall become operative by force of the statute itself, and that the five commissioners, duly elected as the law contemplates, shall exercise the authority theretofore vested in a mayor and city council, which are the usual functions of commissioners under a commission form or plan of government in a municipality. See 1 McQuillin, Mun. Corp. §§ 92, 340, 391; Brown v. Galveston, 97 Tex. 1, 75 S. W.

488; Fla. Laws, chaps. 6770, 6772. In other words, the question presented on this appeal is in effect the power of the legislature to declare that upon the happening of a certain contingency the power vested in the mayor and city council shall pass to five commissioners. We see no constitutional objections to the exercise by the legislature of such power, and upon the fulfillment of that condition the offices of the mayor and council ipso facto cease; a mere change in the agencies to exercise the powers of the municipality becomes effective by legislative direction upon the joint action of the council and the plebiscite. This intent harmonizes with the other provisions of the city charter, under which the elective officers are the mayor and the members of the city council. It does not appear from the pleadings or from the charter statutes that, with the five commissioners appropriately exercising functions of mayor and city council, the commission form of government will not be effective for municipal purposes, under the essential provisions of the charter acts. The decree is affirmed.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

ABRAHAM PEEPLES, Plff. in Err.,
v.

T. W. GARRISON & SON.

(141 Ga. 411, 81 S. E. 116.)

Execution — levy — power of officer.

1. A fl. fa. issued upon the foreclosure of a chattel mortgage in the superior court, Headnotes by BECK, J.

Note. — Estoppel by giving forthcoming bond to question legality of levy under an execution.

This note, so far as the question has arisen in proceedings concerning the bond, is supplemental to the note to Oliver v. Warren, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1020. Cases concerning the right to raise the questions of exemption of the property or of the title to it are excluded.

In suits on the bond.

The former note is referred to in O'Neill Mfg. Co. v. Harris, 127 Ga. 640, 56 S. E. 739, where, though judgment against the claimant in a suit on his forthcoming bonds was reversed on other grounds, it was held that the executions were properly admitted in evidence over objections that the same were satisfied by entries of levies, previously made, unexplained, and that the execu-and directed to "all and singular the sheriffs, or their lawful deputies and coroners of this state," could not be levied, except by one of the officers to whom it was directed. A levy by a constable of a justice's court was invalid, and such a levy should have been dismissed upon a motion made at the trial.

Levy — estoppel to question validity.

2. The fact that the defendant had made a counter affidavit and given a forthcoming bond, in both of which was recited the fact of the levy, did not estop him, at the trial, from raising the issue as to the validity of the levy.

(February 24, 1914.)

ERROR to the Superior Court for Cobb County to review a judgment overruling a motion to dismiss the levy of an execution in proceedings to foreclose a mortgage. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Griffin & Johnson for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Mozley & Moss for defendant in error.

Beck, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Garrison & Son foreclosed a mortgage for $160 against Peeples, the plaintiff in error, by affidavit in Cobb superior court, on May 30, 1912; and on the same day the clerk issued a fl. fa. thereon, directed, as the law requires, "to all and singular the sheriffs, or their lawful deputies, and coroners of this state." On June 19, 1912, this fl. fa. was levied on a horse by W. A. Bishop, a constable of a justice's court, acting in this capacity and signing the levy as such constable. On the same day the defendant filed an affidavit of illegality, denying indebtedness on the mortgage; and tions had not been entered on the general execution docket of the county in which the levy was made (which was not the county of the judgment), and were not properly backed. The court said: "In this suit, the defendant could not question the validity of the levies upon the property for the forthcoming of which it had given the claim bonds. In a case of this character, 'neither the legality of the levy nor the authority of the officer to make it is an issuable fact, these issues being concluded by the judgment in the claim case.' Oliver v. Warren, 124 Ga. 549, 110 Am. St. Rep. 188, 53 S. E. 100. The case just cited is reported in 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1020-1023, and in the 'case note' thereto appended it is said: 'It is very generally held that an obligor, whether principal or surety, in a forthcoming bond in which a levy is acknowledged, will not be allowed to attack the levy or the authority of the officer making it, in an gave bond for the forthcoming of the horse levied on. The horse was thereupon returned to him, and the constable returned the fi. fa. with the affidavit and bond to the office of the clerk of the superior court. When the case came on to be tried in that court, the defendant moved the court to dismiss the levy, because the said constable had no authority or jurisdiction under the law to levy the execution, it being a superior court execution directed to the sheriffs, their deputies and coroners. This motion the court overruled, and Peeples excepted.

The court erred in refusing to dismiss the levy. "A levy by an officer without authority of law is no levy at all." Oliver v. Warren, 124 Ga. 549, 550, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1020, 110 Am. St. Rep. 188, 53 S. E. 100. But it is insisted that the defendant is estopped from denying the legality of the levy, having made an affidavit of illegality, and given a bond in which the factum of the levy is recited. "But the estoppel does not extend to the validity of the process, nor to the authority of the officer to make the levy." Ibid. And in the case of Pearce v. Renfro, 68 Ga. 194, it is said: "A levy by an officer who has no authority is the same as no levy. Under § 888 of the Code, the sheriff had no authority to levy a tax execution when the principal amount did not exceed $50." Morris v. Tinker, 60 Ga. 466. It is, however, contended by counsel for plaintiff in error that a claimant is estopped from denying the levy, because he must admit that there was one, before he has any of the rights of a claimant. We think this correct, and means only that after he has sworn that the property seized, if personal, was his property, and the bonds given under the claim laws being an admission upon his part that the property claimed was so action upon the bond; and numerous cases from other jurisdictions, as well as some of our own, are cited to this effect."

In an action on a forthcoming bond the obligors are estopped to deny the authority of the officer who made the levy. Smith v. Davis, 3 Ga. App. 419, 60 S. E. 199, where the court said: "From Roebuck v. Thornton, 19 Ga. 149, to Stroud v. Hancock, 116 Ga. 336, 42 S. E. 496, the rule in Georgia has been uniform that neither maker nor surety on a forthcoming bond will be heard to attack the legality of the levy in any respect." (It would seem, however, from a later part of the decision, that the court considered that the officer had authority.)

Reference may be made in this connection to Stroud v. Hancock, 116 Ga. 332, 42 S. E. 496, where it was held in an action on a bond given by a mortgagor upon a mortgage fi. fa. that, after judgment against the mortgagor, a surety was estopped to deny the recitals in the bond in reference to the levy and the existence of the property, although such bond was not the bond contemplated by the statute in such cases, but was an ordinary forthcoming bond.

But, as is shown in the former note, the rule is not invariable. See Van Cleave v. Haworth, 5 Ala. 188, infra, "Collateral attack."

In view of the nature of the objection in PEEPLES v. T. W. GARRISON & SON, it is interesting to refer to the early case of Couch v. Miller, 2 Leigh, 545, where it was held that the court properly granted a motion by the surety (made in opposition to an award of execution against him on the bond) to question a forthcoming bond "for defects apparent on the face of the execution upon which it was taken," where the execution was directed to the sheriff of Campbell county, but the condition of the bond stated that the writ was directed to the sergeant of Lynchburg, that he levied it, and that he had taken the bond; and the 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) court considered that no one but the sheriff to whom the execution was directed could levy it.

It may be noted that it was said inter alia in Reynolds Bkg. Co. v. Southern Pacific Guano Co. 140 Ga. 498, 79 S. E. 132, in affirming the dismissal of a suit by the claimant to enjoin suit on his forthcoming bond: "The defense that the plaintiffs in the judgment were adjudicated bankrupts, and their property administered in the bankrupt court, or that there are no parties plaintiff for whom the sheriff could recover for their use, even if a good defense (and as to that we express no opinion), could be set up in the suit on the bond; and there is no reason for the intervention of equity to enjoin that suit."

Collateral attack.

There is some difference of opinion in the courts as to whether, in proceedings other than those upon the forthcoming bond, the obligor in such bond is estopped to question the legality of the levy under the execution.

In Roebuck v. Thornton, supra, the court said, in compelling a purchaser at a sale in execution to comply with his bid, where there was a question as to the sufficiency of the levy: "The levy in this case must, we think, be held to have been good. The defendant gave a forthcoming bond. That bond, by its terms, estopped him from saying there had been no sufficient levy. But if it estopped him, the purchaser got a good title, for it does not appear that there was anybody else interested in the property."

In May v. Johnson, 3 Ind. 449, it was held that the making of a delivery bond is a good defense in an action of trespass by an execution defendant against a constable, and the obligor is estopped from showing that the judgment upon which the execution was issued was against another person of like name. The court said: "The suit is seized, that then it would be absurd to allow him to come into court and deny his oath and the obligation of his contracts. But the seizure or levy is one thing, and the mandate of the court by which the act is done is altogether another and quite a different thing. And so also is the authority by which the officer, as such, makes the seizure. But this view of the case was considered wholly immaterial by the very learned counsel who argued it, and it was most earnestly maintained that the claimant could not deny that the levy was a legal levy, although it might have been made by himself or any other wholly unauthorized person. We cannot so hold. Nor do we think that this view is at all inconsistent with the cases in Cohen v. Broughton, 54 Ga. 297, and Scolly v. Butler, 59 Ga. 849. The question in the first case was whether the levy was complete; the possession being the point of the levy."

between the parties interested in that bond, and in relation to the subject-matter of it. In a suit upon the bond against the obligor for a failure to deliver the property according to the condition, the admission in question would have estopped the obligor from denying it, there being no fraud; and we think said admission as effectual an estoppel in this as it would be in such a suit."

And it was said in Eldridge v. Grice, 132 Ala. 667, 32 So. 683, a suit for trial of the right of property, that the claimant's affidavit and claim bond estop him to deny a proper levy.

But in Page v. Coleman, 9 Port. (Ala.) 275, the court was of the opinion, upon a motion to quash an execution on the ground that the entry of the original judgment was insufficient, that the giving of a forthcoming bond was not a waiver of the irregularity of the execution, and said: "The entering into this cannot be construed as a consent that the proceedings should be considered as regular, or as a waiver of the irregularity. If the suit was on the bond, the party might not be permitted to deny the validity of the judgment, because he would be estopped by his solemn deed, in which the existence of it is admitted; but this very rule would make it the more important for him to obtain the judgment of the court setting aside the execution, and consequently destroying the legal effect of the bond."

This case was referred to in Van Cleave v. Haworth, 5 Ala. 188, where it was held in a proceeding by supersedeas against the enforcement of a forthcoming bond that the giving of the bond was not a waiver of the irregularity of issuing an execution more than ten years after the issuing of a prior execution without any scire facias. The court said: "It is also contended that this is a mere irregularity under the statute, and was waived by entering into the forthcoming

It is true that these were claim cases in which the claimant was raising the question as to the validity of the levy. But we see no reason why the defendant in proceedings to foreclose a mortgage on personalty, relatively to the right to raise this question, does not stand in as good a position as a claimant.

The ruling here made, while seemingly in conflict with that in the case of Smith v. Camp, 84 Ga. 117, 10 S. E. 539, is not actually so. This court did there rule that "a defendant in fi. fa. who has recited a levy, both in his affidavit of illegality and the bond given for the forthcoming of the property, will not be heard to controvert the fact of such levy at the trial of the affidavit of illegality." But this holding was made, not with reference to the validity of the process, or the authority of the officer to make the levy, or the right of the defendant in fi. fa. to ing bond. In the case of Page v. Coleman, 9 Port. (Ala.) 275, this point was considered and we then held that the giving of such a bond was no waiver of a previous irregularity."

And the present case of PEEPLER v. T. W. GARRISON & SON permits the objection of nullity of the levy to be made on the trial of the principal case.

Miscellaneous.

In Easley v. Walker, 10 Ala. 671, where the question was not in the case, the court said: "We apprehend that the execution of a forthcoming bond for property subject to seizure would estop the party from controverting the regularity of the levy."

If a warehouseman in possession of the goods agrees to act as bailee for the sheriff, he may not assert that the levy was incomplete. Higdon v. Warrant Warehouse Co. — Ala. App. —, 63 So. 938, where, however, it was found that the warehouseman did not agree to act as such bailee.

In Jones v. Miles, 1 How. (Miss.) 50, the court quashed a forthcoming bond given upon an execution against the goods, etc., of Hugh Jones in the hands of his administrator, Thomas Jones, executed by Thomas Jones and another, and reciting "which said writ hath been levied on all the goods and chattels of the said defendant, Thomas Jones; which said property is permitted to remain in the possession of the said Thomas Jones, etc." The court said: "I do not think the levy in this case can help the bond, as it does not show upon what property it was made; and as the law requires that the levy should be recited, we must suppose that the recital in the bond conforms to the levy."

It may be noted that in Scolly v. Butler, 59 Ga. 849, cited in PEEPLER v. T. W. GARRISON & SON, there was no bond.

test these questions at the trial, but with reference to the contention of the defendant that he should have been permitted to show on the trial that no levy or seizure of the property had been made by the levying officer; and, as to this contention, the court announced that, having recited the levy, both in his affidavit of illegality and the bond given for the forthcoming of the property, the defendant would not be heard to controvert the fact of such levy. It is clear that this case last referred to is entirely different from the case in hand, and the latter falls within the ruling made in the first two cases referred to above.

Having held that the levy should have been dismissed, what took place on the trial subsequently to the motion to dismiss was entirely nugatory; and this court will not undertake to determine the questions raised during the trial after the overruling of the motion to dismiss, which should have been sustained and the case thereby disposed of.

A person who discovers the perpetrator of a crime and the evidence by which he can be convicted may be entitled to a reward offered for the "arrest and conviction" of the offender, even although, having the power to make the arrest himself, he omits to exercise it, and permits someone else to take the defendant into custody.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Wyandotte County in favor of intervener in an action to recover a reward offered for the arrest of a murderer. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. McCabe Moore and J. N. Baird for appellant.

Mr. James Meek for appellee Board of County Commissioners.

Messrs. T. A. Pollock and E. C. Little for intervener.

Mason, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The board of county commissioners of Wyandotte county offered a reward for the "arrest and conviction" of the person who had committed a murder. J. W. Elkins brought action against the county for the amount, asserting that he had met the conditions. H. T. Zimmer set up a conflicting claim, which he sought to enforce by interpleading. The county admitted its liability to one or the other of the claimants. Upon a trial the court sustained a demurrer to the evidence of Elkins and rendered judgment for Zimmer, which was reversed on appeal. Elkins v. Wyandotte County, 86 Kan. 305, 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) 662, 120 Pac. 542. Upon a new trial judgment was again rendered in favor of Zimmer, and Elkins again appeals.

There was evidence tending to establish these facts: Elkins, learning of the offer of the reward, began an investigation of the case. By talking with one James McMahon he induced him to produce and turn over some articles, including a gun, which were hidden in a cornfield. He told the sheriff of this, stating that McMahon was the guilty person. The sheriff directed the undersheriff and Zimmer to send and get him. McMahon was arrested, and on being confronted with the articles found in the field confessed. Elkins was at the time a "special and nonpay" deputy sheriff. The description of Elkins as a "special and nonpay" deputy seems fairly to imply that, while he held a commission as a deputy sheriff, his activities in that connection were limited to serving such papers as might be delivered to him, or performing such other acts as might be specifically directed. Clearly he was under no obligation to devote time to the investigation of criminal offenses. This was evidently the view of the trial court, for the mere fact of Elkins's official character was not held to prevent his recovering the reward.

A reversal is asked because of an instruction to the effect that it was the duty of anyone seeking to earn the reward to do all he legally had a right to do towards the arrest of the murderer; that, if Elkins was a deputy sheriff, he had a legal right to arrest McMahon upon discovering him to be the murderer; and that if, having the right and the opportunity to make such arrest, he voluntarily chose not to do so, and Zimmer, acting for his own benefit and for himself, arrested McMahon, then Zimmer was entitled to the reward. Public policy forbids an officer to claim a reward for merely doing his duty, but that is the extent to which his official character affects the matter. Marsh v. Wells, F. & Co. Exp. 88 Kan. 538, 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 133, 129 Pac. 168. See also 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 953; 34 Cyc. 1753; notes in Ann. Cas. 1912C, 1294 and in 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 131; Hartley v. Granville, 216 Mass. 38, 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 392, 102 N. E. 942. If Elkins is entitled to the reward, it is because of voluntary investigations, not required by his office, which resulted in discoveries leading to the arrest and conviction of McMahon. His official character can hardly enter into the matter, because as a private citizen he had authority to make the arrest. State v. Mowry, 37 Kan. 369, 377, 15 Pac. 282; Garnier v. Squires, 62 Kan. 321, 62 Pac. 1005; 5 Enc. L. & P. 484; 3 Cyc. 885. If, in order to gain the reward, he was required to do all he legally could toward the arrest, his omission to make the arrest would be equally fatal to his recovery, whether he was an officer or a private citizen.

In some circumstances the person actually making an arrest might obviously be entitled to the reward,—for instance, where a known and unconcealed murderer was at large, and the difficulty in enforcing the law lay in taking him into custody. The present case does not appear to be one to which that rule applies. The jury may have found that the only real difficulty in the affair was to ascertain by whom the murder was committed and by what evidence this could be proved; that Elkins by his own efforts discovered the facts that made it known that McMahon was the murderer, that he reported these facts to the sheriff, and that, as the natural result of this report, the arrest was made by Zimmer. Such findings, in the opinion of this court, would require a verdict for Elkins. But, under the instruction complained of, such a verdict was forbidden if the jury also found that Elkins could have himself arrested McMahon, but omitted to do so. We think the instruction put too much stress upon the question as to who made the arrest, and unduly limited the effect of another instruction, in the following words, which correctly stated the principle by which the matter in dispute should be determined: "A literal compliance with the terms of the reward is not required, neither need there be an actual physical arrest by a claimant; but if you find from a preponderance of the evidence that one of the said parties, plaintiff or intervener, acting with a knowledge that said reward had been offered, and with a view to obtain it, performed substantially the terms of said offer of reward, and discover[ed] evidence and performed services which were the primary, proximate, procuring, and predominant cause of the arrest and conviction of one James McMahon for the crime in question, you will find for that party."

The argument is made that Elkins in his petition alleged that he had made the arrest, and therefore that he cannot complain of the ruling in question. However defective his pleading may have been, the character of his claim was necessarily made clear at the first trial, and Zimmer cannot have been misled. It may be remarked that situations frequently arise in which substantial justice is promoted by the division of a reward among several claimants. The right of a court of equity to make such an apportionment has been asserted, although in other instances it has been denied. Rogers v. McCoach, 66 Misc. 85, 120 N. Y. Supp. 686; 42 Century Dig. Rewards, § 16; 17 Decen. Dig. Rewards, § 12.

After the first judgment in favor of Zimmer was appealed from, Zimmer gave a bond to enforce it notwithstanding the appeal, and it was paid. The county asks that it be relieved of liability for the costs that have since accrued. The controversy is between Elkins and Zimmer, and the costs should be awarded accordingly.

The judgment is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

All the Justices concur.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, Mason, J., on May 20, 1914, handed down the following response (— Kan. —, 140 Pac. 896):

In a petition for a rehearing it is suggested that the evidence (some of which is not abstracted) shows that Elkins was appointed a deputy sheriff, at his own request, to assist in discovering and arresting the murderer. This cannot be the case, as the appointment was made October 9, 1909, and the murder was not committed until October 19, 1909.

It is also suggested that the opinion states as facts certain matters concerning which there was a conflict in the evidence. The statement made was that there was evidence tending to establish these facts; there was no purpose on the part of the court to treat them as established.

The jury must, of course, be the judge of the facts, but there is abundant evidence to support the conclusion that each of the claimants rendered effective service in bringing the offender to justice, and the case is one where a division of the reward suggests itself as the most equitable solution of the problem.

The petition for a rehearing is denied.

Pleading — conversion — alternative allegations.

In an action for conversion of personal property, an allegation in the alternative that one or the other of two defendants converted the goods, but which one plaintiff is unable to determine, states no cause of action against either defendant.

Note. — Joinder of parties with alternative allegations as to liability.

There seems to be no question but that, at common law, the liability of several defendants cannot be pleaded in the alternative, at least where the doubt as to who is liable does not arise from a close business relationship or the conduct of the parties. In equity, however, there are decisions allowing joinder of defendants with allegation of liability in the alternative, especially where the situation or relationship between the parties is such that the whole matter should, in order to render full and adequate relief, be settled in one proceeding. And in some jurisdictions joinder of parties with alternative allegations as to liability is permitted in case of doubt as to who, if any-

SEPARATE APPEALS by defendants from an order of the Municipal Court of St. Paul, overruling their separate demurrers to the complaint in an action for the conversion of butter. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Briggs, Thygeson, & Everall, for appellants:

Where two persons are named as defendants in the same action, the declaration or complaint is defective and subject to a general demurrer unless it alleges a cause of action against both defendants.

Oglesby v. State, 73 Tex. 658, 11 S. W. 873; Thorndale Mercantile Co. v. Evans, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 146 S. W. 1053.

Messrs. Thomas C. Daggett and John R. Foley for respondent.

Hallam, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff sues two defendants, alleging: That an order for goods was received from defendant Produce Company; that on October 12, 1910, plaintiff took the goods to the building occupied by both defendants, and, although the goods were intended for the Produce Company, they were delivered to defendant Fisheries Company; that the next day plaintiff notified the Fisheries Company to deliver the goods to the Produce Company, and the Fisheries Company agreed to do so; that on the 1st of the following month plaintiff demanded payment of the Produce Company; that the Produce Company denied receiving the goods; that the Fisheries Company, on inquiry, stated that it had delivered the goods to the Produce Company. It is alleged that one or the other of defendants received the goods and converted them to its own use, but which one plaintiff is unable to determine by reason of the counterclaims of defendants. Defendants demur separately on the ground that the complaint states no cause of action.

We cannot sustain this complaint. We one, is liable, either by express statutory provision or by the rules of practice.

In absence of controlling regulation.

The rule laid down in CASEY PURE MILK Co. v. BOOTH FISHERIES Co. is supported by a few cases involving a similar state of facts.

Thus, in Brown v. Illinois C. R. Co. 100 Ky. 525, 38 S. W. 862, an action against two railroad companies for alleged negligence in delivering a car of stock different and inferior to that shipped by the plaintiffs, it was held that an averment that the loss occurred "by reason of the negligence of one or the other of defendants, or of both defendants, and as to which plaintiffs are unable to say as to whether the one or the

do not wish to detract from the very wholesome rule that pleadings should be liberally construed, but there are a few cardinal principles of pleading that must be observed. One of them is that a complaint must state, with ordinary directness, facts which constitute a cause of action against each defendant. If the facts are not within the knowledge of plaintiff or his attorney, they may be alleged upon information and belief. This complaint does not allege facts showing liability of either defendant. Both defendants might answer admitting every allegation of the complaint, and still the court could not order judgment on the pleadings against either defendant.

We are of the opinion that this form of pleading is not permissible under the Code Procedure, and such we believe to be the generally accepted rule. Price v. Virginia-Carolina Chemical Co. 136 Ga. 175, 71 S. E. 4; Brown v. Illinois C. R. Co. 100 Ky. 525, 38 S. W. 862; Oglesby v. State, 73 Tex. 658, 11 S. W. 873; 30 Cyc. 131. A different practice prevails in some jurisdictions, but this is by virtue of express provisions of statute. Honduras Inter-Oceanic R. Co. v. Lefevre, 36 L. T. N. S. 46, L. R. 2 Exch. Div. 301, 46 L. J. Exch. N. S. 391, 25 Week. Rep. 310; Child v. Stenning, 36 L. T. N. S. 426, 46 L. J. Ch. N. S. 523, L. R. 5 Ch. Div. 695, 25 Week. Rep. 519; Bennetts v. McIlwraith, 75 L. T. N. S. 145, [1896] 2 Q. B. 464, 8 Asp. Mar. L. Cas. 176, 65 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 632, 45 Week. Rep. 17; Phenix Iron Foundry v.

other or both, but one of these alternatives is true,"—was insufficient as against either of the defendants under the rule that a pleading is to be taken most strongly against the pleader.

And in Tift v. Tift, 4 Denio, 175, it was said with reference to an averment that the defendant "or his family" did the wrong complained of, that it would have been bad on general demurrer, there being nothing stated to show the defendant's liability for the acts of his family.

And in Oglesby v. State, 73 Tex. 658, 11 S. W. 873, where a tax collector had defaulted and the state alleged in effect that, from the evidence at hand, it had been unable to determine which of two sets of sureties was liable, and both were joined in an action to recover the amount of the defalcation "to the end that whatever equities that may exist between them on said two bonds, if any, may be adjusted, and thus a multiplicity of suits avoided by casting the liability where it justly belongs,"—it was held that the petition was defective. The court said: "The demand of the state against the sureties on either bond was strictly a legal demand, and the defenses to it were of a like character. There is no privity between the sureties upon the first bond and those on the second. Their obligations were separate and distinct, and the liability of those upon the one bond was in no sense dependent upon the liability of those upon the other. It is true that both sets of sureties were not responsible for the same defalcation, and that, from the very nature of the case, what the one set was liable for the other was not. But this fact does not establish any legal or equitable relation between the sureties on the one obligation and those on the other, nor does it, in a suit to recover upon either or both, relieve the state from the necessity of alleging unequivocally the facts which show the unconditional liability of the parties sought to be charged. To allege in a petition against A and B that A is liable if B is not, and that B is liable if A is not, does not allege the unconditional liability of either. We know of no authority which tolerates such pleading in cases like the present." The Oglesby Case was followed in Thorndale Mercantile Co. v. Evens, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 146 S. W. 1053, wherein it was held that a petition which showed that either of two defendants was liable to the plaintiff for the balance due upon a building contract did not state a cause of action, in that it did not assert a distinct or unconditional liability against either defendant. In connection with this and the next preceding case see Love v. Keowne and Skipwith v. Hurt, as set out infra.

So, in Price v. Virginia-Carolina Chemical Co. 136 Ga. 175, 71 S. E. 4, an equitable petition against two defendants, containing an alternative statement of facts, wherein it was alleged that if one statement was true, one defendant was indebted to the plaintiff, and that if the other statement was true, the other defendant would be indebted to him, and in which the prayer was that the defendants be required to interplead so as to determine which one was liable to him, and to have judgment against such defendant,—was held to be multifarious. In this case the payee of a note drawn by one of the defendants discounted it, and the discounting bank sent it to the second defendant for collection, and not receiving the money, plaintiff paid same. The defendant who made the note claimed that it paid the note to the collecting bank, which denied that it received either the note for collection or the money from the maker. The pertinent allegation of the petition was that if the note was paid by the maker to the collecting bank, then that bank was indebted to the petitioner; but that if it was not so paid as claimed, then the note had been lost if it was never received by the defendant bank, or, if it was received by the bank, it had appropriated and converted it to its own use; and that either one defendant or the other was indebted to petitioner in the amount of the note. In reaching the above-stated conclusion, the court said: "Instead of alleging that he [plaintiff] has funds belonging to one or the other of the defendants, whom he in-Lockwood, 21 R. I. 556, 45 Atl. 546; Rules of Practice, 58 Conn. 561, 20 Atl. v.

There is some authority for the proposition that an exception is made in cases where it is impossible to determine where liability rests, by reason of some close relation between defendants, or of some conduct on the part of defendants, and that in such cases both parties may be joined, with an alternative allegation that the acts constituting liability were committed by one or the other. See Braun & F. Co. v. Paulson, — Tex. Civ. App. — 95 S. W. 617. Whether such circumstances give rise to an exception to the rule we need not determine, for it does not appear that this is an exceptional case. The complaint contains no allegation of any close relation or community of action between these parties, except that they are tenants of the same building. It does not allege that they occupy the same business premises. The fact is, plaintiff made the mistake of delivering to one business house goods intended for another, and, instead of taking the trouble to make the transfer itself, relied upon the promise of the party to whom it made delivery to do so. The ulti-vites to settle their respective rights to the same, the plaintiff alleges that he is entitled to recover of one of the defendants a certain sum of money on an alternative state of facts, and asks that they litigate between themselves which state of facts presents the truth and which one of the defendants is liable to him. This is not permissible. If the bank collected the note, it is accountable to the plaintiff, and that is one cause of action. If the makers have not paid the note, they are liable thereon to the plaintiff, and that is an altogether different cause of action. The petition contains two distinct causes of action against different defendants, and violates the fundamental principle of pleading which prohibits the inclusion of separate and independent controversies against different parties in the same action."

But it has been held that a bill in equity may be framed in the alternative. Thus, in Thomason v. Smithson, 7 Port. (Ala.) 144, it was held that a bill to restrain enforcement of a judgment which was alleged to have been satisfied could be framed so as to obtain relief against the judgment creditor if he had authorized the one attempting to enforce the judgment to do so, or so as to obtain relief against such third person if he was attempting to collect the judgment without authority from the judgment creditor. The court said that such a pleading would inform such third person of the claim set up against him, and would enable him by cross bill against the judgment creditor to adjust the equity between them, or to defend in any other manner he might choose. In connection with this case, see also the following cases wherein, as set out infra, joinder of parties in the alternative was held permissible in an equitable proceeding: Love v. Keowne; Skipwith v. Hurt; Alexander v. Mercer.

As is stated in CASEY PURE MILK Co. v. BOOTH FISHERIES Co., an exception to the general rule has been allowed where, by reason of some close relationship between defendants, or of some conduct on the part of defendants, it is impossible to determine where liability rests, joinder of the parties with an alternative allegation that the acts constituting liability were committed by one or the other being allowed in such case. This was the rule adopted in Braun & F. 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Co. v. Paulson, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 95 S. W. 617 (writ of error denied by the supreme court), wherein it was held that two corporations of the same name and controlled by the same persons, who had ordered goods from the plaintiff which were distributed between the two corporations, could be joined where plaintiff did not know which of the two was liable, by an allegation that one of the corporations had ordered all the goods, and in the alternative, that the other had done so, and recover the amount owed by each. In reaching this conclusion the court said: "The two corporations were controlled by the same individuals, and appellee, being uncertain in the name of which corporation the debt was made, was justified in alleging that the Arizona corporation had ordered all the fixtures and was liable for all of them, and in the alternative that the Texas concern had ordered all the fixtures and was liable for their value; and under those allegations the jury had the power to return a verdict against each for the amount it owed. In this case the two appellants are shown to have been in such close relations, and there is such privacy of interest in the subject-matter of the suit, and every fact in the suit bearing alike upon both of them, that appellee could not separate them and be put to the trouble and expense of two suits. There existed such privacy of relation and community of action between them that a common or alternative liability of all of them could be maintained. It was utterly impossible for appellee to ascertain which one of them was liable for the fixtures, and he had the right to join them in the suit."

And in Love v. Keowne, 58 Tex. 191, it was held in an action before a court whose jurisdiction was one of blended law and equity, against separate sets of sureties on an administrator's bonds, in which it was alleged that, because of the loss of the papers of the estate, it was impossible to determine the amounts converted by the administrator under the respective bonds, and in which the petition prayed that the amount for which each set of sureties was liable be ascertained, etc.,—that while the breach of each of the bonds doubtless constituted a cause of action against the makers of the several bonds ordinarily sepa-

mate question in the case will doubtless be whether the Fisheries Company did transfer the goods to the Produce Company, as it promised to do. Similar questions are liable to arise in any case where one person is directed to deliver goods to another, to pay money to another, or to carry on almost any form of business negotiation with a third party. Similar situations may often be presented in negligence cases, where one person is injured in the region of operation of two others.

Plaintiff's counsel states in his brief that he suggested to his adversaries that he amend his complaint so as to allege liability of both defendants. Had he asked this of the court on the hearing, his petition would doubtless have been granted. Harp v. Bull, 3 How. Pr. 45; Lord v. Hopkins, 30 Cal. 77; 31 Cyc. 396. But he did not do this. He saw fit to stand upon the complaint as originally framed. However, the defects in plaintiff's complaint relate to matters of form. Demurrers and appeals on this ground are not encouraged, and no costs will be allowed to the appellant.

rate and distinct, yet the relation of the two sets of sureties was such that they might be joined in the alternative in the one action not only for the protection of those interested in the estate, but also for the purpose of adjusting the equities existing among the sureties themselves. It was said: "If separate suits had been brought and a discovery sought in each, the proceedings, evidence, and judgment in the one would not have been binding upon the sureties in the other, and between the two, the plaintiffs may have failed to obtain the relief, if any, to which they may be entitled. In the suit as brought, all the parties in interest were before the court. The general subject-matter and object sought were the same; the plaintiffs claimed relief in the same general right, and the proceedings and decrees could have been adjusted to the respective rights and interests of all the parties to the suit, and would have been binding upon them."

So, in Skipwith v. Hurt, 94 Tex. 322, 60 S. W. 423, following Love v. Keowne, supra, an action upon the several bonds of a defaulting county treasurer, wherein it was alleged that it was difficult to determine during which of two terms the default occurred, it was held that in such case the facts were so blended and connected as to the rights of the county against the two sets of sureties that their joinder was proper.

And in Alexander v. Mercer, 7 Ga. 553, it was held that an insolvent administrator and his two sets of sureties, one of which succeeded the other, could be joined in an equitable action to discover the amount of the devastavit, and the time when it occurred, in order to determine which of the two sets of sureties was liable. The court, after holding that it was not essential to the action for judgment that it should have been first brought against the principal, discussed the propriety of proceeding against both sureties in the same action as follows: "Suppose the administrator de bonis non had filed his bill against the principal alone, as it is insisted he should have done, relying upon the discovery which he obtains, to establish both the amount of the devastavit and the time when it was committed, and it is located by the decree during the liability of the first securities. A 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

suit is then brought upon the bond to charge them with the recovery. Not having had their day in court before, they come in, and prove conclusively that the defalcation did not occur until after their discharge. Of course they are acquitted, and the complainant is remediless; for, by the terms of the decree, the second securities stand exonerated, and the complainant is estopped by it; and this is no improbable case, it would happen constantly. Even if the finding discharging the other set of securities could be got round in a suit against them, the very same result might follow; for different juries might, and frequently would, arrive at variant results, even upon the identical same evidence.

"Indeed, if this proceeding, bringing all the parties before the court, and ascertaining and fixing, not prima facie only, but permanently, the liability of the several sets of securities, cannot be supported, I should consider the rights of those interested in an estate greatly jeopardized, if not entirely destroyed; and this practice will not prejudice the securities."

In Love v. Keowne, Skipwith v. Hurt, and Alexander v. Mercer, supra, much stress was laid upon the fact that the action was equitable in its nature. But, in this connection, see Oglesby v. State, as set out supra.

Under statute.

In at least one jurisdiction the present question has been the subject of express statutory regulation.

Thus, in Rhode Island it has been expressly provided by statute (Gen. Laws, chap. 233, § 20; court and practice act 1905, § 240) that whenever in any action the plaintiff is in doubt as to the person from whom he is entitled to recover, he may join two or more defendants with the view of ascertaining which, if either, is liable, and may recover against such only as are liable. See Phenix Iron Foundry v. Lockwood, 21 R. I. 556, 45 Atl. 546; Haley v. Calef, 28 R. I. 332, 67 Atl. 323 (holding that when a traveler injured by a defective bridge did not know which of two towns was liable, he might properly join both towns as defendants); and Kilkenny v. Bockius, 187 Fed. 382, all of which either directly or indirectly construe the statute.

And see Taylor v. Lumb Knitting Co. — R. I. —, 70 Atl. 1008, wherein it was held in an action by an employee against his employer for injuries caused by the falling of an arc lamp that, upon its appearing that another than the defendant might be liable, such third party should be made a defendant by virtue of the provisions above set out, together with that portion of § 243 of the court and practice act of 1905 which authorizes the bringing in of new parties.

But statutes permitting averment of facts in the alternative do not permit the pleading of parties in the alternative with a definite averment of facts as to each. Thus, in Brown v. Illinois C. R. Co. 100 Ky. 525, 38 S. W. 862, in holding that an averment that loss was caused "by reason of the negligence of one or the other of the defendants or of both defendants and as to which plaintiffs are unable to say as to whether the one or the other or both but one of these alternatives is true" was insufficient as against either of the defendants under a statutory provision that "a party may allege alternatively the existence of one or another fact if he states that one of them is true, and that he does not know which of them is true," the court said: "The Code provides for averment of alternative facts. The facts thus averred in the alternative must be alleged of and concerning a definite party or parties. There is no effort in this pleading to allege alternative facts. The facts are definitely averred, but the party of whom they are alleged to be true is alleged in the alternative. Under the rule that a pleading is to be taken most strongly against the pleader, this averment of the petition is insufficient as against either of the appellees." And in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Ft. Wayne Electric Co. 108 Ky. 113, 55 S. W. 918, it was held that the statute set out in Brown v. Illinois C. R. Co., supra, did not authorize a consignor to allege that the defendant carrier had delivered a certain shipment of goods to the defendant consignees, with a prayer for judgment against them, and in another paragraph to allege that the defendant carrier had wrongfully delivered such goods to a person other than the consignees, with prayer for judgment against the carrier, and in a third paragraph alleged that the plaintiff did not know which of the allegations was true, the ground being, as in the Brown Case, that the statutory provision was not intended to relieve a plaintiff of the necessity of naming definitely and certainly the party sought to be held liable, and from stating a cause of action against him, which is not the case where the liability of two defendants is alleged alternatively.

Under rules of practice.

In some jurisdictions the rules of practice regulate the right to join parties in the alternative.

There is a rule to this effect in at least one state. See the Connecticut rules of 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

practice (chap. 1, § 3) as set out in 58 Conn. 561, 20 Atl. v. which provides that persons may be joined as defendants against whom the right to relief is alleged to exist in the alternative, although a right to relief against one may be inconsistent with a right to relief against the other.

And in England it has been expressly provided (order XVI., rules 3, 6, rules of supreme court 1875; order XVI., rules 4, 7, rules of supreme court 1883) that (rules 3, 4) all parties may be joined as defendants against whom the right to any relief is alleged to exist in the alternative that judgment may be given against such one or more of the defendants as may be found to be liable, according to their respective liabilities, without any amendment, and that (rules 6, 7), where the plaintiff is in doubt as to persons from whom he is entitled to redress, he may join two or more defendants to the intent that the question as to which, if any, of the defendants is liable, and to what extent, may be determined as between all parties.

Under these rules it has been held that a shipowner in an action against a broker for breach of warranty of the authority of a principal to charter a ship, upon discovering that possibly there was authority as warranted, may join the principal as a co-defendant, alleging liability for breach of contract to load the ship, in the alternative, notwithstanding the plaintiff's cause of action against the principal was different from that against the broker, it having arisen out of the same transaction. Bennetts v. McIlwraith [1896] 2 Q. B. 464, 75 L. T. N. S. 145, 8 Asp. Mar. L. Cas. 176, 65 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 632, 45 Week. Rep. 17. And in Massey v. Heynes, L. R. 21 Q. B. Div. 330, 57 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 521, 36 Week. Rep. 834, an action wherein damages were claimed against one defendant for breach of warranty of authority to effect a charter party, and in the alternative against the principal for breach of the charter party, was regarded as properly brought and the defendants as properly joined.

And it was held in Honduras Inter-Oceanic R. Co. v. LeFevre, L. R. 2 Exch. Div. 301, 46 L. J. Exch. N. S. 391, 36 L. T. N. S. 46, 25 Week. Rep. 310, that in an action against an alleged principal for failure to take debentures in plaintiff's company as contracted for, through an alleged agent whose authority the principal denied, and in the alternative against the agent for damages in case it should appear that he acted without authority from the other defendant, that the defendants were properly joined under rule 6 of order XVI. of 1875.

And in Sanderson v. Blyth Theatre Co. [1903] 2 K. B. 533, 72 L. J. K. B. N. S. 761, 52 Week. Rep. 33, 89 L. T. N. S. 159, 19 Times L. R. 660, it was held that the plaintiff in an action for work done and material supplied in constructing a building for defendant could, upon it appearing that the person who had ordered the work, etc., was not authorized to do so by the defendant, join such person as a codefendant, alleging in the alternative for damages for breach of warranty of authority should it be proved that he did not act so as to bind the original defendant as principal.

So it has been held that a lessee in an action to restrain other persons claiming a right of way over the leased land from further trespassing, and in the alternative asking damages against the lessor for breach of covenant of quiet enjoyment in the lease should it turn out that the first defendants were not trespassers, but had a right of way, could not be required to elect against which of the defendants he would proceed, but could proceed against both. Child v. Stenning, on demurrer, L. R. 5 Ch. Div. 695, 46 L. J. Ch. N. S. 523, 38 L. T. N. S. 426, 25 Week. Rep. 519, on trial, L. R. 7 Ch. Div. 413, 47 L. J. Ch. N. S. 371, 38 L. T. N. S. 232, 26 Week. Rep. 265, modified as to amount of damages in L. R. 11 Ch. Div. 82, 48 L. J. Ch. N. S. 392, 40 L. T. N. S. 302, 27 Week. Rep. 462.

But it has been held that these rules do not permit the joining of parties in the alternative where the claim discloses two separate and distinct causes of action, and must be limited to the joining of defendants where there is but one transaction. Thus, in Thompson v. London County Council [1899] 1 Q. B. 840, 68 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 625, 80 L. T. N. S. 512, 47 Week. Rep. 433, it was held that, in an action against defendants for negligently excavating near plaintiff's house, upon denial of liability upon the ground that the damage was caused by the negligence of a water company in allowing water to escape, the plaintiff could not join the water company as a codefendant, because the actions were upon separate torts which did not arise out of the same transaction. And see Lilly v. Tilling, 57 Sol. Jo. 59, where, as set out in the 1912 Continuation of Butterworth, Ten Year Digest, p. 537, it appears that, in an action for personal injuries caused by the upsetting of an omnibus, owing to a wheel being wrenched off by tram lines, the plaintiff claimed damages against the owner of the omnibus, and in the alternative against the owner of the tram lines.

The English rules above set out correspond with the Ontario Consolidated Rules 186 and 192.

These rules have, like the English rules, been held limited so as merely to authorize joinder of defendants where there is substantially one legal transaction having different aspects; or, in other words, that the rules do not authorize the joinder of parties in the alternative where the claim discloses distinct and separate causes of action. This limitation was expressly adopted in Quigley v. Waterloo Mfg. Co. 1 Ont. L. Rep. 606, where it was held that the purchaser of a machine could not join the vendors, alleging a breach of warranty of title, with a third party who had seized the machine upon a lien alleged to be paramount to the plaintiff's title, and against whom relief for conversion was alleged in 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

the alternative, the ground being that the causes of action were entirely separate, and therefore not within the intent of the statute. And the same conclusion was reached upon similar reasoning in Chandler v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 5 Ont. L. Rep. 589, it being held that an action could not be brought against a carrier for destruction by fire of a machine after its arrival at the point for delivery to the purchaser, and in the alternative against the purchaser for the purchase price, if there had been delivery, actual or constructive, so as to pass title to the consignee.

Illustrative of those cases wherein a joinder of parties in the alternative will be allowed is the case of Madgett v. White, 10 Ont. Week. Rep. 787, wherein it was held that an action could be maintained against an alleged principal joined in the alternative with an alleged agent whose authority the alleged principal denied. And see O'Meara v. Ottawa Electric Co. 10 Ont. Week. Rep. 1068, wherein the court dismissed a motion to require plaintiff to elect against which party he would proceed in an action for damages for injuries alleged to have been caused both by the joint negligence of two defendants and, in the alternative, by either one or the other, but in which the decision seems to have been based upon the possibility that there might have been a joint liability. See also Castle v. Chaput, 2 Ont. Week. Rep. 499, wherein joinder of the parties in the alternative was allowed.

And similar rules of practice seem to be in force in British Columbia. At least, the cases of Bennetts v. McIlwraith, supra, was followed in Bradley v. Yorkshire Guarantee & Securities Corp. 13 B. C. 68, wherein, in an action against a corporation for rectification of a contract for the sale of land, alleged to have been entered into with the corporation through defendant's agent, which agency was denied by the corporation, it was held that the plaintiff had a right to make the agent a party defendant, and to set up a claim against him in the alternative for damages for breach of warranty of authority should the defendant corporation succeed in proving that he was not a properly authorized agent.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

RE ESTATE OF GEORGE MOTZ. Deceased.

ELLA WHITBY, Appt.,

v.

MARY MOTZ, Respnt.

(125 Minn. 40, 145 N. W. 623.)

Evidence — of intent to pretermitt child.
1. Under § 7260, Gen. Stat. 1913, which provides that if a parent omit to provide for a child in his will, such child shall take the same share of the estate which he would have taken if such parent had died intestate, "unless it appears that such omission was intentional," parol testimony is admissible to show that such omission was intentional.

Same — burden of proof.

2. The burden is upon those claiming that such omission was intentional to prove such fact.

Same — sufficiency.

3. The evidence in this case raised a question of fact as to whether her father intentionally omitted to provide for appellant, and is sufficient to sustain the finding of the trial court.

(February 20, 1914.)

APPEAL by applicant from an order of the District Court for Wabasha County affirming a judgment of the Probate Court rejecting her claim to a share in the property of George Motz, deceased, and assigning it in accordance with the terms of the will. Affirmed.

Note. — Admissibility of extrinsic evidence as to whether omission of child from will was intentional.

For an earlier note upon this subject, but limited to cases involving disinheritance of after-born children only, see 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 781. "Child" as here used includes any child with respect to whom the testator's intention may be material, including in some cases the descendants of deceased children.

Statutes which apply expressly to children unintentionally omitted, and provide that they shall take as in case of intestacy, are held, by the weight of authority, to refer to the intention of the testator irrespective of the sufficiency of its expression in the will, and consequently permit the consideration of all evidence appropriate to the proof of intention as an independent fact (Wilson v. Fosket, 6 Met. 400, 39 Am. Dec. 736; Lorieux v. Keller, 5 Iowa, 196, 68 Am. Dec. 696), whether it be extrinsic evidence of surrounding circumstances (Buckley v. Gerard, 123 Mass. 8; Re Stebbins, 94 Mich. 304, 34 Am. St. Rep. 345, 54 N. W. 159; Leonard v. Enochs, 92 Ky. 186, 17 S. W. 437, but under slightly different statute), or evidence of declarations and statements of the testator at about the time of making the will (Whittemore v. Russell, 80 Me. 297, 6 Am. St. Rep. 200, 14 Atl. 197; Converse v. Wales, 4 Allen, 512; Ramsdill v. Wentworth, 101 Mass. 125, subsequent appeal 106 Mass. 320; Brown v. Brown, 71 Neb. 200, 115 Am. St. Rep. 568, 98 N. W. 718, 8 Ann. Cas. 632, subsequent appeal 77 Neb. 125, 108 N. W. 180; Schultz v. Schultz, 19 N. D. 688, 125 N. W. 555; Re O'Connor, 21 R. I. 465, 79 Am. St. Rep. 814, 44 Atl. 591; Re Atwood, 14 Utah, 1, 60 Am. St. 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Mr. A. J. Rockne, for appellant:

The burden of proof is upon those opposing the application of a pretermitted child, to show that the child was intentionally omitted.

Thomas v. Black, 113 Mo. 66, 20 S. W. 657; Bradley v. Bradley, 24 Mo. 311; Pounds v. Dale, 48 Mo. 270; Wetherall v. Harris, 51 Mo. 65; Tucker v. Boston, 18 Pick. 162; Merrill v. Sanborn, 2 N. H. 499; Rupp v. Eberly, 79 Pa. 141.

Extraneous evidence is inadmissible.

Re Garraud, 35 Cal. 336; Re Salmon, 107 Cal. 614, 48 Am. St. Rep. 164, 40 Pac. 1030; Rhoton v. Blevin, 99 Cal. 645, 34 Pac. 513; Re Stevens, 83 Cal. 322, 17 Am. St. Rep. 252, 23 Pac. 379; Burns v. Allen, 93 Tenn. 149, 23 S. W. 111; Boman v. Boman, 1 C. C. A. 274, 7 U. S. App. 63, 49 Fed. 329; Chace v. Chace, 6 R. I. 407, 78 Am. Dec. 446; Thomas v. Black, 113 Mo. 66, 20 S. W. 657; Hill v. Hill, 7 Wash. 409, 35 Pac. 360.

Rep. 878, 45 Pac. 1036; Loring v. Marsh, 6 Wall. 337, 18 L. ed. 802, affirming 2 Cliff. 469, Fed. Cas. No. 8,515).

The rule has been applied to the admission of statements of the testator to the scrivener (Goff v. Britton, 182 Mass. 293, 65 N. E. 379; Moon v. Evans, 69 Wis. 667, 35 N. W. 20), and to the admission of drafts of earlier wills in the handwriting of the testator (Coulam v. Doull, 133 U. S. 216, 33 L. ed. 596, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 253, affirming 4 Utah, 267, 9 Pac. 568).

Where the form of the statute is that an omitted child shall take as in case of intestacy, "unless it shall appear that such omission was intentional," it is argued that a presumption arises "contrary to the intent which the language of the will expresses,"—which presumption is rebuttable by direct evidence of intention. Hedderich v. Hedderich, 18 N. D. 499, 123 N. W. 276; Re Atwood, 14 Utah, 1, 60 Am. St. Rep. 878, 45 Pac. 1036; Coulam v. Doull, 133 U. S. 216, 33 L. ed. 596, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 253.

But this argument would not apply where the statute provides that the child shall take as in case of intestacy, where it has been omitted "and" it appears that the omission was not intentional, or where it is "not provided for, nor expressly excluded, but only pretermitted;" in either of which events, extrinsic evidence has been considered, both to show the omission was unintentional (Re Stebbins, 94 Mich. 304, 34 Am. St. Rep. 345, 54 N. W. 159 where the will contained a reference to the child, Newman v. Waterman, 63 Wis. 612, 53 Am. Rep. 310, 23 N. W. 696), and to show that the omission was intentional (Leonard v. Enochs, 92 Ky. 186, 17 S. W. 437; Brown v. Brown, 77 Neb. 125, 108 N. W. 180; Moon v. Evans, 69 Wis. 667, 35 N. W. 20).

Mr. Michael Marx, for respondent:

Extraneous evidence or testimony dehors the will is admissible.

Taylor, C., filed the following opinion:

George Motz and the mother of appellant were married in 1885, and lived together as husband and wife until 1891, when they separated. Appellant was born a few months after the separation and is their only child. Subsequently Motz obtained a divorce on the ground of desertion, and, on September 14, 1897, married the respondent, Mary Motz, with whom he lived until his death, on August 9, 1911. He left a will by which he gave the respondent all his property except one horse. Appellant was not mentioned or referred to in the will. After it had been admitted to probate, appellant made an application to the probate court for a share of the property on the ground that she was a pretermitted child, and as such entitled thereto under the statutes making provision for pretermitted children.

The probate court rejected her claim and entered a final decree assigning the property in accordance with the terms of the will. She appealed therefrom to the district court, where, after a trial de novo, the judgment of the probate court was affirmed. A further appeal brings the case before this court.

From the parol testimony offered by respondent and received in evidence by the court, the court found as a fact, "that said omission to provide for appellant in said last will and testament, or to men-

It may be remarked that without some extrinsic data questions concerning the omission of children from a will would not arise at all. As often observed, "the court has not only to construe the will as a piece of English; it has also to apply it to the existing facts" (Theobald, Wills, 7th ed. p. 127), and it is in pursuit of the latter function that it discovers the existence of children not provided for. It has sometimes been thought, therefore, that there is here an analogy to the rule with respect to admitting extrinsic evidence to resolve latent ambiguities (Coulam v. Doull, 133 U. S. 216, 33 L. ed. 596, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 253).

But the sound basis for the rule is that the claim of an omitted child does not arise out of the will, but out of the statute; and the principles applicable to the admission and exclusion of extrinsic evidence are therefore not relevant to the situation at all. Whittemore v. Russell, 80 Me. 297, 6 Am. St. Rep. 200, 14 Atl. 197; Wilson v. Fosket, 6 Met. 400, 39 Am. Dec. 736; Ramsdill v. Wentworth, 101 Mass. 125; Re O'Connor, 21 R. I. 465, 79 Am. St. Rep. 814, 44 Atl. 591.

And the statutory foundation for the claim is only emphasized by the remark of the court in Brown v. Brown, 71 Neb. 200, 115 Am. St. Rep. 568, 98 N. W. 718, 8 Ann. Cas. 632, supra, that it is difficult to reconcile the finding that a child was unintentionally omitted, with the rule which requires courts to give effect to the intentions of the testator, for "when such fact is once established, what his intentions actually were becomes a matter of conjecture, because, had he made provision in the will for the pretermitted child, such provision of necessity would have resulted in 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) a modification of the provisions made for the objects of his bounty."

By a rather unusual decision, the rule has become established in California that omitted children always take as in case of intestacy, unless the testator has expressed in the will his intention to exclude them. This carries the rule of excluding extrinsic evidence to the absurd length of making it the means of disestablishing, as remarked in Brown v. Brown, supra, the very arrangements it was intended to protect.

The case referred to is Re Garraud, 35 Cal. 336. The court looked at the sections of the statute surrounding the one involved, and found that, as in RE MOTZ, the clauses of the former were worded, "unless it appear from the will." They concluded from this that, notwithstanding the particular section in question differed, in that it omitted a reference to the will, the statute on the whole evinced a policy of requiring the intention of the testator to be proved by the will. On the other hand, they held that Wilson v. Fosket, 6 Met. 400, 39 Am. Dec. 736, was not a precedent, for the reason that the California statute was worded so that it applied where it appeared the omission was not intentional, while the Massachusetts statute differed in that it added the clause, "and not occasioned by any mistake or accident." This reasoning has been questioned, and certainly seems questionable, but it has been consistently adhered to. Re Stevens, 83 Cal. 322, 17 Am. St. Rep. 252, 23 Pac. 379; Rhoton v. Blevin, 99 Cal. 645, 34 Pac. 513; Re Salmon, 107 Cal. 614, 48 Am. St. Rep. 164, 40 Pac. 1030; and see also Re Callaghan, 119 Cal. 571, 39 L.R.A. 689, 51 Pac. 860 (where it was sought to show that through a mistake of the testator a devise failed of its purpose).

tion her name therein, was intentional, and not occasioned by accident or mistake."

Appellant insists: (1) That such parol testimony was not admissible, and that the question as to whether she was intentionally omitted must be determined solely from the will itself. (2) That the evidence is not sufficient to sustain the above finding, even if such parol testimony were admissible.

1. The legislation making provision for omitted children appears to have originated in Massachusetts, and Minnesota appears to have taken her original statutes on the subject from Wisconsin. They appear in the Revised Statutes of 1851, and, with an unimportant change in verbiage, in the General Statutes of 1866; and consist of two sections which, in the revision of 1866, read as follows:

"When any child is born after the making of his parent's will, and no provision is made therein for him, such child shall have the same share in the estate of the testator, as if he had died intestate, and the share of such child shall be assigned to him, as provided by law in case of intestate estates, unless it is apparent from the will that it was the intention of the testator that no provision should be made for such child." Gen. Stat. 1866, chap. 47, § 22.

Even under statutes applying universally to after born children, or to children not named or provided for, and requiring that they shall take as in case of intestacy, it is usually held that the intention to cut off without a portion, if properly expressed in the will, may be given effect. But extrinsic proof of the fact that the testator desired to leave such children unprovided for is not admissible. Gay v. Gay, 84 Ala. 47, 4 So. 45, per Somerville, J.; Bradley v. Bradley, 24 Mo. 311; Thomas v. Black, 113 Mo. 66, 20 S. W. 657; Flanner v. Flanner, 160 N. C. 126, 75 S. E. 936 (obiter); Bower v. Bower, 5 Wash. 225, 31 Pac. 598; Hill v. Hill, 7 Wash. 409, 35 Pac. 360; Morrison v. Morrison, 25 Wash. 466, 65 Pac. 779; Boman v. Boman, 1 C. C. A. 274, 7 U. S. App. 63, 49 Fed. 329; Knut v. Knut, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 972, 58 S. W. 583.

The same rule applies at common law and under early statutes, in so far as the intention to leave children unprovided for was involved in the question of disherison (Graham v. Graham, 23 W. Va. 36, 48 Am. Rep. 364; Wilkins v. Allen, 18 How. 385, 15 L. ed. 396; Gifford v. Dyer, 2 R. I. 99, 57 Am. Dec. 708; but see Re McMillen, 12 N. M. 31, 71 Pac. 1083); and so far as it was material in connection with the revocation of a will by birth of issue (Alden v. Johnson, 63 Iowa, 124, 18 N. W. 696). The latter case, of course, refers to the intention of the testator when making the will. The argument against permitting proof of

"When any testator omits to provide in his will for any of his children, or for the issue of any deceased child, and it appears that such omission was not intentional, but was made by mistake or accident, such child, or the issue of such child, shall have the same share in the estate of the testator, as if he had died intestate, to be assigned as provided in the preceding section." Gen. Stat. 1866, chap. 47, § 23.

Under § 22 a child born after the making of the will cannot be disinherited unless the will itself shows that such was the intention of the parent. In the cases governed by § 23 there was no restriction as to the evidence by which the omitted child or grandchild may show that such omission was unintentional. There are obvious reasons why the questions arising under this section should not be determined solely from an inspection of the will itself. This section casts upon the omitted child or grandchild the burden of showing that such omission was not intentional. Such fact would seldom appear from the will itself. As said in Case v. Young, 3 Minn. 209, Gil. 140, among the cases which the legislature had in mind in enacting this statute are those in which the child was omitted under the belief that he was dead, and those in which the grandchildren were a subsequent intention is quite different. Compare Marston v. Roe, 8 L. J. Exch. N. S. 293, 8 Ad. & El. 14, 2 Nev. & P. 504, and Hill v. Hill, 7 Wash. 409, 35 Pac. 360.

Wigram's distinction, Extrinsic Evidence on Wills, ¶ 10, "between evidence which is ancillary only to a right understanding of the words to which it is applied, and which is therefore simply explanatory of the words themselves,—and evidence which is applied to prove intention itself as an independent fact," is applicable, however, in determining whether or not the intention to omit a child has been expressed; and for the purpose of showing that a bequest to another is such an allusion to the omitted one as to indicate that he or she was present in the mind of the testator, when omitted, extrinsic evidence of their relationship has been received. Hockensmith v. Slusher, 26 Mo. 237 (where it was shown that the legatee was the omitted daughter's husband).

But in jurisdictions where, as a matter of statutory interpretation, it is held that mere allusion or reference by suggestion like the above is not a sufficient expression of the intention to exclude (see Re Barker, 5 Wash. 390, 31 Pac. 976), the motive of the legacy, in accordance with the general rule, cannot be more fully explained by evidence of the testator's declarations. Bowers v. Bower, 5 Wash. 225, 31 Pac. 598, supra. This situation must be distinguished from that in Hockensmith v. Slusher, supra.

omitted because the testator was ignorant of their existence. Children and grandchildren not referred to for these reasons would be absolutely barred were evidence dehors the will excluded. That parol testimony is admissible under such a statute is implied in Case v. Young, supra, and has been directly decided in Wisconsin, from which our statute was derived, and in Michigan and Nebraska. Moon v. Evans, 69 Wis. 667, 35 N. W. 20; Re Stebbins, 94 Mich. 304, 34 Am. St. Rep. 345, 54 N. W. 159; Brown v. Brown, 71 Neb. 200, 115 Am. St. Rep. 568, 98 N. W. 718, 8 Ann. Cas. 632.

In the Revised Laws of 1905 our statutes were changed so as to read as follows:

"If any child of a testator, born after the death of such testator, has no provision made for him by his father in his will or otherwise, he shall take the same share of his father's estate that he would have taken if the father had died intestate." Rev. Laws 1905, § 3668; Gen. Stat. 1913, § 7259.

"If a testator omits to provide in his will for any of his children or the issue of a deceased child, they shall take the same share of his estate which they would have taken if he had died intestate, unless it appears that such omission was intentional, and not occasioned by accident or mistake." Rev. Laws, 1905, § 3669; Gen. Stat. 1913, § 7260.

While perhaps not material here, certain substantial changes made in the first section by the revision of 1905 may be noted. That section no longer applies to children born after the making of the will and before the death of the testator, but only to posthumous children. The power to disinherit a posthumous child entirely is taken away, and the right of such child to inherit is absolute unless the father has made provision for it, "in his will or otherwise." If provision has been made for such child otherwise than by will, the statute contains no restriction as to the manner in which that fact may be shown.

The second section is so changed that the right of a pretermitted child to inherit is absolute, "unless it appears that such omission was intentional, and not occasioned by accident or mistake." Under the original statute the burden was upon the omitted child to show that such omission was unintentional. Under the present statute, when it appears that a child has been omitted, the burden is upon those who claim that such omission was intentional, to establish that fact. The statute contains no restriction as to the manner in which such fact may be shown. Appellant, however, insists that the statute should be construed as if it provided that an omitted child should inherit, "unless it appears from the will that such omission was intentional." In other words that the court, in effect, should interpolate the words italicized. It is difficult and frequently impossible to prove the intention of the testator. The legislature has shifted the burden of doing this from the child to the adverse party. If it had intended to go further and to limit the evidence upon the question to the will itself, it would, doubtless, have used appropriate language to express that intention.

Other courts, in construing statutes substantially the same as our present statute, hold that parol evidence is admissible for the purpose of showing that such child was intentionally omitted. Coulam v. Doull, 133 U. S. 216, 33 L. ed. 596, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 253; Wilson v. Fosket, 6 Met. 400, 39 Am. Dec. 736; Converse v. Wales, 4 Allen, 512; Ramsdill v. Wentworth, 101 Mass. 125; Lorieux v. Keller, 5 Iowa, 196, 68 Am. Dec. 696; Whittemore v. Russell, 80 Me. 297, 6 Am. St. Rep. 200, 14 Atl. 197; Re Atwood, 14 Utah, 1, 60 Am. St. Rep. 878, 45 Pac. 1036; Schultz v. Schultz, 19 N. D. 688, 125 N. W. 555.

The only court cited by appellant which excludes parol testimony under a similar statute is the supreme court of California. In Re Garraud, 35 Cal. 336, the California court attempted to make a distinction between the statute of that state and the statute of Massachusetts, and as a result of that distinction declined to follow the Massachusetts rule, and held that parol evidence was not admissible. This decision has been followed in the subsequent cases in that state. Re Stevens, 83 Cal. 322, 17 Am. St. Rep. 252, 23 Pac. 379; Rhoton v. Blevin, 99 Cal. 645, 34 Pac. 513; Re Salmon, 107 Cal. 614, 48 Am. St. Rep. 164, 40 Pac. 1030. In Coulam v. Doull, supra, the Supreme Court of the United States, in construing the statute of Utah copied from that of California, criticized and declined to follow the California rule, and followed that adopted by Massachusetts, where the statute originated.

As authority for the proposition that parol evidence is not admissible, appellant also cites decisions of the courts of Missouri, New Hampshire, Oregon, Rhode Island, Tennessee, and Washington. These courts hold that parol evidence is not admissible under the statutes of those states. But those statutes do not contain the provision here in question, and are so materially different from our own statute that decisions construing them are not in point.

As the legislature, without indicating any intention to exclude parol evidence, changed our statute to its present form after the great weight of authority had determined that such evidence was admissible under similar statutes, the court cannot read into the statute the restriction urged by appellant, and it follows that the ruling of the trial court was correct.

2. The trial court found from the evidence that the failure to make any provision for the appellant was intentional on the part of the testator, and not occasioned by accident or mistake. It is not necessary to discuss the testimony in detail, and we will merely say that it tended to show that the testator believed that the appellant was a spurious child, and not his own, and that they had never communicated with or seen each other. The evidence clearly raised a question of fact, and is sufficient to sustain the finding of the trial court.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

HERMAN KRAHN, Reapt.,
v.
J. L. OWENS COMPANY, Appt.
(125 Minn. 33, 145 N. W. 626.)

Sale — dangerous machine.

1. Defendant manufactures bean and pea threshers. It sold an outfit to a firm of threshermen who engaged to thresh for plaintiff, a farmer. Plaintiff, after cleaning up about the machine got on top of the separator to throw the remnants into the feeder. While so engaged a board broke, and his foot caught in the cylinder.

Same — liability of manufacturer.

2. One who manufactures and sells an article not ordinarily of a dangerous nature, which is calculated for use by others than the vendee, may be liable to a person not the vendee, who uses the article in the usual course of business, for injuries due to defects which render the use of the article dangerous to life or limb.

The conditions necessary to a recovery, as applied to this case, are: That the board was so defective as to be dangerous to life and limb; that defendant knew of the defect when it sold the machine, or at least ought to have known it; that the defect was the proximate cause of the injury; that the defect was concealed to such an extent that ordinary observation on the part of plaintiff would not discover it; that the board was intended for the purpose for which it was being used; and that plaintiff was one of the class of persons by whom it was contemplated the article would be used.

Appeal — evidence of custom.

3. The question whether sufficient foundation has been laid to enable a witness to testify as to a custom is a matter which the trial judge must, in the exercise of a sound discretion, pass upon as a question of fact, and his decision ought not to be reversed except in a very clear and strong case.

Trial — instructions — credibility of witnesses.

4. The trial court properly refused to single out particular witnesses, and to charge particularly as to matters bearing upon their credibility. Other rulings upon requests to charge present no reversible error.

Damages — excess.

5. The damages are excessive.

(February 20, 1914.)

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the District Court for Hennepin County denying its motion for judgment notwithstanding a verdict in plaintiff's favor, in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries for which defendant was alleged to be responsible. Affirmed on condition.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Lind, Ueland, & Jerome, for appellant:

A local custom could not bind defendant unless it had knowledge thereof prior to the sale of the machine to Murphy & Hughes, and at the time of sale had in view such custom, so that it could be charged with knowledge of the manner in which the machine would probably be used.

Defendant would not be liable in case the defect was not concealed, or in case it was known to the owners of the machine.

Hallam, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. Defendant manufactures self-feeding bean and pea threshers. On August 8, 1910, it sold one of its outfits to Murphy & Hughes, in Wisconsin. The separator of this thresher looks much like the separator of an ordinary grain thresher, and operates upon similar principles. It is fed at the front. The feed table stands 4 feet 7 inches from the ground. Just back of the feed table is a raised hood or cap. Within this are two knife cylinders with interlocking knives. Just back of this hood or cap, and directly above the rear part of the cylinder, is a removable board, 9 inches wide, extending across the machine, resting upon bearings at the ends, and held in place by a cleat at each end. The board is removable to permit of access to the cylinders when they become clogged. The top of this board is painted red, the bottom is unpainted. Plaintiff is a Wisconsin farmer. On September 2, 1910, he engaged Murphy & Hughes to thresh peas on his farm. As the job was about finished the crew gathered up the loose remnants about the machine and put them in bags. Plaintiff climbed on top of the machine to empty these bags into the feeder, standing as he did so upon the removable board, and reaching over the hood or cap. While so engaged this board broke, his left foot came into contact with the knives and amputation became necessary. Plaintiff had a verdict for $15,000.

2. There was no contractual relation between plaintiff and defendant. But it is well settled that there may be liability for personal injury independent of any contractual relation. A duty with respect to instrumentalities delivered under contract may exist towards others than the contracting parties. One who manufactures and sells an article not ordinarily of a dangerous nature, which is calculated for use by others than the vendee, may be liable to a person not the vendee, who uses it in the usual course of business, for injuries due to defects which render the use of the article dangerous to life or limb. Schubert v. J. R. Clark Co. 49 Minn. 331, 15 L.R.A. 818, 32 Am. St. Rep. 559, 51 N. W. 1103; O'Brien v. American Bridge Co. 110 Minn. 364, 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 980, 136 Am. St. Rep. 503, 125 N. W. 1012.

The conditions necessary to a recovery, as applied to this case, are as follows:

It must appear that the board was so defective as to be dangerous to life or limb. There was ample proof that it was defective. Several of defendant's witnesses admitted it. One portion of the broken board, the longer end, was exhibited to the jury and to this court. The board was cross-grained and unfit for use in any place where it was required to bear a man's weight. Its position, over a knife cylinder, was such that the consequence of a man's breaking through was necessarily extremely dangerous.

It must appear that the defendant knew of these defects when it sold the separator, or at least that it ought to have known of it. Many cases hold that actual knowledge is necessary, and that the action is in effect one sounding in deceit, and not in negligence. Heizer v. Kingsland & D. Mfg. Co. 110 Mo. 605, 15 L.R.A. 821, 33 Am. St. Rep. 482, 19 S. W. 630; Bragdon v. Perkins-Campbell Co. 66 L.R.A. 924, 30 C. C. A. 567, 58 U. S. App. 91, 87 Fed. 109, 5 Am. Neg. Rep. 277; Curtin v. Somerset, 140 Pa. 70, 12 L.R.A. 322, 23 Am. St. Rep. 220, 21 Atl. 244; Kuelling v. Roderick Lean Mfg. Co. 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 303, and note (183 N. Y. 78, 111 Am. St. Rep. 691, 75 N. E. 1098, 5 Ann. Cas. 124, 19 Am. Neg. Rep. 407); 1 Thomp. Neg. § 827. Others hold that mere negligence is sufficient. Watson v. Augusta Brewing Co. 124 Ga. 121, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1178, 110 Am. St. Rep. 157, 52 S. E. 152, 19 Am. Neg. Rep. 107; Clement v. Crosby & Co. 148 Mich. 293, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 588, 12 Ann. Cas. 265, 111 N. W. 745; Hasbrouck v. Armour & Co. 139 Wis. 357, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 876, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

121 N. W. 157, 21 Am. Neg. Rep. 430; 1 Thomp. Neg. § 828. It is not necessary in this case to determine whether anything short of actual knowledge on the part of defendant will furnish a basis of liability, for the jury found in answer to a special question, that defendant did know of the defect at the time of the sale. This finding is amply sustained by the proof. Every board that went into the machine was closely inspected by defendant before it was used. The defect in this board was so obvious that an inspection could not fail to discover it.

It must appear that the breach of duty on the part of defendant was the proximate cause of the accident. Defendant contends that Murphy & Hughes, to whom the separator was sold, had knowledge of the defect before the accident, and that this knowledge on their part made the negligence their own, and broke the sequence of events necessary to make the negligence of the defendant the proximate cause. The jury found that Murphy & Hughes had no such knowledge. This finding is sustained by the evidence. Both Murphy and Hughes so testified. There is no direct evidence to the contrary. This board was very frequently taken up and had they examined the under side they would have observed the defect. But they were under no duty to examine it. The circumstances disclosed by the evidence do not compel a finding that Murphy & Hughes knew of the defect. We do not wish to be understood as holding that knowledge on the part of Murphy & Hughes would relieve defendant from liability. Some cases so hold. Griffin v. Jackson Light & P. Co. 128 Mich. 653, 55 L.R.A. 318, 92 Am. St. Rep. 496, 87 N. W. 888. Others hold to the contrary. See Waters-Pierce Oil Co. v. Deselms, 212 U. S. 159, 179, 53 L. ed. 463, 463, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 270, and cases cited. That question is not involved here, and we do not decide it. It is claimed that the board was not in its proper position, and that this, and not the defect in the board, caused it to break. The jury found that the board was in place. The evidence sustains this finding. The only direct evidence is to this effect. Defendant contends that the appearance of the remnants of the board, together with other circumstances, compels the inference that the board was out of place and that it slipped into the cylinder before it broke. We have examined the evidence with care and are unable to arrive at that conclusion.

It must appear that the defect was concealed to such an extent that ordinary observation on the part of plaintiff would not discover it. Schubert v. J. R. Clark

Co. 49 Minn. 331, 15 L.R.A. 818, 32 Am. St. Rep. 559, 51 N. W. 1103. This defect was concealed by paint so that a careful examination of it from the outside would not disclose it. Only by turning the board over could the defect be seen. To all intents and purposes it was a concealed defect.

It must appear that the board was intended for the purpose for which it was being used. The evidence is quite decisive that men necessarily stand and walk on top of these separators when not in operation, in driving from place to place, and in cleaning out the cylinders. There is also ample evidence that one of the operators of the thresher was necessarily often on top of the machine when it was in operation, going upon every part of the top from end to end, adjusting belts, oiling the bearings, and watching the work of the men. This, however, is not enough.

It must appear that plaintiff was one of the class of persons by whom defendant contemplated the board would be used. Otherwise defendant would owe him no duty. Negligence presupposes a duty to exercise care toward the person complaining. If defendant owed plaintiff no duty of care, there was no negligence of which plaintiff could complain. O'Brien v. American Bridge Co. 110 Minn. 364, 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 980, 136 Am. St. Rep. 503, 125 N. W. 1012. We are of the opinion that the evidence amply shows that the work that plaintiff was doing brought him within the class of persons by whom it was contemplated this board would be used. The process of cleaning up was necessary. The loose stuff so cleaned up could not be pitched into the feeder with a fork. It was necessary to use bags or baskets. The feeder was too high to make it convenient to empty bags or baskets into it from the ground. It is claimed that they could be emptied into a repeat elevator which catches the unthreshed pods that go over the sieve and carries them back to the cylinder again. Plaintiff's witnesses, however, testify that this is not practicable. There is also evidence that the manner in which plaintiff was doing this work was customary in the operation of such machines, and that the custom was so common that defendant's knowledge of it may be presumed. The jury might fairly find that plaintiff was doing a necessary part of the work in a reasonable, practicable, and customary way, and that he was one of the class of persons by whom it was contemplated the board should be used.

We are of the opinion that, by reason of the foregoing facts, the question of defendant's liability to plaintiff was one for the jury to determine.

3. Defendant assigns some errors in law. The court permitted plaintiff to give evidence that he was following a customary method of work at the time he was injured. This is assigned as error, the alleged ground of error being that plaintiff had not shown sufficient knowledge of the method of operation of a bean and pea thresher to render him competent to testify on this subject. Plaintiff had never worked about a bean and pea thresher before. He had, however, worked for years about a grain thresher. We do not regard the admission of this evidence as reversible error. The qualification of the witness to testify in such a case is a matter which the trial judge must, in the exercise of a sound discretion, pass upon as a matter of fact, and his decision ought not to be reversed except in a very clear and strong case. Stevens v. Minneapolis, 42 Minn. 130, 43 N. W. 842; Meyers v. McAllister, 94 Minn. 510, 103 N. W. 564. In view of the similarity between grain threshers and bean and pea threshers, we do not consider that the court abused its discretion in receiving plaintiff's testimony.

4. Defendant requested the court to charge the jury that in determining the weight to be given to the testimony of Murphy & Hughes, it was proper to take into consideration their interest in the outcome, and more specifically that an admission by them of their knowledge of the defective condition of the board might render themselves liable to plaintiff for his injuries. The court refused this request, but charged fully and correctly as to the credibility of the witnesses generally, and as to the consideration to be given to their interest in the outcome of the case. This was sufficient. The practice of singling out a particular witness and charging specifically as to his interest in the case has often been disapproved by this court, on the ground that it gives undue prominence to his testimony and tends to discredit it. The request to charge was properly refused. Harriott v. Holmes, 77 Minn. 245, 79 N. W. 1003; Kerling v. G. W. Van Dusen & Co. 109 Minn. 481, 124 N. W. 235, 372.

Defendant assigns as error the refusal of the court to give its request to instruct the jury that, if plaintiff was not one of the class of persons who were contemplated as likely to go upon the separator when in operation, he could not recover. The request was proper enough, but the court fully covered the subject by the instructions in fact given.

5. We are constrained to hold that the damages are excessive. In view of the age of plaintiff, forty-eight years old, we have decided, with some hesitation, that a new trial should be granted, unless plaintiff shall, within twenty days after filing of a remittitur, consent to a reduction of the amount of the verdict to $12,000. In all other particulars the order appealed from is affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied.

Introduction and scope.

Generally, as to the effect upon surety of judgment against principal, see note to P. Ballantine & Sons v. Fenn, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 698.

As to compromise or consent to affirmance as affecting liability of surety upon appeal bond, see note to First Nat. Bank v. C. E. Stevens Land Co. 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1040.

As to amendment of claim or pleading as discharge of sureties on bonds given to dissolve attachments or on bail bonds in civil actions, see note to Com. v. A. B. Baxter & Co. 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 484.

The present note is intended to deal only with the question of the liability of parties whose primary undertaking was that of surety, and not that of principal in the bond. Therefore, cases like Lewis v. Maulden, 93 Ga. 758, 21 S. E. 147, holding the principals in an appeal bond are sureties for each other, and that judgment may be entered against all of such principals, though the verdict is against a part only, are not in point in this note.

But in Landa v. Moody, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 57 S. W. 51, it was held that parties who sign an appeal bond as principals cannot be held liable thereunder for the amount of the judgment affirmed against their co-principals, when as to them the judgment on appeal is in their favor, as they are bound not as sureties, but as principals. 61 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Same — construction.

2. The redelivery undertaking in claim and delivery must be construed with reference to the intent of the legislature in providing for it, and the purpose for which it is given.

Bond — replevin — dismissal as to one principal — effect.

3. An action in claim and delivery was brought against two defendants; they furnished a statutory redelivery undertaking, which recited that the defendants were desirous of having the property to which the action related returned to them. They each signed the undertaking. H. and F. at their request executed such undertaking as sureties. At the conclusion of the taking of the evidence on the trial, counsel for the two defendants moved a dismissal as to one defendant. This was not resisted by the plaintiffs; the record indicates that it was assented to; a verdict was rendered and judgment entered in favor of the plaintiffs, and against the other defendant; held, that the dismissal of the one defendant did not release the sureties from liability upon the undertaking.

Replevin — judgment — inability to return property.

4. Where, on the record of the trial of an action in claim and delivery, it appears that the property which is the subject of the action cannot be returned, judgment

Cases like Blair v. Sanborn, 82 Tex. 686, 18 S. W. 159, and Ovington v. Smith, 78 Ill. 250, in which the judgment is in favor of one obligee in the bond and against another, but in which the effect of the judgment is the same as to all the principals in the undertaking, are not within the scope of this note. Neither are cases like Bryan v. Simonton, 8 N. C. (1 Hawks) 51, in which one or more of the principals in the bond taken in a judicial proceeding are released by the obligee after a judgment against all, within its scope.

As a rule, statutes have been enacted in the different jurisdictions prescribing, in effect at least, what shall be the condition of the bonds taken in the various judicial proceedings in which such undertakings are common. The purpose of all these enactments being practically the same, namely, the protection of the obligee in the particular undertaking (Vandyke v. Weil, 18 Wis. 277), the authorities, almost as a whole, unite in holding that the sureties in such obligations are not discharged from liability by a judgment in favor of one principal and against another. If the rule were otherwise, a great hardship might be worked upon the obligee in the undertaking, for if the obligor acquitted was the only solvent one, the obligee would be without recourse, the sureties having also been discharged. Almost sine exceptione, the few cases not sustaining the above rule have been either overruled, or else are explainable on the theory of the peculiar phraseology of the condition of the particular bond under consideration.

need not be entered for its return or possession.

Same — dissipation of property — judgment for money.

5. Where the record in an action in claim and delivery shows that the defendants sold the property, which consisted of about forty head of live stock, at auction to ten or twelve different purchasers, that some of them resold it to others, and that it was scattered over a wide territory a year before the trial of the action in claim and delivery, the plaintiff has made out a case sustaining a judgment for money only in such action, and the sureties on the redelivery undertaking are liable on such undertaking, unless they show clearly and explicitly that the property could have been returned to plaintiffs; and opinions of the principals on the undertaking that they could have returned such property at such time are inadequate to overcome the showing made by the plaintiffs that the property had been sold and scattered, and much of it resold.

Evidence — sufficiency.

6. Evidence examined, and it is held that it was sufficient to support a judgment in claim and delivery for money only, as against the sureties on the redelivery undertaking, and this is especially so when it is shown that the sureties executed the undertaking on the day of the advertised sale, and knew that it was to be sold, were present at the sale, saw it sold, and made no objection thereto; such sale occurring prior to the trial of the action in claim and delivery.

(November 20, 1913.)

This is true notwithstanding the fact that ordinarily "sureties are said to be favorites of the law, and a contract of suretyship must be strictly construed to impose upon the surety only those burdens clearly within its terms, and must not be extended by implication or presumption." 32 Cyc. 73.

Appeal bonds.

In accord with what has already been said, the great weight of authority supports the rule that the sureties upon bonds given upon appeal are not discharged from liability upon their undertaking by an affirmance of the judgment as to part of the principals in the bond, and a reversal as to the others. Porter v. Singleton, 28 Ark. 483; Wood v. Orford, 56 Cal. 157; Ives v. Hulce, 17 Ill. App. 35; Ferguson v. Allen, 91 Ill. App. 591; Lutt v. Sterrett, 26 Kan. 581; Gilpin v. Hord, 85 Ky. 213, 3 S. W. 143; Cook v. Ligon, 54 Miss. 625; Hood v. Mathis, 21 Mo. 308; Seacord v. Morgan, 3 Keyes, 636, 35 How. Pr. 487, affirming 17 How. Pr. 394; Goodwin v. Bunzl, 102 N. Y. 224, 6 N. E. 399; Fritchie v. Holden, 57 Hun, 585, 32 N. Y. S. R. 276, 11 N. Y. Supp. 171; Johnstone v. Conner, 13 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 19; Schultz v. United States Fidelity & G. Co. 201 N. Y. 230, 94 N. E. 601, affirming 134 App. Div. 260, 118 N. Y. Supp. 977; Ford v. Townsend, 1 Robt. 39; Gardner v. Barney, 24 How. Pr. 467; Brown v. Conner, 32 N. C. (10 Ired. L.) 75; Alber v. Froehlich, 39 Ohio St. 245, overruling Lang v. Pike, 27 Ohio St. 498; MacNeale v. Frackler, 3 Ohio L. J. 11; Bentley v. Dorcas, 11 Ohio St. 398; Moore v. Gore, 2 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) 61; Dignowity v. Staacke, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 25 S. W. 824; McFarlane v. Howell, 91 Tex. 218, 42 S. W. 853; Vandyke v. Weil, 18 Wis. 277.

While the particular wording of the condition of the undertaking of the sureties must be considered in determining the question of their liability when the judgment is affirmed as to a part only of the appellants, the courts have, nevertheless, concurred in holding that the condition of the bond is not fulfilled by such partial affirmance. Thus, the sureties were held liable, although the judgment was affirmed as against part only of the principals, where the bond was conditioned that——the principals would prosecute their appeal with effect, and in case of judgment against them, that they would perform the judgment, sentence, or decree, and pay all such damages as might be awarded against them. McFarlane v. Howell, 91 Tex. 218, 42 S. W. 853. When judgment is affirmed as to one of several joint appellants, it cannot be said that they have prosecuted the appeal to effect. One has; the other has not. The condition of the bond being that both shall prosecute to effect, the failure of either is a breach of it. Cook v. Ligon, 54 Miss. 625;

—the principals would pay the full amount of condemnation and costs, in case a decree should be rendered in favor of the appellees. Bentley v. Dorcas, 11 Ohio St. 398. The court said: "The judgment in the district court is against a part only. We think the sureties in the bond given by all are the sureties of all, and bound for the default of all. . . . By the terms of the bond, they are sureties equally for all; and all, by uniting in the bond, must be regarded as bound for each other;"

—appellants would satisfy such judgment and costs as might be adjudged against them, not exceeding a certain sum, and that they would prosecute their appeal to effect, etc. Alber v. Froehlich, 39 Ohio St. 245, overruling Lang v. Pike, 27 Ohio St. 498 (The court was of the opinion that the language of the statute in accordance with which the appeal bond in both cases was conditioned was broad enough to bind the sureties in such bond, where the judgment was in favor of one of the joint appellants and against the other. The decision in this case also overruled the decision in Marsh v. Byrnes, 7 Ohio L. J. 345);

—appellants would pay if judgment was affirmed. Vandyke v. Weil, 18 Wis. 277;

—defendants would prosecute their appeal to effect and without unnecessary delay, and satisfy such judgment and costs

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the District Court for Stutsman County in defendants' favor in an action brought to recover upon a redelivery bond given by them in a claim and delivery action. Reversed.

Statement by Spalding, Ch. J.:

The story of the litigation leading to this appeal may be epitomized as follows: In November, 1906, appellant Larson brought an action in claim and delivery against one Foley, and process was placed in the hands of the appellant Walker, as an officer, for service. Walker took into his possession under the process ten horses, three cows, three calves, thirty-five hogs, and some other property, at the village of Kensal, in Stutsman county. Not having means for caring for the live stock, he intrusted it, as he supposed to the keeping of William Caven and W. L. Caven. December 1, 1906, judgment against Foley awarding the possession of the property to the plaintiff Larson was rendered, whereupon Walker applied to the Cavens for possession in order that the property might be sold to satisfy the lien adjudged thereon in favor of Larson. William Caven, who was in fact the proprietor of the livery barn in which the property was held, refused to deliver the property, or any of it, unless a feed bill amounting to $523.50, should first be paid. It would appear that this amount was tendered, but refused, whereupon it was deposited in a bank to the credit of as might be rendered against them. Lutt v. Sterrett, 26 Kan. 561; —satisfaction would be given "if the judgment of the justice be affirmed, or if, on the trial anew in the circuit court, judgment be given against the appellants." Hood v. Mathis, 21 Mo. 308;

—appellants would prosecute their appeal with effect, and pay whatever judgment should be rendered against them upon trial of the appeal, or by confession, or, should the appeal be dismissed, would pay the judgment appealed from. Ives v. Hulce, 17 Ill. App. 35;

—the sureties would pay if any part of the judgment was affirmed. Wood v. Orford, 56 Cal. 157.;

—defendants would prosecute a writ of review to final judgment, and that they would pay such judgment as might be rendered against them, and the plaintiff discontinued as to one of the defendants. Happenny v. Trayner, 111 Mass. 279. Such discontinuance does not affect the rights or means of indemnity of the sureties, which depend on their relation to their principals, as shown by the bond, and are not secured through the judgment.

It is immaterial whether the undertaking is a supersedeas bond or a regular appeal bond. Porter v. Singleton, 28 Ark. 483; Dignowity v. Staacke, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 25 S. W. 824; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Lacy, 13 Tex. Civ. App. 391, 35 S. W. 505; Bridgford v. Fogg, 12 Ky. L. Rep. 570, 14 S. W. 600; Gilpin v. Hord, 85 Ky. 213, 3 S. W. 143.

The appeal being by more than one appellant, the undertaking of the sureties is as a rule regarded as several as to each one of the principals. McFarlane v. Howell, 91 Tex. 218, 42 S. W. 853; Ives v. Hulce, 17 Ill. App. 35; Alber v. Froehlich, 39 Ohio St. 245, overruling Lang v. Pike, 27 Ohio St. 498; Vandyke v. Weil, 18 Wis. 277; Lutt v. Sterrett, 26 Kan. 561. In Ives v. Hulce, supra, the court said: "We think it would be unduly technical to hold that because judgment was rendered against one alone, then the bond should be discharged. It is not contended by counsel, as we understand, that Ives and Ator are not liable on the bond, but that the sureties are not so liable. If the principals are still bound by the terms of the bond, then the sureties are also. By what process of reasoning the sureties can be discharged while the principals are bound is not made plain. The statute, in providing a form for a bond which may be used in the case of one defendant, clearly contemplated appeals by several defendants, and the object of the undertaking is to secure the plaintiff in the judgment. It is a reasonable and fair construction to hold, in such cases, that the undertaking of the sureties is several as to each one of the principals, and that where judgment goes against but one, it is within the condition of the instrument."

Also in Lutt v. Sterrett, supra, the court said: "As we have before stated, an appeal taken jointly by two or more defendants, by giving one and the same undertaking or appeal bond, must, under the laws of this state, be considered as a several appeal as well as a joint one, and the surety on the appeal bond must, under the laws of this state, be considered as undertaking severally for each of the defendants, as well as jointly for all of them. To hold otherwise would be giving a very narrow construction to the statute authorizing appeals, and a construction not required by either the words or the obvious intention of the legislature, and a construction tending to defeat, rather than to promote, the administration of justice."

And in Alber v. Froehlich, supra, the court used this language: The "defendants, instead of separately appealing from the judgment, united, and this single undertaking was executed. The effect of it was to vacate the judgment against each, and the action thereupon was transferred to the court of common pleas for trial upon that cause of action, upon which a several judgment might be rendered. In the light of the statute and the state of the case, and considering the purpose of the undertaking as ascertained from the surrounding circumstances, its effect is precisely the same as if the sureties had executed a separate un-

William Caven. The Cavens, however, still refused to deliver possession of the property, and action was commenced by Larson and Walker against them, to recover possession, on or about the 7th of February, 1907. Process was issued and served by the sheriff of Stutsman county, who took possession of all property mentioned, whereupon William and W. L. Caven procured the execution of an undertaking, in the sum of $2,000, for the redelivery to them of the property in question, under the statute relating to the action of claim and delivery. This redelivery undertaking was signed by William Caven and W. L. Caven, and by the defendants herein, Albert Hanson, and Julius Frederickson, and was conditioned for the delivery of such property to the plaintiffs, if delivery should be adjudged, and for payment to them of such sum as might, for any cause, be recovered against the defendants in the action. The sheriff approved the sureties and returned the property to the possession of the defendants in the action, the two Cavens. The undertaking recited that the property had been taken from the defendants, and that the defendants were desirous of having it returned to them.

On the same day on which the property was returned, W. L. Caven, acting as agent for William Caven, sold it under an agister's lien, claimed at that time to amount to $952.50; it being claimed for the keeping of said property from the time it was delivered to them by the officer, about the 26th day of November, 1906, to the date of sale, undertaking for each of the defendants. They undertake that the defendants will pay any judgment that may be rendered against them (or either of them) in an action in which, legally, a separate judgment may be rendered against one only, but by virtue of which undertaking the judgment is vacated as to both. There cannot be the slightest doubt that such was the intention and understanding of the parties, and 'to hold that the surety is discharged because the judgment is not against both, after he has arrested the right of the plaintiff to collect as to either, seems' . . . a narrow and technical construction of the statute, not required by its words nor the obvious intention of the legislature. Such construction tends to defeat, rather than promote, the administration of justice."

This rule may not apply in a case in which the judgment appealed is founded upon a liability joint merely, and not joint and several, provided the law of the jurisdiction requires a joint judgment against all the original defendants. But it would seem that in such a case the question would not arise, for then a reversal of the judgment as to one defendant would reverse it as to all. In some states, however, all joint obligors need not be sued, and a judgment may be taken against one or more without being taken against all. Each party to a suit against whom a judgment is rendered, who desires to supersede the judgment, is required to give an appeal bond; and each may give a separate bond; and while they may give a joint bond, it was never intended that by so doing either they or their sureties could change their liability in the appellate court. McFarlane v. Howell, supra.

The court in Gilpin v. Hord, 85 Ky. 213, 3 S. W. 143, takes the position that the consideration which upholds a supersedeas bond is the depriving of the successful party of his right to enforce satisfaction of his judgment, not only as against all of the parties who have superseded, but as against any one of them; that therefore, to hold that the reversal of a judgment as to only a portion of the appellants discharges the sureties in the bond from payment of a judgment which is affirmed as against the other appellants would strike down the consideration of the bond, to wit, the suspension of the appellee's right to proceed against any one of the appellants to enforce the satisfaction of his judgment.

So, the surety upon a supersedeas bond to a judgment against a partnership in the firm name was not discharged from liability by a reversal of the judgment on appeal as to two of the partners, and an affirmance as to the other partner. Bridgford v. Fogg, 12 Ky. L. Rep. 570, 14 S. W. 600.

The sureties in an appeal bond are not discharged from liability merely because some of the appellants abandon their appeal, if the appellee obtains an affirmance of the judgment from which the appeal was taken. Burrall v. Vanderbilt, 1 Bosw. 637, 6 Abb. Pr. 70. The appeal in this case does not appear to have been dismissed or discontinued as to those who abandoned it. The undertaking of the sureties in this case was "that if appellants will pay all costs and damages against them," and "if the judgment or any part thereof shall be affirmed, the appellants will pay," etc.

And where the judgment appealed from was against several defendants in solido, and it was so changed by the appellate court as to discharge one of them and to hold the others liable jointly, and not in solido, the surety on the appeal bond was liable. Culver v. Leovy, 27 La. Ann. 58. The conditions of the bond in this case were "that the appellant shall satisfy whatever judgment may be rendered against him, etc., and that the surety shall be liable in his stead." The court said that the condition of the bond signed by the surety was the one required by law, and expressed the opinion that the defense set up by the surety was more specious than weighty.

But where the obligation of the sureties in an appeal bond was to satisfy whatever judgment might be rendered against a partnership on appeal, and there was a reversal as to the partnership, but a judgment against a partner was rendered when there was none against him in the lower court, the about the 9th of February, 1907. The horses were purchased by six different buyers, the cows and calves by four others, and the hogs by still another. The sale aggregated $1,085.25, of which sum, William Caven retained $1,028.50, and paid the balance of $56.75 to Foley, the party from whom the property had been originally taken. The action in claim and delivery brought by Larson and Walker against the two Caven was tried at the January, 1908, term of the district court, in Stutsman county. The defendants, Caven, filed a joint answer, resisting the rights of the plaintiffs to possession, and defended the action. At the conclusion of the trial the attorney for the defendants moved the dismissal of the action as to W. L. Caven, for the reason that it appeared that, throughout the transaction, he had acted only as the agent for William Caven. Counsel for the plaintiffs said that the motion was not resisted, or words to that effect, whereupon the motion was granted. The case was submitted to the jury, which found plaintiffs entitled to possession of all the personal property described, or the value thereof in case delivery could not be had, and that the value of the property was $1,000; and it also assessed $200 damages for the detention, and for money spent in recovery of the property. On January 23, 1908, the court rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, Larson and Walker, against the defendant William Caven, for the sum of $1,200 and costs. A few days thereafter, sureties were not liable. Grieff v. Kirk, 17 La. Ann. 25.

And a judgment on appeal from a justice's court against one of two defendants by consent of parties, but without the consent of the surety on the appeal bond, discharged the surety. Shimer v. Hightshue, 7 Blackf. 238.

Attachment bonds.

It is well established that the sureties upon attachment bonds executed by, or on behalf of, the defendants in the attachment proceedings, are not discharged by a judgment in favor of part of the defendants and against the others. Thus, the sureties in bonds given to discharge attachments against property of some or all of the defendants were held liable, although judgment was in favor of part of the principals, where the condition of the bond was——to pay "whatever" judgment might be rendered against the "defendants," Heynemann v. Eder, 17 Cal. 434; —to secure payment to plaintiff of the amount of the judgment which he might recover, Leonard v. Speidel, 104 Mass. 356; Campbell v. Brown, 121 Mass. 516; Sutro v. Bigelow, 31 Wis. 527;

—to pay plaintiff the amount which he might recover against several specified defendants, Way v. Murphy, 168 Mass. 472, 47 N. E. 500; —to pay "if the plaintiff shall recover judgment in said action," McCutcheon v. Weston, 65 Cal. 37, 2 Pac. 727;

—to pay the judgment which might be recovered against the defendants, Gilmore v. Crowell, 67 Barb. 62; —to return the property released by the bond to the sheriff if the plaintiff recovered any judgment, McCormick v. National Surety Co. 134 Cal. 510, 66 Pac. 741.

By holding the sureties liable in such cases as these, the substituted security is made available. The property seized being such as could be applied to the judgment obtained, the sureties should occupy the 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

same relation to the plaintiffs. Gilmore v. Crowell, supra.

In accordance with the foregoing rule, it is equally as well settled that discontinuance of the action as to a part of the defendants, and proceeding to judgment against the remainder, do not release the sureties from liability upon their undertaking. So the sureties were liable where the undertaking was conditional——to pay the judgment against the "defendants," Salomon v. Buehler, 129 Ill. App. 176 (The court said that the statute governing the recognizance here made the sureties liable for any judgment recovered in the suit in question); —that defendants would pay plaintiff the amount, if any, which he should recover in the said action, Poole v. Dyer, 123 Mass. 363;

—to pay the judgment which the plaintiff might recover in the action, Prior v. Pye, 164 Mass. 316, 41 N. E. 353;

—that the defendants in the suit, or either of them, would on demand pay the plaintiff the amount of the judgment that might be recovered against them not exceeding a certain amount, Inbusch v. Farwell, infra; see also Snelling v. Merritt, 85 Conn. 83, 81 Atl. 1039.

The rule is the same even though the property of only one of the defendants is attacked. McCormick v. National Surety Co. and Prior v. Pye, supra.

Such bond becomes a substitute for the property released. Inbusch v. Farwell, 1 Black, 566, 17 L. ed. 188. It dissolves the attachment made upon the property of each defendant, and should therefore stand as security to the plaintiff for the default of either. Poole v. Dyer, supra.

Furthermore, a discontinuance as to one of several defendants will not have the effect to discharge a bond which the defendants have jointly given to dissolve an attachment, for such discontinuance does not change the identity of the action, and the judgment recovered against only one of the defendants is the same judgment described in the bond. If the surety desires to escape liability for a judgment against execution was issued against William Caven, and returned, wholly unsatisfied. Subsequently, in April, 1909, this action was commenced upon the redelivery undertaking against the sureties thereon, Hanson and Frederickson. On trial a verdict was rendered in favor of the plaintiffs for $1,742.80 and costs, and judgment was entered accordingly. An appeal was taken to this court from such judgment, and a reversal secured, on the ground that the judgment was not entered in the alternative for the return and delivery of the property, or for its value in case a delivery could not be had, and that the sureties could not be holden on such judgment, in the absence of evidence in the record before this court to show that the property had been destroyed or dispersed, or could not be returned to the plaintiffs. It was held that, when the evidence was not before this court, no presumption could be indulged that such a showing was made as against the sureties, and that, in order to recover against them, plaintiff must allege and prove that they were entitled to judgment in the form in which it was entered. See Larson v. Hanson, 21 N. D. 411, 131 N. W. 229. The record was returned to the district court, plaintiffs amended their complaint by inserting an allegation with reference to the showing made in the district court in the trial of the case of Larson & Walker against W. L. Caven and William Caven. It alleged that it appeared that after the return and redelivery to said William Caven and W. L. Caven of said personal property and before the trial of said action, said per-only one of the defendants, he should give a bond limited to a judgment against both. Dalton v. Barnard, 160 Mass. 473, 23 N. E. 218.

And the surety on a bond to release attached property in the hands of a garnishee was not discharged from liability in Bedard v. Mahoney, 30 R. I. 469, 136 Am. St. Rep. 965, 76 Atl. 113, where the suit was discontinued as to some of the defendants, and other names were added, but the name of the principal defendant was retained, and those added were copartners.

But in Andre v. Fitzhugh, 18 Mich. 93, it was held that the sureties on a bond given to discharge an attachment were released where the plaintiff on the trial discontinued the action as to two of the three defendants against whom it was instituted. The court said: "The bond to be given by the defendant or person found in possession of the goods is to be executed by sureties. When executed, it must be considered as tacitly referring to the suit as then constituted in respect to parties, and not as it should possibly be thereafter constituted at the instance of the plaintiff to avoid defeat. The sureties, on entering into a contract, measure the risk they incur by the chances which the plaintiff has to recover against the defendants in the writ, and the ability of the latter in case of defeat to respond to the plaintiff, or the sureties themselves if called on. As the writ only issues against the particular defendants, after a showing upon oath by the plaintiff or someone in his behalf, that the defendants named are indebted to him, it cannot be presumed that the sureties suppose themselves to engage to abide a discontinuance by such plaintiff as to part of the defendants, and still remain liable. Any such change of parties, however, as that made by the plaintiff in this case, would not only transform the prosecuted cause of action from a joint to an individual one, but would necessarily alter the operation of the contract of the sureties, and without their consent. It would allow the plaintiff to recover, when, but for the discontinuance, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) he would be defeated; and therefore, upon the theory of the plaintiff, would fix a liability upon the sureties which could not otherwise exist. It would also have the effect to compel the sureties to look for indemnity to such defendant or defendants as should be left in the case at judgment, instead of the whole number of defendants named in the writ at the giving of the bond; and it might well happen that in the responsibility of the latter, the sureties would know themselves to be safe, while in that of the former they would know themselves to be without remedy."

And the surety was not liable when, after the action had been entered in court, the suit was dismissed as to one of the original defendants, and a new party was joined and summoned as a defendant, without notice to the surety. Tucker v. White, 5 Allen, 322.

The same was true where the suit was discontinued as to one of the defendants, who, however, was not a party to the bond, and a new defendant was summoned without notice to the surety. Richards v. Storer, 114 Mass. 101.

And likewise in Knight v. Dorr, 19 Pick. 48, where the plaintiff in an action of assumpsit, after one of the two defendants was adjudged not liable, amended by striking the name of such defendant from the writ.

Of course, where the obvious purpose of an attachment bond is that it shall stand as security for one only of the defendants, the sureties are not liable for any default of the other. Walker v. Dresser, 110 Mass. 350; Eveleth v. Burnham, 108 Mass. 374.

Replevin bonds.

In accord with the holding in Larson v. Hanson, the rule is well established that the sureties in a replevin bond are not discharged by a judgment or discontinuance in the favor of part of the defendants, and a judgment against the remainder. Pilger v. Mardér, 55 Neb. 113, 75 N. W.

sonal property and all of the same had been, by said William Caven and W. L. Caven, or with their permission and consent, and by their procurement, lost, destroyed, removed from the state, or otherwise disposed of, so that none of the same could be found or recovered or returned to the possession of these plaintiffs, and that the court, taking into consideration such evidence of the disposal of the property, and that none of it could be returned to plaintiffs, and that it had been disposed of and removed with the consent and procurement of these defendants herein, entered a judgment for money only. A retrial was had at the December, 1911, term of the district court, and at the conclusion of the testimony, counsel for both sides moved for a directed verdict in favor of their respective clients. The court discharged the jury, made findings of fact and conclusions of law, and directed a judgment in favor of the defendants, upon the ground that the failure of the court to find in the case of Larson and Walker against the Cavens that the property sought to be recovered in said action could not be returned; and by its failure to adjudge a return of the property to the plaintiffs in that case, and by the voluntary acceptance by plaintiffs of a money judgment against one of the defendants, the plaintiffs waived any right or claim against the sureties on the redelivery bond, and because, by the voluntary agreement of the plaintiffs in the former action to discharge W. L. Caven as a defendant, they canceled the obligation of the sureties. Judgment was entered in accordance with 559; Goodwin v. Bunzl, 102 N. Y. 224, 6 N. E. 399; Auerbach v. Marks, 10 Daly, 171.

In Wandelohr v. Grayson County Nat. Bank, 102 Tex. 20, 108 S. W. 1154, 112 S. W. 1046, the sureties on a replevin bond for sequestered real property bound themselves for the payment of the rents by the principals or either of them in case they or either of them was condemned so to do. Judgment was against one of the principals only. It was held that the sureties were liable for the rents.

And the amendment of a libel by dismissing it as to the pilot, and sustaining it as against the vessel and the master or owner, was not injurious to the sureties in the bond given for the property, where their liability was neither increased nor diminished. Newell v. Norton, 3 Wall. 257, 18 L. ed. 271.

But a dismissal of the action as to one of the joint principals on a forthcoming bond in replevin was held in Tyler v. Davis, 63 Miss. 345, to discharge the liability of the sureties in the bond. The court said: "The sureties were entitled to the protection which was afforded them by the fact that Mrs. Davis was a party to the suit, and presumably contending that she, and not the plaintiff, was entitled to the property in controversy. By his own act the plaintiff thrust Mrs. Davis from the suit. She had no right to insist that the suit should be continued as to her against the wishes of the plaintiff, and since the effect of dismissing as to her was to relieve her of liability on the bond as principal, it follows as a consequence that the sureties are also discharged. The contract of the sureties was to respond to any judgment which might be entered in the suit to which Mrs. Davis and her husband were parties. They were connected with the suit by their connection with both parties as principals on the bond, and though a judgment has been entered against Davis, there has been none against Mrs. Davis, nor any in any suit to which she is a party within the condition of the bond."

Bail bonds.

Only cases of bail bonds in civil actions are included here.

Where one is arrested in a suit against himself and another as copartners, and gives a bail bond to appear, answer, and abide the judgment in the suit, the liability of the sureties on the bond is not affected by a discontinuance of the original action as to the other partner. Sanderson v. Stevens, 116 Mass. 133.

And dismissing a suit against one of two defendants was held in Hamlin v. McNiel, 32 N. C. (10 Ired. L.) 307, not to discharge the bail of the other, although but a single bond was given by the two defendants. Practically the same conclusion is reached in Bradhurst v. Pearson, 32 N. C. (10 Ired. L.) 55. And see Karek v. Avinger, 3 Hill, L. 215.

But a judgment entered by agreement against one of two defendants discharged the surety in a capias bond, in Com. v. Clay, 9 Phila. 121, where the condition of the bond was that if the defendants in the original action were condemned, they would surrender themselves or pay the condemnation money and costs.

Injunction bonds.

The sureties upon a bond given to secure the satisfaction of any judgment that may be rendered against the defendants in an injunction suit cannot, in an action on the bond, set up the defense that their liability had been increased through the dismissal of the original action as to one of the defendants, when such defendant is one of the principals in the bond. Kleeb v. Bard, 12 Wash. 140, 40 Pac. 733.

In Hill v. McKenzie, 39 Ala. 314, the court found it unnecessary to decide whether the sureties were liable in damages in a suit on an injunction bond, where the injunction was perpetuated as to two of the principals and dissolved as to a third.

the findings. From such judgment, this appeal is taken.

Preliminary to a consideration of the two points around which all the assignments of error made by appellant revolve, we may note that respondents raised certain objections to the sufficiency of the complaint, which were overruled by the court. We have carefully examined these objections, and find them without merit. They are of such a nature and of such length that it would serve no purpose to treat them more specifically. Further reference to facts will be made in consideration of the two law points involved, as suggested by the reason above given by the trial court in its conclusions of law, for the judgment entered.

Mr. S. E. Ellsworth, for appellants:

A court is authorized, upon the trial of a replevin action in which it appears that the property has been destroyed, dispersed, or for some reason cannot be delivered, to enter a money judgment for its value.

Spalding, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Did the order of the court and judgment entered thereon, on motion of the attorney for the two Cavens, made either with the consent of the plaintiffs' attorneys in the replevin action, or without objection on their part, dismissing W. L. Caven, one of the defendants therein, "from said cause of action," discharge the sureties from liability upon the redelivery undertaking executed by the two Cavens as principals, and the respondents herein as sureties? The action of claim and delivery is to secure the possession of personal property belonging to the plaintiff. The Code makes provision for the process, and for the giving of an undertaking by the plaintiff, to entitle him to take possession of the property, pending the determination of the case. If the defendants desire to retain possession of the property during such time, they are permitted to do so by furnishing a statutory undertaking, executed by two or more sufficient sureties, to the effect that they are bound in double the value of the property as stated in the affidavit of the plaintiff, for the delivery thereof to the plaintiff, if such delivery is adjudged, and for the payment to him of such sum as may, for any cause, be recovered against the defendant. Rev. Codes 1905, § 6922. The plaintiff is entitled to the property on commencing his action and furnishing his undertaking and the service of process, unless a redelivery undertaking is furnished by the defendant. It is clear that the statute contemplates such an undertaking as will render the plaintiff secure, if the property is redelivered and retained in the possession of the defendant. It provides for a return of the property if the plaintiff is adjudged to be entitled to it, and for the payment to him of such sum as, for any cause, may be recovered against the defendant. The undertaking is not only a substitute for the possession of the property by the plaintiff, but is security for any money judgment recovered. The defendant has his option whether to permit the property to remain with the plaintiff, or to furnish the undertaking in lieu thereof, and covering also the money part of any judgment recovered, and retain possession himself. Now, if the language of this provision is to be taken with the narrow literalness contended for by the respondents herein, the word, "defendant," being in the singular, the provision is not applicable to an action in claim and delivery where there is more than one defendant. The respondent contends that, because the undertaking follows the language of the statute, but uses the word "defendant" in the plural, and because judgment was recovered against only one of the two defendants, the proceedings have effected a change in the contract of the sureties without their knowledge or consent, and that thereby they are released or discharged. We are of the opinion that the terms of the statute must be taken in a much broader sense or meaning, and that they apply to the recovery by the plaintiff as against any or all of the defendants named in the process on which the undertaking was given. To hold otherwise would be to emasculate the law relating to claim and delivery. It would render it extremely hazardous to take possession in any action in which more than one party is made defendant. This case serves to illustrate such danger. It appears from the record that the defendant William Caven was the proprietor of a livery barn, but it was managed by his agent, W. L. Caven. Under such circumstances, and governed by appearances, the plaintiff naturally brought his action against the two parties who appeared to be in possession. When it later developed on the trial that the proprietorship was in one only, and the other was simply his agent, counsel for the Cavens moved to dismiss as to the agent. This motion was not resisted, and we may assume the order dismissing him was made with the consent of the plaintiffs herein. Can it be possible that, in order to protect their rights and hold the sureties on the undertaking, the case should have been tried through and submitted to the jury, and that the plaintiffs should have protested at all times against the court entering a judgment of dismissal as to one defendant, when there may have been not a scintilla of proof to show liability as to him? If not, where can the line be drawn between the degree of assent or opposition to the order of dismissal on the part of the plaintiffs necessary to hold the sureties? We think the word "defendant" is used in the statute, and the word "defendants" in the undertaking, as a general term, applying to one or more as the case may be, and according as the judgment may be rendered, so long as the parties against whom judgment is rendered were defendants when the redelivery undertaking was executed and delivered.

But other considerations enter into this question, which it appears to this court are not only persuasive, but conclusive. As we have observed, the undertaking was executed by both Cavens as well as the sureties. It recites that the defendants—that is William Caven and W. L. Caven—are desirous of having said personal property returned to them, and, when the defendant W. L. Caven was dismissed from the action, he was not relieved from liability on the undertaking. He was a party executing that undertaking, and was held thereon, notwithstanding the order of dismissal, and even if, as was contended on the trial, he was the only one of the principals who was responsible financially, the sureties were not prejudiced, for they still retained, so far as appears, their remedy against him. Had the undertaking only been executed by the sureties, as is done in some instances, or in the case of undertakings in some forms of action, there might be some question, but no such case is before us. W. L. Caven contracted, himself, for a return of the property, or for the payment of any judgment obtained, and the sureties have lost none of their rights by the action of the court. This is not a case when plaintiffs and the original defendants by agreement between themselves released one defendant from liability, or perpetrated a fraud on the sureties. It is the action of the court in the regular proceedings of the trial, and which all parties must have contemplated might occur, and the sureties contracted with reference to it.

Many authorities are cited by both parties on this proposition; we think we have examined each one of them, at least all those cited by the respondents. If we were to concede that one or two of those relied upon by respondents were in point, which we doubt, the greater number are in no manner applicable to this case, and those holding the sureties still liable preponderate overwhelmingly. We shall not take the space to review all those cited by respondents, but refer to a few as illustrative of practically all.

Harris v. Taylor, 3 Sneed, 536, 67 Am. Dec. 576, simply holds that the sureties on a replevin bond in behalf of all the defendants are discharged when the plaintiff voluntarily discharges one of the defendants. The question is not discussed further than for the court to say the undertaking of the sureties is in joint behalf of the two defendants, and the discharge of one of the latter by the voluntary act of the plaintiff operated as a discharge of the sureties from the obligation of their bond; but in Kelly v. Gordon, 3 Head, 683, the Tennessee court holds that the undertaking of the surety in an injunction bond, where there are several complainants, is in law for the principals severally, as well as jointly; that the surety is in effect bound that each and all of his principals shall perform and fulfil whatever decree may be rendered against all or either of them, and that therefore abatement as to one of several joint defendants, of the discharge of one upon some ground applicable to him alone, cannot affect the liability of the surety for the surviving party or parties against whom a decree is rendered. The court distinguishes the Harris Case, supra, on the ground that in that case the plaintiff by his voluntary act discharges one of the defendants, while here the act of the plaintiff was failure to revive the suit against the personal representative of the deceased party, and holds that, inasmuch as the law did not impose any active duty or obligation upon the plaintiffs to do so, it was not equivalent to a voluntary discharge of one party; that it was an omission to do what they might have done, but which they were not required to do, and that the discharge of one of the defendants upon some ground applicable to him alone cannot affect the liability of the surety for the surviving party or parties, against whom a final decree may be properly rendered. This, therefore, becomes an authority supporting appellants' contention in the instant case.

it from the case at bar. In that case two suits were brought, each by three plaintiffs; two of the plaintiffs being the same in each case, but the third a different person. By consent of the parties the two suits were consolidated without the knowledge or consent of the surety, one of the plaintiffs who was not a party to one of the suits was discharged, and it was held that his release might be assimilated to a release of the principal debtor by the payee of a note or bond, which discharged the surety from his liability.

Standard Oil Co. v. Arnestad, 6 N. D. 255, 34 L.R.A. 861, 66 Am. St. Rep. 604, 69 N. W. 197, is not in point; it relates to a bond for the fidelity of a firm, and holds that the sureties are not liable for funds misappropriated by one member of the firm after the dissolution and the retirement of the other partner. Crane Co. v. Specht, 39 Neb. 123, 42 Am. St. Rep. 562, 57 N. W. 1015, is not in point, except as it deals with the construction of the contract of guaranty, and holds that it will be strictly construed, and not extended by implication. It holds that sureties are not liable for goods furnished after a change in the firm for which they had become guarantors.

Woodburn v. Driver, 81 Ark. 333, 99 S. W. 384, is not in point. Summary judgment was rendered in that case against the sureties on defendants' retaining bond for the amount of the debt due plaintiffs from defendants, when under the statute in force no provision was made for summary judgment for the debt; hence the court held the judgment erroneous. Friendly v. National Surety Co. 46 Wash. 71, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1160, 89 Pac. 177, simply holds that where one member of a firm of contractors assigns his interest to his partner, and is released from liability on the contract without consent of the sureties on the contractor's bond, such sureties are released.

Crook v. Lipscomb, 30 Tex. Civ. App. 567, 70 S. W. 993, is not in point. In that case there were several defendants, and the plaintiff entered into an agreement with a portion of the defendants, whereby judgment was to be taken against such defendants without opposition, but no execution was to be issued against them. The sureties and the other defendants were not informed of such agreement, and it seems to have been a fraud upon the other defendants.

In Wandelohr v. Grayson County Nat. Bank, 102 Tex. 20, 108 S. W. 1154, 112 S. W. 1046, the court expressly declines to decide the question whether a separate action could be maintained on a joint and several bond, against one of the defendants and the sureties; and that case is not in point for other reasons, especially because it rests up on a peculiar statute. See also Sartain v. Hamilton, 14 Tex. 348, and Wandelohr v. Grayson County Nat. Bank, supra.

So much for illustrations of the authorities cited by respondent. On the other hand, we find numerous authorities to the effect that the sureties are not relieved from liability by the dismissal or discharge of one defendant. In Sutro v. Bigelow, 31 Wis. 527, an undertaking was given to procure the discharge of certain garnishees in an action. The language of the undertaking was identical in all material respects with that in the case at bar. It was: "To pay unto the said plaintiffs the amount of said judgment, if any, which the said plaintiff may recover in the action against the said defendants," not exceeding a sum named. There were two defendants. Subsequent to the giving of the undertaking, it was discontinued as to one, and judgment was taken against the other only. The reported case is the action against the sureties on the undertaking, who, as in the case at bar, claimed to be released by the discontinuance as to one defendant. The court held that it was the obvious intent of the statute that the persons executing such undertaking should be bound to the same extent as the garnishees discharged from liability by virtue of it, or the property of the principal debtor in the hands of such garnishees would have been bound, and that the undertaking must be liberally construed with reference to such intent, and that therefore the sureties were still liable on the undertaking.

In Heynemann v. Eder, 17 Cal. 434, the identical question involved in the instant case was passed upon. The bond was to pay whatever judgment might be rendered against "said defendants." Judgment was obtained against one only of the defendants. The court held that the security required by the statute was a security for the satisfaction of any judgment that might be obtained, and that the bond was such a security, and that failure to obtain judgment against one defendant did not discharge the sureties. In Poole v. Dyer, 123 Mass. 363, it is held that the result, so far as the sureties are concerned, is the same, whether the plaintiff discontinues against one defendant, or fails to recover against him upon the trial. The action was brought against the sureties on the undertaking after the original action had been discontinued as to one defendant.

Pilger v. Marder, 55 Neb. 113, 75 N. W. 559, was replevin brought against three defendants; property was taken under the writ; trial was had with the result that judgment was entered in favor of one of the defendants; action was instituted on the undertaking given by the plaintiffs, to recover of the sureties the value of the property, etc. It was urged that, inasmuch as the bond was given in favor of three obligees, they should all have been parties to the suit. The court says: "In an action of replevin in which there are two or more defendants, each may recover a part of the property, or one may be adjudged the owner and entitled to the possession of all of the property, and to have a return of it, or to recover its value. . . . It is also true that all of the parties to a case in replevin are bound by the adjudication of the rights involved and put in issue therein. It seems a correct conclusion that the sureties of a replevin undertaking are liable to the party or parties to whom the final determination of the issue may accord a recovery."

In Goodwin v. Bunzl, 102 N. Y. 224, 6 N. E. 399, it is held that where final judgment was rendered in replevin against two defendants only, and in favor of a third, the sureties on the bond were not released.

Auerbach v. Marks, 10 Daly, 171, is also directly in point. In that case, on the trial of the replevin suit, the complaint was dismissed as to one defendant, a verdict rendered for the plaintiff against the other two defendants, and judgment entered thereon. On the failure to deliver the property and return of execution unsatisfied, action was brought against the sureties. The defense was that, when the suit was commenced, the property replevied was in the sole possession of one of the defendants, at whose request and in whose behalf they executed the undertaking; that the property was thereupon returned to that defendant; that the other two defendants had no interest in, or possession of, the property, and it was claimed that, no judgment having been rendered against the one defendant, their liability ceased. Evidence was excluded to show these facts, and the verdict directed for the plaintiff, and it was held that the defendants were not entitled to show the facts recited above; that when the undertaking given by the defendants was executed and delivered, the property was in the hands of the sheriff, and that the sureties bound themselves for the delivery to the plaintiff, if the delivery should be adjudged, etc. The court says that the fact that no cause of action was established against the defendant Goodman, and that the complaint was dismissed as to him, does not discharge the defendants from their obligation; that they became bound for the delivery of the property to the plaintiff, and, in case a delivery could not be had, for its value; that, in consequence of the undertaking, the property was returned to all the defendants in the replevin action. This conclusion is based upon the language of the undertaking, to the effect that the three defendants were desirous of having it returned to them, and that, in consideration of the return of it to them, the defendants became bound, etc.; that the sureties became bound for the delivery of the property by each and all of the defendants, if a delivery of it to the plaintiff was adjudged; and it was held that they were not discharged of their liability when the defendant Goodman was released from any obligation to deliver it, by a judgment in his favor, if they still remained bound for the delivery by the other defendants; that the dismissal as to one defendant in no way affected the plaintiff's right to the property; that the effect of the judgment was that the one defendant did not wrongfully detain it; and that such a judgment does not entitle a defendant to the return of the property, for it in no way affects the ownership or title of the property; that where there are several defendants, the court may adjudge the return of it to one of them, and refuse it to others, or may award to all of them, or part to one and part to another, or to the plaintiff, as the rights of the parties shall appear, or for other relief not necessary here to state. The court remarks that "the action of replevin is founded upon a tort; it is brought by a party entitled to property against those in possession of it, who have wrongfully taken or wrongfully withheld it, or who wrongfully conceal or put it out of their possession, to defeat the suit. Where there are several defendants sued as wrongdoers, each may set up a separate defense, each may claim exclusive title to the property, or set up any matter in defense, without reference to the pleading or defense of the other, and judgment may be given in favor of one and against the others, or judgment may be for both parties. . . . Thus, a defendant may succeed, and not be entitled to a return, if a return of the property is ordered only when it appears just." The court further says: "What the sureties undertook was to be bound for the delivery of the property, if delivery of it should be adjudged to the plaintiff, and the payment of such sum as might be awarded against the defendants. The argument is that the sureties agreed to be bound if all the defendants failed to deliver it. The answer is that one of the defendants was relieved from delivering it by the judgment of the court. In the language of the undertaking, a delivery of it by him was not adjudged, but it was adjudged that it should be delivered to the plaintiff by the other two defendants, and it is for their failure to deliver or pay the sum recovered, if the property was not delivered, that the defendants are answerable." The language of the undertaking was 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

identical with the case at bar,—that the defendants were desirous of having the property returned to them. We commend the reading of the opinion to counsel. It is exactly apropos to the case at bar, and is most persuasive. We have only quoted a small portion.

We conclude that the sureties were not released from liability on the undertaking by the fact that the action of claim and delivery was dismissed at the close of the evidence, on motion of counsel for the principals, either with the consent of or simply without opposition by counsel for the plaintiffs therein.

2. Were the respondents relieved from liability by the form of the judgment taken against one of their principals, namely, not in the alternative, but only for money, the value of the property and damages? It is true that, in the usual method of practice under the Code, a judgment in claim and delivery was taken in the alternative for return or the possession of the property, or its value, if a return cannot be had, and undoubtedly, in many cases, the fact that judgment was not so entered would be fatal, in the absence of a motion on the part of the judgment creditor to correct it; but the law does not require idle acts, and it is well established that where, on the record, it appears that the property cannot be returned, judgment need not be entered for its return or possession.

What is the record in the case at bar on which the money judgment was entered? C. H. Olson was a witness. He was the official stenographer who took the testimony in shorthand in the claim and delivery action. He testified in the case before us that he heard the testimony of W. L. Caven, as a witness in the claim and delivery action, with reference to the property that was taken and turned back to the defendants. With his transcript of such evidence before him, he testified that said Caven testified that he sold the property in question for a feed bill incurred in the livery barn, for $950 or $951, on the 7th of February, 1908, and that he was not in position to reproduce the property and turn it over to the plaintiff therein, because the property was gone; that the sale was made under notice and publication. Olson did not have the minutes of all the testimony taken in the case, as a portion of such minutes seem to have been lost between the clerk of the court and counsel for the respondents, which, however, is immaterial. One Bouer testified that he was present at the trial and heard testimony relating to the property having been sold at auction, and regarding the report of such sale, and that it was brought out that the Cavens had sold the property under the lien claimed by them, and filed a report of such sale at Jamestown. In the case at bar, the report of the sale was received in evidence. It showed the process, and the persons to whom the different items were sold, and was made by W. L. Caven under oath as agent for William Caven. This report also showed that the property had been sold to some ten or twelve different people. Bouer also testified that he was present at the sale. William Caven testified that he was not asked a certain question contained in the record to which Olson, the stenographer, testified, and did not make the answer given.

So much for the record relating to the disposition of the property in the claim and delivery action. It is this record that the court had before it when it rendered the judgment for money only. There is certainly enough in it to sustain the action of the court in rendering such judgment, even if it be conceded that there is a conflict in the evidence by reason of the testimony of William Caven, to which reference has been made. On the facts shown by the record, it was for the trial court to determine what kind of a judgment to enter, and that court must have found, in its consideration of the subject and from the record, that the property could not be returned. No appeal is before us from that judgment. It has become final, and the evidence was sufficient to sustain it. See last two sentences of the opinion in 21 N. D. 411, 131 N. W. 229.

We refer to one other phase of the record in the case at bar. It appears that evidence was received to support the judgment in the claim and delivery action, and it was conclusively shown that the Cavens sold the property involved at auction to a number of persons more than a year before the trial; that some of it had been removed to the northwestern part of the state by the purchasers, the hogs sold to a butcher, and the horses to several farmers, and considerable of them were resold by the purchasers. The respondents undertook to show that it was within the power of William Caven to collect and return each item of such property to appellants. We are not determining whether it was proper to receive evidence in this case to support that judgment. We are inclined to doubt its admissibility, and to think that the record made in the claim and delivery action is the record on which it must be determined whether the form of judgment is justified. See 21 N. D. 411. It, however, seems to have been assumed by both parties on the trial of the instant case that it was then proper and competent to show that the property could, or could not, have been returned when the former judgment was rendered. As to the new proof on this subject, when the holders of the judgment in the former case had shown that the defendants had sold the property to ten or twelve different purchasers more than a year prior to the trial of the action; that it had been scattered over a wide territory, and some resold to other parties; that the plaintiffs had made out a case showing the inability of the defendants to return the property, which, in the absence of a further showing by the defendants, would support the judgment for money only, in view of the circumstances, and particularly in view of the fact that the means of knowledge regarding the ability to return the different pieces of property was necessarily with the defendants in that case, who were witnesses for the defendants in the case at bar, something more devolved upon them than to testify in effect to the opinion that, at all times after the auction sale, they could have gathered together the property and returned it to its owners. It would seem but reasonable to require them to testify as to each specific item, and disclose the source of their knowledge and its extent, and to make clear their ability to return the property, before it should be held to overcome the case made by the evidence, uncontradicted, of its sale at auction and dispersion. We are impressed by the record with the belief that the Cavens went as far as they could go towards showing their ability to return the property, and that this showing amounted to nothing more than the naked statement of their opinions that they were able so to do, and that that statement was rendered highly improbable by all the surrounding circumstances, at least so improbable that it was incumbent upon them to overcome, by specific and persuasive evidence, such improbabilities. In that connection, and as bearing on these questions, we may say that both of the defendant sureties testified in the case at bar that they were present at the auction sale referred to, saw the property sold, and knew that it was distributed among numerous purchasers; that the sale was on the same day that they executed the redelivery undertaking, and that they made no objection to the sale, and were willing that it should be sold and distributed around among different persons in that community or elsewhere. They appear to have executed the undertaking with knowledge that the property was to be sold and scattered, and for the sole purpose of enabling Caven to sell and scatter it.

In Burke v. Koch, 75 Cal. 356, 17 Pac. 228, the court found that the defendants had sold and disposed of a large portion of the property replevined, and had appropriated the proceeds thereof; and, that fact appearing at the trial, it was held that the trial court was not bound to find the character or value of the articles which should be returned, or enter a judgment in the alternative. Gallarati v. Orser, 27 N. Y. 324, disclosed a record that failed to show that the property could not be returned; hence it was held that it would not support a judgment for money only. In Lee v. Hastings, 13 Neb. 508, 14 N. W. 476, it is held that the judgment in an action of replevin must be in the alternative, unless it is shown by the record that a return of the property could not have been had. In Field v. Lumbard, 53 Neb. 397, 73 N. W. 703, it is held that the judgment should have been in the alternative, and that, as it was not so entered, the sureties were not liable, but the opinion does not disclose, as we read it, whether the record showed the possibility of a return of the property, and if any inference is to be drawn on the subject, it would seem to be that it either showed that it could have been returned or failed to show anything; hence it is not in point. See also Ingersoll v. Bostwick, 22 N. Y. 425; Johnson v. Carnley, 10 N. Y. 570, 61 Am. Dec. 762; Sweeney v. Lomme, 22 Wall. 208, 22 L. ed. 727; Cheatham v. Morrison, 37 S. C. 187, 15 S. E. 924; Kennedy v. Brown, 21 Kan. 171; Atkinson v. Foxworth, 53 Miss. 733; Campbell v. Brown, 121 Mass. 516; McCarthy v. Strait, 7 Colo. App. 59, 42 Pac. 189; Wells, Replevin, §§ 428-431; Davis v. Gray, 39 Okla. 386, 134 Pac. 1100. The above authorities have more or less bearing on this question. We are satisfied that a sufficient showing was made to sustain the action of the appellants against the sureties on the undertaking in question. It is clearly so when giving proper weight to evidence adduced by the party against whom the order was directed on the motion for a directed verdict.

One or two other assignments of error may be noticed. Appellants contend that it was error to exclude proof offered to show that William Caven withdrew from the bank in which appellants had deposited the amount of their claim for the keeping of the property, and appropriated such fund to their own use, and also because evidence was admitted tending to show that respondents became sureties on the redelivery bond in reliance upon the solvency of W. L. Caven. It is not necessary, in view of our conclusion on the two main questions, to pass upon these assignments. In conclusion, we may add that, in so far as the respondents were aware of the facts, and participated in or assented to the sale of the property, they are not in position to criticize too closely the regularity or irregularity of the legal proceedings by means of which 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) appellants attempted to regain or recover for their property. They stood by and saw the property dispersed after they signed the undertaking; they made no objection, and are in much the same position that Caven occupies.

We have made no reference to the findings of fact made by the court, because they in no manner conflict with our conclusions, and in fact sustain them. Among other things, the court expressly found that the property was sold by the two Caven, and that they, by such sale, divested themselves of all title in and to such property, or any part thereof, and in and to the possession thereof, and never again became its owners or possessors. The conclusions of law found by the court render it unnecessary to further consider the findings.

The judgment of the District Court is reversed, and the District Court will enter judgment for plaintiffs, with costs.

OKLAHOMA CRIMINAL COURT OF APPEALS.

EX PARTE EUGENE WILLIAMS.

Extradition — fugitive — purpose of departure.

1. To be a fugitive from justice under the laws of the United States, it is not necessary that the person charged with having left the state in which the crime was alleged to have been committed should have done so for the purpose of avoiding prosecution anticipated or begun, but simply that, having committed a crime within the state, he leaves such state, and, when he is sought to be subjected to its criminal process to answer for his offense, he is found within the territory of another state.

General rule.

The general rule is well settled that one who was within a state at the time of the alleged commission therein of a crime with which he is charged, and who, when sought to be subjected to the criminal process of tive from justice within the provisions of the United States Constitution and laws, and as such is subject to extradition if his parole is revoked.

Courts — jurisdiction — revocation of parole.

3. The legality of the revocation of a parole in the state of Indiana is a question for the courts of Indiana, for they alone have the right to construe the Constitution and laws of that state.

Same — sustaining action of governor.

the state for the crime, has left the jurisdiction and is found within another state, is a fugitive from justice within the meaning of the provisions of the United States Constitution and statute with reference to interstate extradition. Re Strauss, 63 C. C. A. 99, 126 Fed. 327; Re Bruce, 132 Fed. 390, affirmed on opinion below in 69 C. C. A. 342, 136 Fed. 1022; Drinkall v. Spiegel, 68 Conn. 441, 36 L.R.A. 486, 36 Atl. 830; *Depoilly v. W. 1050; Com. ex rel. Burlingame v. Hare, 36 Pa. Super. Ct. 125.

And it has been held that the fact that a person charged in one state with a crime involving his personal presence there is subsequently in another state makes him a fugitive from justice within the meaning of the Federal statute. Ex parte Edwards, 91 Miss. 621, 44 So. 827.

In Bruce v. Rayner, 62 C. C. A. 501, 124 Fed. 481, however, it was held that one who was within a state at the date of a crime alleged to have been committed therein by him, and who remained within reach of the criminal process of the state during the whole period within which he could have been prosecuted therefor, did not become a fugitive from justice, within the meaning of the provisions of the Constitution and statute of the United States relating to extradition, upon thereafter leaving the state.

But in Depoilly v. Palmer, 28 App. D. C. 324, it was held that the alleged fact that the accused person sought to be extradited had resided in the demanding state for more than the limitation period for prosecution, after the alleged date of the crime with which he was charged, was immaterial upon the question whether he was subject to extradition as a fugitive from justice, as such matters of defense must be determined by the court where the accused was to be tried upon the charge.

Must have been in demanding state.

PETITION for a writ of habeas corpus to secure release from custody under extradition proceedings. Writ denied.

Statement by Furman, J.:

It appears from the record in this cause that the petitioner, Eugene Williams, was legally charged by indictment, and was tried and convicted for the crime of grand larceny in the circuit court of Vanderburgh county, in the state of Indiana, on the 12th day of July, 1909, and was sentenced to imprisonment in the penitentiary of Indiana from one year to fourteen years; that before the expiration of said sentence petitioner was paroled by the board of commissioners of the Indiana State Prison, and removed from

The recent cases are in accord with the unanimous holding of earlier American cases, as appears from the earlier note, to the effect that a person cannot be a fugitive from justice, subject to interstate extradition under the provisions of the United States Constitution and statute relating thereto, unless he was present in the demanding state at the time of the alleged commission therein of the crime with which he is charged. Munsey v. Clough, 196 U. S. 364, 49 L. ed. 515, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 282 (obiter); Hyatt v. New York, 188 U. S. 691, 47 L. ed. 657, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 456, 12 Am. Crim. Rep. 311, affirming 172 N. Y. 176, 60 L.R.A. 774, 92 Am. St. Rep. 706, 64 N. E. 825, which reversed 72 App. Div. 629, 76 N. Y. Supp. 1026; Ex parte Hoffstot, 180 Fed. 240, affirmed without opinion in 218 U. S. 665, 54 L. ed. 1201, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 222; Farrell v. Hawley, 78 Conn. 150, 70 L.R.A. 686, 112 Am. St. Rep. 98, 61 Atl. 502, 3 Ann. Cas. 874; Re Lyon, 24 Wash. L. Rep. 679; Dennison v. Christian, 72 Neb. 703, 117 Am. St. Rep. 817, 101 N. W. 1045, affirmed without opinion in 196 U. S. 637, 49 L. ed. 630, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 795; Re Kuhns, 36 Nev. 487, 50 L.R.A. (N.S.) 507, 137 Pac. 83; Regan v. Jessup, 34 Tex. Civ. App. 74, 77 S. W. 972 (obiter).

This rule was also recognized and applied in Hayes v. Palmer, 21 App. D. C. 450, the court saying: "The decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, heretofore cited, all indicate that the actual presence of the accused in the demanding state, at the time of the commission of the crime as charged in the indictment, is an essential condition of extradition. . . . It remains to apply the doctrine enounced to the special facts in the case at bar." And it was held not to have been shown that the accused was not present.

So, in People ex rel. Meeker v. Baker, 142 App. Div. 598, 25 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 498, 127 N. Y. Supp. 382, the rule was recognized that "that question [whether as a matter of fact the relator was a fugitive within the meaning of the extradition laws] depended for its solution upon whether the relator was physically present in the state of Texas [the demanding state] at the time of the the state of Indiana to the state of Oklahoma; that on the 1st day of December, 1912, petitioner was declared a delinquent, and his parole was revoked. On this state of facts the governor of Indiana presented requisition papers for the said Eugene Williams to the governor of Oklahoma, which were honored by the governor of this state, and his warrant issued for the arrest of petitioner, to be returned to the state of Indiana, as requested by the governor of that state.

Mr. J. G. Harley for petitioner.

Messrs. Munden & Staley for the State.

Furman, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

When this matter was presented to the governor of Oklahoma, he properly referred it to the attorney general for legal advice. The attorney general advised the governor that, to be a fugitive from justice under the commission of the alleged crime,"—the court holding that the evidence sufficiently showed that the relator was in fact in the demanding state at the time of the commission of the offense in question, and during the accomplishing of the purposes of the conspiracy for which he had been indicted.

And in People ex rel. Genna v. McLaughlin, 145 App. Div. 513, 130 N. Y. Supp. 458, which reversed an order dismissing a writ of habeas corpus and remitted the matter to the court below for a determination by it of the question whether the relator was in fact a fugitive from justice,—the court below having held that, inasmuch as there was a conflict of testimony on this point, it had not the power to determine that the relator had not been in the demanding state at the time of the commission of the crime,—the rule was recognized that, to be a fugitive from justice subject to extradition, the accused must have been within the demanding state at the time of the commission of the alleged offense; the court saying: "Before a warrant of extradition can be sustained, it must appear as a jurisdictional fact that the prisoner is a fugitive from justice; that is, it must be shown that he was actually present in the demanding state when the crime was committed."

So, the mere subsequent presence of a person in a state on business, for one day, eight days after the alleged commission of an offense therein, and months before complaint is made or an indictment found against him therefor, does not, upon his leaving the state after the conclusion of his business, render him a fugitive from justice within the meaning of the United States statute. "He must have been there when the crime was committed, as alleged, and if not, a subsequent going there and coming away is not a flight." Hyatt v. New York, 188 U. S. 691, 47 L. ed. 657, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 456, 12 Am. Crim. Rep. 311, affirming 172 N. Y. 176, 60 L.R.A. 774, 92 Am. St. 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

act of Congress, it is not necessary that the person charged with having left the state in which the crime was alleged to have been committed did so for the purpose of avoiding a prosecution anticipated or begun, but simply that, having within a state committed a crime against the laws, leaves such state, and, when he is sought to be subjected to its criminal process to answer for his offense, he is found within the territory of another state. In support of this proposition, the attorney general cited the following authorities: Ex parte Dickson, 4 Ind. Terr. 481, 69 S. W. 943; Op. Gov. Fairfield (Me.) 24 Am. Jur. 226; State ex rel. Burner v. Richter, 37 Minn. 436, 35 N. W. 9; Re Voorhees, 32 N. J. L. 141; People ex rel. Draper v. Pinkerton, 17 Hun, 199; Johnson v. Ammons, 6 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 747, 7 Am. L. Rec. 662; Hibler v. State, 43 Tex. 197; Roberts v. Reilly, 116 U. S. 80, 29 L. ed. 544, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 291;

Rep. 706, 64 N. E. 825, which reversed 72 App. Div. 629, 76 N. Y. Supp. 1026.

And the fact that one charged with the commission of a crime within a state went to and was in that state after his indictment, and subsequently left it again, does not operate to constitute him a fugitive from justice, if in fact he was not there at the time of the commission of the crime. Hayes v. Palmer, supra

But in Ex parte Knowles, 17 Ky. L. Rep. 588, it was held that, although one charged with a crime in a state was not actually present in the state at the time when the crime was committed, he becomes a fugitive from justice within the meaning of the Constitution and statute of the United States regarding extradition, by going into the state after the commission of the crime, thus subjecting himself to its jurisdiction, and then leaving the state.

No constructive presence.

Supplementing note in 28 L.R.A. 289.

The recent cases also agree with the earlier ones, that the mere constructive presence of an accused in the demanding state at the time of the alleged commission there of the crime with which he is charged is not sufficient to render him a fugitive from justice subject to extradition. Munsey v. Clough, 106 U. S. 364, 49 L. ed. 515, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 282 (obiter); Hayes v. Palmer, 21 App. D. C. 450 (obiter); Re Lyon, 24 Wash. L. Rep. 679; People ex rel. Meeker v. Baker, 142 App. Div. 598, 25 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 498, 127 N. Y. Supp. 382; People ex rel. Genna v. McLaughlin, 145 App. Div. 513, 130 N. Y. Supp. 458.

Setting crime in motion.

"It is a well-settled doctrine that a person who departs from a jurisdiction after having committed an act in furtherance of a crime subsequently consummated is a fugi-

We are of the opinion that the advice of the attorney general to the governor states the law correctly. In further support of this proposition, we desire to cite the case of Drinkall v. Spiegel, 68 Conn. 441, 36 L.R.A. 486, 36 Atl. 830. In that case the supreme court of Connecticut held that a prisoner who violates a parole, and goes into another state, is a fugitive from justice within the provisions of the United States Constitution and laws, and that such person is subject to extradition.

There is but one question in this case, and that is the legality of the revocation of the parole of petitioner; but this is a question for the courts of Indiana, for they alone have the right to construe their Constitution and laws. When the governor's action in any matter is authorized by law, it is our duty to sustain such action, and we take great pleasure in doing so. We find that the governor's action in this case is entirely proper, and within the law, and it is therefore upheld and sustained, and the writ is denied, and any officer of the state of Oklahoma who may now have petitioner in his custody is directed to surrender him to the duly authorized representative of the state of Indiana, in obedience to the governor's warrant issued in this proceeding. It is further ordered that the extradition papers may be withdrawn from the files by the attorneys representing the state of Indiana.

tive from justice, and subject to extradition." State ex rel. Rinne v. Gerber, 111 Minn. 132, 126 N. W. 482.

"The criminal need not do within the state every act necessary to complete the crime. If he does there an overt act which is, and is intended to be, a material step toward accomplishing the crime, and then absents himself from the state and does the rest elsewhere, he becomes a fugitive from justice when the crime is complete, if not before. . . . For all that is necessary to convert a criminal under the laws of a state into a fugitive from justice is that he should have left the state after having incurred guilt there, . . . and his overt act becomes retrospectively guilty when the contemplated result ensues." Strassheim v. Daily, 221 U. S. 280, 55 L. ed. 735, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 558.

So, if one charged with conspiracy within a state was present in that state when any act material in carrying out the objects of the conspiracy was done, his subsequent departure from the state renders him a fugitive from justice within the meaning of the United States Constitution and statute regarding extradition. Ex parte Hoffstot, 180 Fed. 240, affirmed without opinion in 218 U. S. 665, 54 L. ed. 1201, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 222.

And one charged with the crime of keeping and managing a house for gambling within a state, on a certain date, who went into that state and opened the gaming-house shortly before the date alleged, and went frequently between it and his residence in another state, after that date, may be a fugitive from justice subject to extradition, although he was not within the state demanding him, on the precise date alleged. Hayes v. Palmer, 21 App. D. C. 450.

The purpose of the flight.

It is not necessary that one charged with a crime should have left the state in which the crime is alleged to have been committed, for fear of arrest, or for the purpose of avoiding prosecution, anticipated or begun, but it is sufficient to render him a fugitive subject to extradition, simply that he is charged with the commission of a crime within the state, at a time when he was there, and when he is sought to be subjected to the state's criminal process for the crime, he has left its jurisdiction and is found in another state. Ex parte Hoffstot, supra; Re Galbreath, 24 N. D. 582, 139 N. W. 1050; Com. ex rel. Burlingame v. Hare, 36 Pa. Super. Ct. 125.

So, the fact that one charged with the commission of a crime in one state, and found in another state when proceedings were begun for his prosecution, left the first state openly, and not in flight, or with any intent to avoid arrest, does not prevent his being a fugitive from justice. Taylor v. Wise, — Iowa, —, 126 N. W. 1126.

Nor is it material that he left the first state openly and in the legitimate pursuit of his business. Re Bruce, 132 Fed. 390, affirmed on opinion below in 69 C. C. A. 342, 136 Fed. 1022.

And the mere fact that a person charged with the commission of a crime within a state had no belief, when he left that state, that he had violated its criminal laws, and did not "consciously" flee from justice in order to avoid prosecution, when he left the state, does not prevent his being a fugitive from justice within the meaning of the provisions of the United States Constitution and statute relating to extradition proceedings. Appleyard v. Massachusetts, 203 U. S. 222, 51 L. ed. 161, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 122, 7 Ann. Cas. 1073.

One who was within a state at the time of the commission thereof of a crime with which he is charged, and who has since left the state,—no matter for what purpose, or with what motive, or under what belief, —is a fugitive from the justice of that state within the meaning of the provisions of the Constitution and laws of the United States with reference to extradition. Ibid.; Bassing v. Cady, 208 U. S. 386, 52 L. ed. 540, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 392, 13 Ann. Cas. 905; Re Bloch, 87 Fed. 981; Depoilly v. Palmer, 28 App. D. C. 324.

So, the fact that one charged with the commission of a crime within a state was in that state after his indictment, and did not leave to escape a pursuing officer,—no effort having been made to arrest him there,—does not operate to relieve him from liability to extradition as a fugitive from justice, if he was in the state at the time of the commission of the crime, and subsequently left. Hayes v. Palmer supra.

And a person charged with the commission of a crime within a state, for which he has been indicted a second time, after the dismissal of an indictment on which he was extradited, is none the less a fugitive from justice within the meaning of the provisions of the Constitution and laws of the United States with reference to extradition, because, after the dismissal of the first indictment, he left the state with the knowledge of, and without objection by, the state authorities. Bassing v. Cady, 208 U. S. 386, 52 L. ed. 540, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 392, 13 Ann. Cas. 905.

And the fact that one charged with a crime in a state remained in that state for some time after the commission of the crime, then moved to another state, remaining in constant communication with the authorities in the first state, or at least his whereabouts being well known to them, and later moved from the second state to a third state, where he has lived a number of years, does not prevent his being a fugitive from justice, subject to extradition from the third state to the first. Coleman v. State, 53 Tex. Crim. Rep. 93, 113 S. W. 17.

A citizen of one state who goes into and commits a crime in another state, and then returns to his home, is a fugitive from justice within the meaning of the provisions of the United States Constitution relating to extradition. Re Hess, 5 Kan. App. 763, 48 Pac. 596.

And "if a person commits a crime and withdraws himself from the state where he has committed it, without any thought of fleeing from justice, but for the purpose of going to his own home, he is still, within the extradition laws, a fugitive from justice of the state in which he has committed the crime." Dennison v. Christian, 72 Neb. 703, 117 Am. St. Rep. 817, 101 N. W. 1045, affirmed without opinion in 196 U. S. 637, 49 L. ed. 630, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 795.

The fact that one charged with the crime of obtaining money under false pretenses in a certain state left that state with the consent of the complaining witness, and for the purpose of raising money to repay him, does not prevent the accused from being a fugitive subject to extradition. Re Galbreath, 24 N. D. 582, 139 N. W. 1050, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

But in Re Tod, 12 S. D. 386, 47 L.R.A. 566, 70 Am. St. Rep. 616, 81 N. W. 637, 12 Am. Crim. Rep. 303, it was held that one who had left a state in which he was charged with having committed a crime, and had come into another state, with the knowledge, and at the special request, and as an employee, and in pursuance of the business, of the individual alleged to have been injured by the crime, and who was seeking his return, was not a fugitive from justice subject to extradition.

Prisoner in custody.

Generally, as to extradition of person who is under confinement in asylum state, see note to Re Opinion of Justices, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 799, which considers the question of precedence between the two jurisdictions, as to such person.

In People ex rel. American Surety Co. v. Benham, 71 Misc. 345, 128 N. Y. Supp. 610, it is said (obiter) that if a person who has been convicted of a crime in a state court is incarcerated in a Federal prison outside of the state, under a judgment of a Federal court, he will be, under the Constitution of the United States and the act of Congress governing such cases, technically a fugitive from justice, subject to extradition upon the expiration of his sentence under the Federal judgment.

But one who has been convicted of a crime within a state and sentenced to imprisonment is not a fugitive from justice within the meaning of the United States Constitution, while he is passing through an adjoining state in charge of a duly qualified officer of the first state, who is conveying him to a penitentiary. Re Maney, 20 Wash. 509, 72 Am. St. Rep. 130, 55 Pac. 930, Prisoner under parole.

One who, having been convicted of a crime and sentenced and subsequently paroled, violates his parole and leaves the state, is a fugitive from justice. Hughes v. Pfanz, 71 C. C. A. 234, 138 Fed. 980; EX PARTE WILLIAMS.

And a prisoner in a reformatory, who, having been paroled with the direction and permission to go to one state, violates his parole by going to another state, is a fugitive from justice. Drinkall v. Spiegel, 68 Conn. 441, 36 L.R.A. 486, 36 Atl. 830.

OKLAHOMA SUPREME COURT. (Division No. 1.)

CITY OF SHAWNEE, Plff. in Err.,

v.
FANNIE W. CHEEK, Admr., etc., of James Cheek, Deceased.

(— Okla. —, 137 Pac. 724.)

Negligence — unsafe premises — trespasser.

1. A landowner owes a trespasser a duty, in respect to safety from dangerous artificial condition of premises, not to injure him intentionally or wantonly.

Evidence — unsafe premises — recklessness.

2. A mere omission, although superficially characterized by mere thoughtlessness or heedlessness, but, in its deeper explanation, involving a reckless disregard for the safety of merely technical and reasonably anticipated trespassers, such as children of tender years, especially if unconscious trespassers, in respect to obviously and seriously dangerous artificial condition of premises, may amount to wantonness in a landowner; but the attractiveness and accessibility of the place or thing involving such danger to, and the probability of, such trespassers, the gravity of the danger in such condition, the length of time such condition has existed, the smallness of cost and of deprivation of beneficial use involved in eliminating same, and the reasonableness of the inference that the landowner, as a person of ordinary sensibilities and prudence, knew or should have known of, and under all the facts and circumstances in the case, should have eliminated, such danger, are proper considerations in determining whether there was such reckless disregard for the safety of such trespassers.

Trespass — by child.

3. A child under seven years of age, or, in the absence of evidence of capacity, between seven and fourteen years of age, is presumed to be incapable of guilt of more than technical trespass, as affecting question of duty of owner in respect to dangerous condition of premises, and the character of the trespass may be a circumstance to be considered by the jury in ascertaining whether there is contributory negligence.

Death — statutory action for.

4. Section 4313, Stat. 1893 (§ 5281, Rev. Laws 1910), does not operate as a continuance of any right of action which the injured person would have had but for his death, but confers upon the beneficiary thereof a property right in the pecuniary value to him of the life of his decedent, and gives him a new or independent cause of action for the pecuniary loss he has sustained by reason of such death.

Abatement — action for personal injury.

5. A cause of action arising under § 4313, Stat. 1893 (§ 5281, Rev. Laws 1910), has the quality of survivability, is not extinguished by the death of the beneficiary therein, and may be revived and prosecuted in the name of his administratrix.

Pleading — dangerous premises — injury to child.

6. A petition which does not allege facts from which a reckless disregard for the safety of reasonably anticipated technical, if not unconscious, trespassers, amounting to wantonness, appears as a legal conclusion, nor the ultimate fact of reckless disregard for the safety of such trespassers amounting to wantonness, is not sufficient, as against a demurrer, to warrant a recovery of damages for death resulting to such trespasser from dangerous artificial condition of defendant's premises.

(December 23, 1913.)

ERROR to the District Court for Pottawatomie County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor, in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of her son. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. E. E. Hood, W. M. Engart, and W. T. Williams for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Blakeney & Maxey for defendant in error.

Thacker, C., filed the following opinion:

The plaintiff in error will be designated as defendant, and defendant in error as plaintiff, in accord with their respective titles in the trial court.

About May 24, 1908, defendant owned and possessed, within its corporate limits, a brick pump house, with three rooms, in one of which there was a pump pit about

Note. — Generally, as to the duty of property owner to trespassing child, see note to Walsh v. Pittsburgh R. Co. 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 559. The doctrine of attractive nuisance is discussed at length in the note to Cahill v. E. B. & A. L. Stone & Co. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1094. For the specific application of that doctrine to ponds, reservoirs, waterways, etc., see page 1143 of that note, and the supplemental note to Thompson v. Illinois C. R. Co. 47 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1101. Many cases on other phases of the general doctrine which have appeared since the note first referred to may be found by consulting the L.R.A. Digest, under the title "Negligence."

As to whether or not the statutory action for wrongful death survives to the personal representatives of the original beneficiary, 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

see note to Gilkeson v. Missouri P. R. Co. 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 844. The related question as to the right of the beneficiary next entitled to maintain an action for negligent death, where the beneficiary first entitled does not bring action, is discussed in the note to Hammond v. Lewiston, A. & W. Street R. Co. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 78, which includes some cases where the beneficiary first entitled commenced the action, but died before recovering judgment.

The right to recover for ordinary negligence under an allegation of gross, wilful, or wanton negligence, or vice versa, is treated in the note to Rideout v. Winnebago Traction Co. 69 L.R.A. 601. As to sufficiency of general allegations of negligence, see note to King v. Oregon Short Line R. Co. 59 L.R.A. 209.

11 feet deep, and covering practically the entire floor space of the room, except a walk way about 10 feet wide on one side. This pump house was on an unbuilt-up and little used portion of a public street within the corporate limits of defendant, and was in a valley about 75 or 100 yards, according to one witness, or 350 or 440 yards, according to other witnesses, south from the south end of the built-up and more traveled portion of this street, which built-up and more traveled portion of the street extends downward, and ends on the south side of a hill north of the valley. About 75 or 80 yards south of the pump house was the channel of the North Canadian river, with which the pump house pit was connected by a pipe. About 200 yards from the pump house was a race track and within 60 or 70 feet of the pump house were the stables connected, in use or purpose, with the race track. The defendant had used the pump house in connection with its system of waterworks; but three or four years before the date mentioned, had taken its pump and pumping equipment away from the pit and building, and had abandoned use of the same because of the flooding of the pump pit through its said pipe connection on the occasion of a rise in the river. The pipe from the river entered the pump pit about 12 or 18 inches above its bottom, which it appears was above the ordinary level of the water in the river; but plaintiff, in her testimony, mentioned three occasions on which the pump pit had been flooded by rises from the river. After defendant abandoned the pump house, it was, with the knowledge and consent of a member of defendant's council, occasionally used by parties having animals in the race track stables for storage of hay; but on May 24, 1908, when, as a result of a rise in the river commencing about two days before, there was about 9 feet of water in the pump pit, there was no hay in the pump house except a remnant scattered about over the floor and on the surface of the water, which hay on the water had been raised, by the rising of the water, from the bottom of the pump pit. The defendant had made no other use of the premises for three or four years. The glass, if not the sash, had disappeared from the windows, the doors had fallen into a dilapidated condition, both doors and windows were open, and such had been the condition during the greater portion of the time of defendant's abandonment of its use of the pump house. James Cheek, the original plaintiff, and Fannie W. Cheek, in whose name, as administratrix, the action was revived, on May 24, 1908, resided with their family 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

outside of defendant's corporate limits, about 150 yards from the pump house, and their children, as well as other children in that vicinity, played about the pump house during the time of its abandonment. The plaintiff's children also hunted eggs in the hay in the pump house; but plaintiff forbade her children playing about the same. The evidence does not show that defendant had actual knowledge of such use of its premises by children, nor actual knowledge of the coat of hay on the surface of the water, nor of the depth or fact of water in the pump pit at the time of the accident. On May 24, 1908, the original plaintiff, with Thompkins Cheek, the nine-year-old son of the two successive plaintiffs, and an older son, had occasion to be, and were, near the pump house; but the father and older boy went a short distance away in a boat, leaving Thompkins Cheek to watch some hogs near the pump house, and, when the father and older boy, soon after, returned, Thompkins Cheek could not be found. In the afternoon of the same day the body of Thompkins Cheek was found drowned on the bottom of the pump pit. At that time the surface of the water in the pit was practically covered with hay that was dry on top, although at places the hay was very thin in its covering, and, by close observation, the water could not only be seen through the hay at places, but there were open spaces from the size of a man's hand to a foot or more square where the same could be seen. It appears inferentially that Thompkins Cheek, for some unknown purpose, although probably to gratify an instinctive curiosity or desire to re-explore the silent chambers of the deserted building, and possibly lounge upon the hay he thought to find therein, or to search for hens' nests, or to gratify some other boyish impulse, had entered the pump house through an open door, had stepped upon the dry hay, apparently, to his view, covering the surface of the water in the pit, without knowledge of there being water in the same, and, the surface of the water being about 2 feet below the top of the pit, had been unable to extricate himself. The evidence shows he had been an industrious boy, and helped his parents, not only by work in the field, but by doing chores about the house, and his father, who died about ten months later, was sixty-one years of age when he was drowned.

This action was begun by petition filed August 6, 1908; but no trial was had until November 11, 1911, when a verdict for $2,000 was returned for plaintiff.

The case presents the vexed question of the liability of a landowner for personal injuries and death resulting from a child trespasser's contact with a dangerous condition of the premises.

In 1841 Lord Denman, Ch. J., in Lynch v. Nurdin, 1 Q. B. 29, 4 Perry & D. 672, 10 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 73, 5 Jur. 797, sustained a verdict for an injury upon a plaintiff under seven years of age, who, with several other children, was playing with defendant's horse and cart in a public street, where same had been left unattended for half an hour, when another boy, by leading, caused the horse to move, and plaintiff, falling from the shaft, was run over by a wheel of the cart, and suffered a fractured leg.

That appears to be the first case in which an owner of property, without actual intent to injure, or actually setting in motion a force or setting a trap from which injury resulted, had been held liable for personal injuries caused by trespasser's contact with a dangerous condition of his property, not aside from and so near a public highway as to be dangerous to travelers getting off the same, although other cases are there cited as if supporting the conclusions there reached.

It appears that there was no extended discussion of the doctrine announced in that case until after the decision of the turntable case (Stout v. Sioux City & P. R. Co. 2 Dill. 294, Fed. Cas. No. 13,504, affirmed in 17 Wall. 657, 21 L. ed. 745), in 1873; but, with the great volume of litigation involving the same that has followed, a war of conflicting ideas has since raged with unabated vigor about this doctrine. The doctrine, apparently without good reason, is known as the "attractive nuisance" doctrine.

The cases sustaining the doctrine, or allowing a recovery, have not only based their conclusions in some instances upon somewhat different grounds, but are not agreed as to the limitations which should be placed upon the doctrine, and this has been urged by some of the critics as evidence of lack of solidity in any ground whatever for the doctrine.

In answer to the argument that the special attractiveness of the thing or place was an implied or constructive invitation to children, it has been said that the condition or use of land by its owner is not intended as such invitation; that the distinction between invitation and temptation is ignored by such argument; that there are but few things or places not attractive to children, and that it is difficult, if not impossible, to find and mark out, so that landowners may be able to see and know, the boundary line between the things or places that are, and the things and places that are not, so attractive as to constitute 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

such invitation, and render them liable for injuries to trespassing children coming in contact with such things or places; but the duty to use ordinary care for the safety for one by invitation upon the premises is indisputable, and most of the cases in which there is any attempt to find the principle upon which recovery is allowed do so on that of such invitation.

In answer to the argument that the landowner may be held liable upon the ground of an implied intent to injure, it has been said that it is absurd to imply such intent where it is clear that it does not in fact exist; but, of course, the duty and the liability for negligence in a breach of the duty to abstain from intentionally injuring even a trespasser, unless in the lawful exercise of the right of defense or expulsion, is indisputable.

In answer to the argument that the maxim of sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas (which, literally translated, means, "enjoy your own property in such a manner as to not injure that of another person") requires the landowner to exercise care to make his premises so safe as to avoid injury to trespassing children who may come in contact with a dangerous condition of the same, it has been said that the true legal meaning of this maxim is, "so use your own property as not to injure the rights of another," and that, as a trespasser has no right to be upon the landowner's premises, this maxim is inapplicable, and, although we express no opinion on this point, in Walker v. Potomac, F. & P. R. Co. (Pannill v. Potomac, F. & P. R. Co.) 105 Va. 226, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 80, 115 Am. St. Rep. 871, 53 S. E. 113, 8 Ann. Cas. 862, 20 Am. Neg. Rep. 221, the court said there might be more, but there was one conclusive answer to this argument, in that the maxim referred to only acts of the landowner the effect of which extended beyond the limits of his property.

In the well-considered case of Bottom v. Hawks, 84 Vt. 370, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 440, 79 Atl. 858, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 1026, 3 N. C. C. A. 186, decided May 8, 1911, the doctrine is condemned, and that court's conception of the status and tendency of judicial opinion, both in England and this country, on the subject, seems worthy of statement here, and appears in the following extract from the opinion: "As said by (now) Mr. Justice Lurton, in Felton v. Aubrey, 20 C. C. A. 436, 43 U. S. App. 278, 74 Fed. 350, 7 Am. Neg. Cas. 405: 'It seems to us that many of the American cases which we have cited fail to draw the proper distinction between the liability of an owner of premises to persons who sustain injuries as a result of the mere condition of the premises, and those who come to harm by reason of the subsequent conduct of the licensor inconsistent with the safety of persons permitted to go upon the premises and who he was bound to anticipate might avail themselves of his license. This seems to be sharply emphasized in the case of Corby v. Hill, 4 C. B. N. S. 556, 27 L. J. C. P. N. S. 318, 4 Jur. N. S. 512, 6 Week. Rep. 575, and is a distinction which should not be overlooked.' . . . Some uncertainty, however, seems to have existed in England as to the standing of the case, and much inconsistency appears in the English cases since decided (a review of which is found in Friedman v. Snare & T. Co. 71 N. J. L. 605, 70 L.R.A. 147, 108 Am. St. Rep. 764, 61 Atl. 401, 2 Ann. Cas. 497); but all doubt is now set at rest by the recent case of Cooke v. Midland G. W. R. Co. [1909] A. C. 229, [1909] 2 I. R. 499, 78 L. J. P. C. N. S. 76, 100 L. T. N. S. 626, 25 Times L. R. 375, 5 Ann. Cas. 557, wherein the Lynch Case is expressly approved, and its doctrine applied to a turntable case. . . . Notwithstanding the unstable foundation upon which the Stout Case stands, it was expressly approved and adhered to in Union P. R. Co. v. McDonald, 152 U. S. 262, 38 L. ed. 434, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 619, and must, doubtless, be accepted as the law of that court. . . . It must be admitted that a majority of the cases adopt the rule of the Stout Case. The list includes Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Crocker, 131 Ala. 584, 31 So. 561; Barrett v. Southern P. Co. 91 Cal. 296, 25 Am. St. Rep. 186, 27 Pac. 666; Ferguson v. Columbus & R. R. Co. 77 Ga. 102; Chicago & E. R. Co. v. Fox, 38 Ind. App. 268, 70 N. E. 81; Edgington v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 116 Iowa, 410, 57 L.R.A. 561, 90 N. W. 95; Kansas C. R. Co. v. Fitzsimmons, 22 Kan. 686, 31 Am. Rep. 203; Brown v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 135 Ky. 798, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 717, 123 S. W. 298; Keffe v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. 21 Minn. 207, 18 Am. Rep. 393; Nagel v. Missouri P. R. Co. 75 Mo. 653, 42 Am. McPadden*, 79 Conn. 367, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1101, 65 Atl. 157; Daniels v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 154 Mass. 349, 13 L.R.A. 248, 26 Am. St. Rep. 253, 28 N. E. 283; Ryan v. Co. 218 Pa. 444, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1162, 120 Am. St. Rep. 897, 67 Atl. 768, 11 Ann. Cas. 894; Paolino v. McKendall, 24 R. I. 432, 60 L.R.A. 133, 96 Am. St. Rep. 736, 53 Atl. 268, 12 Am. Neg. Rep. 550; Walker v. Potomac, F. & P. R. Co. (Pannill v. Potomac, F. & P. R. Co.) 105 Va. 226, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 80, 115 Am. St. Rep. 871, 53 S. E. 113, 8 Ann. Cas. 862, 20 Am. Neg. Rep. 221; Ritz v. Wheeling, 45 W. Va. 262, 43 L.R.A. 148, 31 S. E. 993. That there is a strong tendency to limit rather than extend the doctrine is admitted on all sides. 'This tendency is sufficiently shown by the following cases from the states wherein the turntable doctrine is approved: Savannah, F. & W. R. Co. v. Beavers, 113 Ga. 398, 54 L.R.A. 314, 39 S. E. 82, 10 Am. Neg. Rep. 8, which was the case of a five-year-old boy drowned in a pool formed in an excavation on the premises of the plaintiff in error; Stendal v. Boyd, 73 Minn. 53, 42 L.R.A. 288, 72 Am. St. Rep. 597, 75 N. W. 735, which was the case of a boy not quite five years old drowned in a quarry hole on the defendant's premises; Moran v. Pullman Palace Car Co. 134 Mo. 641, 33 L.R.A. 755, 56 Am. St. Rep. 543, 36 S. W. 659, which was the case of a nine-year-old boy drowned in a quarry hole; Dobbins v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 91 Tex. 60, 38 L.R.A. 573, 66 Am. St. Rep. 856, 41 S. W. 62, which was the case of a three-year-old child drowned in a pool of water on defendant's right of way; Richards v. Connell, 45 Neb. 467, 63 N. W. 915, which was the case of a ten-year-old boy drowned in a pond allowed to form on the defendant's premises; Mayfield Water & Light Co. v. Webb, 129 Ky. 395, 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 179, 130 Am. St. Rep. 469, 111 S. W. 712, which was the case of an eleven-year-old boy killed while playing on a telephone guy wire; Harris v. Cowles, 38 Wash. 331, 107 Am. St. Rep. 847, 80 Pac. 537, which was the case of a child of tender years injured while playing with a revolving door; Peters v. Bowman, 115 Cal. 345, 56 Am. St. Rep. 106, 47 Pac. 113, 598, 1 Am. Neg. Rep. 4, which was the case of an eleven-year-old boy drowned in a pond of surface water which was allowed to stand on defendant's lot. Other cases, like Brown v. Salt Lake City, 33 Utah, 222, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 619, 126 Am. St. Rep. 828, 93 Pac. 570, 14 Ann. Cas. 1004; Pekin v. McMahon, 154 Ill. 141, 27 L.R.A. 206, 45 Am. St. Rep.

114, 39 N. E. 484; Indianapolis Water Co. v. Harold, — Ind. App. —, 79 N. E. 542; and Price v. Atchison Water Co. 58 Kan. 551, 62 Am. St. Rep. 625, 50 Pac. 450, 3 Am. Neg. Rep. 392,—with much more consistency, apply the doctrine to the cases of open conduits, ditches, and water holes, and hold the landowner liable."

It appears that Illinois (see St. Louis V. & T. R. Co. v. Bell, 81 Ill. 76, 25 Am. Rep. 269, and Pekin v. McMahon, 154 Ill. 141, 27 L.R.A. 206, 45 Am. St. Rep. 114, 39 N. E. 484) and Tennessee (see East Tennessee & W. N. C. R. Co. v. Cargille, 105 Tenn. 628, 59 S. W. 141, 9 Am. Neg. Rep. 200, and Bates v. Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. 90 Tenn. 36, 25 Am. St. Rep. 665, 15 S. W. 1069) should also be included in the first foregoing enumeration of states favoring the doctrine.

In Uthermohlen v. Bogg's Run Min. & Mfg. Co. 50 W. Va. 457, 55 L.R.A. 911, 88 Am. St. Rep. 884, 40 S. E. 410, the court said that the doctrine of the turntable cases shifted the duty of watchfulness and care from the shoulders of parents, where the Creator had placed it, to the shoulders of the landowners using their property to make a living, and thus materially detracted from the full ownership of property, sacred under the Constitution; but we only refer to that statement as an extreme view.

In Ryan v. Towar, 128 Mich. 463, 55 L.R.A. 310, 92 Am. St. Rep. 481, 87 N. W. 644, the doctrine is also condemned, and the court, in criticism, referred to an application thereof in a Kansas case, and said: "Here we have the doctrine of the turntable cases carried to its natural and logical result. We have only to add that every man who leaves a wheelbarrow or a lawnmower or a spade upon his lawn, a rake, with its sharp teeth pointing upward, upon the ground or leaning against a fence, a bed of mortar prepared for use in his new house, a wagon in his barnyard, upon which children may climb, and from which they may fall, or who turns in his lot a kicking horse or cow with calf,—does so at the risk of having the question of his negligence left to a sympathetic jury. How far does the rule go? Must his barn door, and the usual apertures through which the accumulations of the stable are thrown, be kept locked and fastened, lest twelve-year-old boys get in and be hurt by the animals, or by climbing into the haymow, and falling from beams? May a man keep a ladder or a grindstone or a scythe or plow or reaper, without danger of being called upon to reward trespassing children, whose parents owe and may be presumed to perform the duty of restraint? Does the new rule go still further, and make it necessary for a man to fence his gravel pit or quarry? And, if so, will an ordinary fence do, in view of the known propensity and ability of boys to climb fences? Can a man nowadays safely own a small lake or fish pond, and must he guard ravines and precipices upon his land? Such is the evolution of the law less than thirty years after the decision of Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, 17 Wall. 657, 21 L. ed. 745, when, with due deference, we think some of the courts left the solid ground of the rule that trespassers cannot recover for injuries received and due merely to negligence of the persons trespassed upon."

In the same case it is further said in the opinion: "That a landowner is under no obligation to use care to protect a trespasser is a broad, and, until recently, undisputed, rule without exception; liability for injuries sustained by such being limited to cases of intentional or wanton injuries. The rule, with this limitation, is sustained to-day by the great weight of authority. It is contended by some lawwriters, and has been held in some cases, that an exception exists in favor of children of tender years. The varying reasons given should lead us to doubt the solidity of the foundations upon which these cases rest, especially when none of the reasons are of recognized authority. The law has never before denied the liability of children for trespass because of tender years. On the contrary, it was intimated in Mangan v. Atterton, L. R. 1 Exch. 239, 35 L. J. Exch. N. S. 161, 14 L. T. N. S. 411, 14 Week. Rep. 771, 4 Hurlst. & C. 388, that a four-year-old boy was a trespasser under the circumstances of that case, and there are numerous cases cited in this opinion where liability is denied upon that, and no other, ground. The assertion that the weight of authority supports the plaintiff's contention in this case seems to us incorrect. It may be true that, in cases involving turntables, a majority of the cases, which are necessarily few, have followed the case of Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, supra, but there should be a legal principle underlying the rule laid down in that case, and that principle has been assiduously sought for by some of the courts, without success, as we have seen."

In the case of Wheeling & L. E. R. Co. v. Harvey, 77 Ohio St. 235, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1136, 122 Am. St. Rep. 503, 83 N. E. 66, 11 Ann. Cas. 981, 21 Am. Neg. Rep. 272, decided in 1907, where much of the case law upon the doctrine is very ably reviewed, and the doctrine condemned by the Ohio court, in speaking of the opinion of Judge Hooker in Ryan v. Towar, supra, it is said: "Of the case of Powers v. Harlow, 53 Mich. 507, 51 Am. Rep. 154, 19 N. W. 257, in which the opinion is by Judge Cooley, and which is quoted from at some length in Union P. R. Co. v. McDonald, 152 U. S. 262, 38 L. ed. 434, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 619, as approving the turntable doctrine, he says: 'Clearly this does not adopt the rule of Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout.'

In Powers v. Harlow, supra, Judge Cooley said: "A man of ordinary prudence, if told that so dangerous an article was so carelessly stored, might well have deemed the statement incredible,"—and, although it is not expressly so stated in the opinion, the act for which a recovery was there allowed appears to have been wanton in its reckless indifference to the safety of others.

In the case of Ritz v. Wheeling, 45 W. Va. 262, 43 L.R.A. 148, 31 S. E. 993, the court, in speaking of the original turntable case, said: It, "if carried to the length to which it is sought to be carried, would exact of every property owner the utmost watchfulness, vigilance, and expenditure to guard against hurt to children, else he would be every moment in danger of ruinous damages. It attacks the right of free use of one's property in lawful business. A railroad liable because it happened to leave a turntable unlocked, as turntables often are, on its own track,—a necessary appliance in a lawful business! Ought a farmer to be liable for failing to put a picket fence around his pond necessary for his cattle? If he does not, some little boy will climb the fence into the farmer's field, drown in the pond, and the farmer is sued on the same principle. The dam that contains water to turn the mill wheel, having a path around it shaded with willows, is very alluring to the child and the man. Must the miller inclose it? The canal, with its towpath and frogs, is very attractive to the little boy or girl, and dangerous, too. If a child drown in it, is the company liable? How many more instances of things useful in lawful business, and withal very attractive to children, and very dangerous, might be put? And the rule contended for says that, if the thing causing the injury be attractive or seductive, the liability attends it. How many things are, or may be, so to children? 'A child's will is the wind's will.' Almost everything will attract some child. The pretty horse, or the bright red mowing machine, or the pond in the farmer's field, the millpond, the canal, the railroad cars, the moving carriage in the street, electric works, and infinite other things attract the child, as well as the city's reservoir. To what things is the rule to be limited? And where will not the curiosity, the thoughtlessness, and the agile feet of the truant boy carry him? He climbs into the high barn and the high cherry tree. Are they, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) too, to be watched and guarded against him?"

The authorities are, we believe, agreed that a landowner is in duty bound to abstain from intentionally harming a trespasser, unless in the lawful exercise of the right of defense or expulsion, and, in a very able, if not entirely satisfactory, criticism of the doctrine, to which there has been complimentary reference by several courts, Judge Jeremiah Smith, in an article published in 11 Harvard L. Rev. 349, says: "He is also, by the better view, under a duty to avoid harming the trespasser by negligent acts which result in actively bringing force to bear upon the trespasser."

. . . It is a mooted question whether this duty is confined to cases where the presence of the trespasser is known to the landowner. Some authorities hold that the owner may, in special circumstances, be under a duty to use care to ascertain whether trespassers are present before he sets in motion a force which would be likely to endanger any such persons if within reach. But the alleged duty, if admitted, is material only when it is sought to make the landowner liable for actively bringing force to bear upon the trespasser."

In the Smith article, supra, it is further said: "Upon the crucial inquiry whether the law should impose such a duty upon the landowner, there are considerations of undoubted weight to be urged in favor of either view. A balance must be struck between the benefit to the community of the unfettered freedom of owners to make a beneficial use of their land, and the harm which may be done in particular instances by the use of that freedom. The true ground for the decision is policy, i. e., expediency, in the Benthamic sense of 'the greatest good to the greatest number,' and the advantages to the community on one side and the other are the only matters really entitled to be weighed.' On the one hand, it is the policy of the law to establish rules tending to preserve life, and to protect human beings from serious bodily harm. And this laudable purpose seems frustrated pro tanto by permitting a landowner to pursue with impunity a mode of user which he knows, or ought to know, is likely to occasionally result in the suffering of great harm on the part of some of his neighbor's children. The fact that a defendant neither desired nor intended to bring about a particular result does not necessarily exonerate him. The law not unfrequently holds defendants liable irrespective of their intention to do harm, and in some extreme cases may even hold them liable irrespective of the utmost care on their part, practically making them insurers against all harm resulting from certain classes of acts. 'When a responsible defendant seeks to escape from liability for an act which he had notice was likely to cause temporal damage to another, and which has caused such damage in fact, he must show a justification.' And this doctrine may be assumed to apply even though he had no notice that his act was likely to cause damage to a specific person at a particular moment, but knew only that it was likely to cause damage to some unspecified person at some indefinite time. To escape liability, he must show that there are considerations equal or paramount to those urged in behalf of the plaintiff which justify his conduct notwithstanding the known risk of damage to others therefrom. He must sustain 'a claim of privilege.' On the other hand, the defendant justifies under his right or privilege to make a beneficial use of his own land in methods which will do no harm to persons remaining outside his boundary. The beneficial use of land is a primal necessity, not only to those individual landowners who happen to be defendants in lawsuits, but to the entire human race. 'The business of life must go forward, and the fruits of industry must be protected.' 'It is impossible to carry on the common affairs of life without doing various things which are more or less likely to cause loss or inconvenience to others, or even which obviously tend that way, and this in such a manner that their tendency cannot be remedied by any means short of not acting at all. . . . To say that a man shall not seek profit in business at the expense of others is to say that he shall not do business at all, or that the whole constitution of society shall be altered. Like reasons apply to a man's use of his own land in the common way of husbandry, or otherwise for ordinary and lawful purposes.' It is true that the right of user is never literally absolute, and is always restricted to some extent 'by rights residing in others, and by duties incumbent on the owner.' But it is also true that every restriction diminishes pro tanto the beneficial character of the use, and hence the law imposes restrictions as seldom as possible, and never except upon the strongest grounds. If an opposite policy were pursued, it is easily conceivable that the improvement and beneficial occupation of land might become in fact impossible, and property in the soil for nearly all useful purposes might be annihilated. To say, for instance, that B must keep his land in safe condition to be trespassed upon would often result in practically depriving B of certain modes of beneficial enjoyment, unless he takes precautions which are incompatible with profitable user, and might in effect amount to a confiscation of his land for the benefit of trespassers. The difficulty of restricting the owner without practically destroying his interest is fully recognized by the law. It has been an important factor in inducing courts to refuse to impose restrictions in various instances where the case in behalf of the landowner is not so strong as in the matter now under consideration. We refer to the class of cases where the use of land, instead of harming only those persons who come upon the land, exerts a damaging influence upon persons and property situated beyond the border of the defendant's land. While there are, of course, many acts thus harmfully operating beyond the limits of his land for which an owner is held liable, there are also various acts of user which confessedly have a damaging effect upon persons and things outside the boundary of the land, and which, nevertheless, the law does not prohibit or punish. . . . The courts do not consider it for the interests of the community that the landowner who does not go beyond certain common and generally beneficial acts of user should be called upon to answer for damage thereby done, even where the thing damaged is outside the limits of his land."

Judge Thompson, in his Law of Negligence, vol. 1, § 1031, said: "In respect of the . . . cases . . . of attractive nuisances, it is to be observed that it would be a barbarous rule of law that would make the owner of land liable for setting a trap thereon, baited with stinking meat, so that his neighbor's dog, attracted by his natural instincts, might run into it, and be killed, and which would exempt him from liability for the consequences of leaving exposed and unguarded on his land a dangerous machine, so that his neighbor's child, attracted to it and tempted to intermeddle with commendation the few decisions which thereby be killed, or maimed for life. In view of what has preceded, the author regrets that he cannot say, as he said in his first edition, that such is not the law. He limits himself to expressing the opinion that it ought [not] to be the law, and to citing with commendation the few decisions which hold that it is [not] the law. Nevertheless, a few decisions of enlightened and humane courts are found more or less tending to the conclusion that the owner of any machine or other things which, from its nature, is especially attractive to children, who are likely to attempt to play with it in obedience to their childish instincts, and yet which is especially dangerous to them, —is under the duty of exercising reasonable care to the end of keeping it fastened, guarded, or protected so as to prevent them from injuring themselves while playing or coming in contact with it."

In Shearman & Redfield on the law of Negligence, § 98, it is said: "The overwhelming weight of authority, both in number of decisions and in soundness of reasoning, by which is established the right of little children to recover damages for injuries suffered while trespassing, should alone be sufficient to settle this question. Innocence and mistake are no excuse for a trespass, and therefore one committed by a child is just as truly a trespass as if committed by an adult. The owner of premises has precisely the same right to eject a child therefrom as he has to eject a full-grown man. He has the same right to recover nominal damages in each case. But, when he is sued for damages caused by his negligence towards a trespasser, he finds that there is a wonderful difference between the probable result of the suit if the plaintiff is a child, and the probable result of a like suit by an adult. Is there any intelligible ground of distinction to account for this difference, except that the child is presumably not guilty of conscious negligence, while the man presumably is? When the man proves that he was ignorant of the fact that he was trespassing, or shows that his trespass was only technical, and such as he might reasonably suppose would not be objected to by the defendant, and did not in fact produce any appreciable injury or annoyance, his right to recover is just as good as that of an infant. All this is well settled. And what inference can possibly be drawn from such decisions, if not that the plaintiff's trespass is only a circumstance tending to prove contributory fault upon his part, and not in and of itself such fault or attended with the usual effects of such fault?"

In Whittaker's Smith on Negligence, § 77, it is stated, in the editorial notes, that the rule that a licensee or trespasser ordinarily enters land at his own risk is subject to an exception where the danger is exposed, and such as might be reasonably apprehended, and, in the text, at page 513, in discussing contributory negligence of children, it is said: "The doctrine of contributory negligence is applied to children, and to those having the control of them. In one case, Channell, B., at nisi prius is reported to have said: 'The doctrine of contributory negligence does not apply to an infant of tender age.' This rule is scarcely satisfactory, because it is difficult to say what is or is not a tender age; but a better rule which would probably excuse the negligence of a child of tender age is that a child is only bound to exercise such a degree of care as children of his particular age may be presumed capable of exercising."

In id. p. 66, it is said: "If A digs a hole in his land, and B, who has a right to personal security (but no right to be on the land), falls into it, A's right is paramount to B's, and no question of negligence arises; but, if A had permitted B to come upon his land, the rights would be equal, and questions of negligence would arise, viz.: Whether the pit was negligently left unguarded, and whether B was using his right of being there with care."

And in id. pp. 79-81, it is said: "But such owner will be liable for anything in the nature of a trap upon the premises, known to him, and as to which he gives no warning to the licensee. He must not do anything to alter the premises, so as to be likely to cause injury, without notice to the licensee. Upon the whole I incline to think, with Mr. Campbell, that the owner is bound to take ordinary care with respect to a bare licensee. The question is, as I think, one of great difficulty. It is said that the licensee, being there merely for his own advantage, can only demand that slight care which a gratuitous bailee is bound to display, and so far the proposition is correct; but I am not sure, if a gratuitous bailee were to indicate a place of deposit, whether he would not be undertaking that that particular place was reasonably fit for the deposit; and, if so, a similar agreement would apply to an owner who gives leave to come upon his property, viz.: That he has undertaken that his property is in some degree fit for the licensee to use. If this be so, it seems that he ought to take ordinary care. The courts, however, have distinctly held that the owner is only liable for 'gross' negligence, because he is in the same position as a gratuitous bailee; but I am inclined to think the assumption is not accurate. I think that the question is only further obscured by insisting that the owner must be guilty of an act of commission to render him liable to the licensee. It may be very frequently the case that omissions are slighter neglects than acts of commission; but they may very well be the contrary, and sometimes are so. If the neglect be of a grave and obvious character, it would matter nothing whether it was an omission or commission. For instance, it would matter nothing whether a signalman omitted by grave and obvious negligence to pull the handle to direct an express upon its proper line, or whether he negligently pulled the wrong handle. Where there is something done by the owner which is in the nature of a . . . wanton injury, he will be liable to an action for negligence even by a trespasser, as if an owner of premises with great recklessness shot a trespasser, or if the owner set spring guns upon his premises and injured a trespasser. But where a trespasser took shelter from a storm in a ruinous house not fenced off from the road, and a wall fell upon him and injured him, it was held that he could not recover. Upon this principle it has been held that, where an owner or occupier of lands makes an excavation upon his land so near to a public highway as to be dangerous under ordinary circumstances to persons passing by, it is his duty to take reasonable care to guard such excavation, and he is liable for injuries caused, even if such persons are consciously or unconsciously straying from the way. Where the excavation is at a considerable distance, no such care need be taken. What is a considerable distance, it is impossible to say, and, in truth, each case depends upon its own facts."

We agree with the view of this author that the landowner is bound to take ordinary care with respect to a bare licensee; but, we do so upon the assumption that he uses the expression "ordinary care" as meaning such care as a person of ordinary prudence would usually exercise under the facts and circumstances in such case, although such care be slight in comparison with the care such persons would usually exercise about their own affairs of more than slight importance; and, indeed, §§ 2689 and 2691, Stat. 1890 (§§ 2917 and 2919, Rev. Laws 1910), make it clear that the degrees of care (§ 2688, Stat. 1890, same being § 2916, Rev. Laws 1910) and the degrees of negligence (§ 2690, Stat. 1890 same being § 2918, Rev. Laws 1910) refer to the differences in the degrees such persons usually exercise in their own affairs of different degrees of importance, and not to any difference in degrees of care in the same case or under the same state of facts,—the rule of three such degrees being thus not inconsistent with the rule that the measure of duty and test of negligence and liability is that one degree of care which a person of ordinary prudence would usually exercise under the facts and circumstances of the particular case.

We also agree with the view of this author that, although not usually so, an omission may constitute a greater neglect of duty than an act of commission, so that the rule holding a landowner liable for acts of commission, and not liable for mere omissions, resulting in harm to a bare licensee, is not sound, and is indefensible, and that, "where there is something done" (and we would add, "or omitted") "by the landowner which is in the nature of . . . a wanton injury, he will be liable 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

to an action for injury even to a trespasser." In our opinion what omission or act of commission, free from intent to injure, will amount to wantonness and render the landowner liable to a trespasser, must depend upon the facts and circumstances of each case. The character of the danger and the position of the landowner in respect to his actual knowledge or thoughtlessness of the dangerous condition of his premises, and of its attractiveness and accessibility to merely technical trespassers, especially such as children of tender age, as well as of every other fact and circumstance bearing upon the probability of such trespasses, and the probability of injury to trespassers from contact with such dangerous condition, together with the smallness of the expense or effort required to eliminate such danger, bear upon the question of wantonness, and it is not difficult to conceive of a great variety of instances in which a landowner, indifferent and thoughtless of the safety of other persons, might, without intent to injure, be guilty of unquestionable wantonness.

There appears to be no denial of the doctrine of liability to injured trespassers for wanton acts of a landowner; but a great many of the cases, with which we are unable to agree, in effect, limit such liability to acts of commission, thus holding, in effect, that there can be no wantonness in an omission, or, if so, that it creates no liability to a trespasser, even though the trespass be merely technical and even unconscious. It is no doubt true that wantonness should not be inferred from the mere omission to make safe a dangerous place upon one's premises, in the absence of sufficient evidence to show a reckless disregard for the life, limb, body, or health of another or others; but, if wantonness be proven, we are of opinion that it is immaterial whether it consists of an act of commission or a mere omission.

A principle that appears to be deducible from much of the case law on the subject allowing recovery is that it is not only the duty of a landowner to a trespasser to not injure him intentionally or wantonly, but that an act or omission involving a reckless indifference to the safety of reasonably anticipated technical trespassers, such as children of tender years, although without intent to injure, may be wanton. It is undoubtedly the general rule that a landowner does not owe a trespasser any further or greater duty than this; but his duty to an invited person upon his premises is quite different, and requires of him reasonable care for the safety of such person.

As used in this opinion, the words "wanton," "wantonly," and "wantonness" mean, and are applicable to, acts or omissions of a landowner involving reckless disregard for the safety of such, if any, merely technical trespassers as should in reason have been anticipated by a person of ordinary prudence, and such acts or omissions may be "wanton," "wantonly" done, or the result of "wantonness," although merely thoughtless or heedless in their superficial character, and free from intent to injure.

As stated in book 1, Lewis's Blackstone's Commentaries, p. 117: "The right of personal security consists in a person's legal and uninterrupted enjoyment of his life, his limbs, his body, his health," etc.

In view of the great value and vital importance of this right, and the well-known disposition and lack of self-control in children, we see no sufficient reason why a landowner should not, at least, be deemed in duty bound to make reasonably safe any obviously dangerous, artificial, and attractive condition on his premises, which in character is clearly different from common and well-known dangerous natural conditions, especially when he is able to do so at little or no cost, and without appreciable impairment of his beneficial use of the same, in all cases in which his failure to do so involves reckless disregard for the safety of children of tender years, especially children under seven years of age, or, in the absence of evidence of capacity to be guilty of contributory negligence, under fourteen years of age, as a person of ordinary prudence must anticipate will probably be attracted to, and may come in contact with and be injured by, such dangerous conditions. Is it anything less than wantonness for a landowner, with actual knowledge of such dangerous, artificial, and attractive conditions of his premises, and of facts from which, as a reasonably thoughtful person, he must know that merely technical, if not unconscious, trespassers, in the persons of children living or accustomed to congregate or be near by, may come in contact with and be seriously injured by such dangerous conditions, to abstain from removing the danger of such conditions, especially if he is able to do so at little or no cost, and without appreciable impairment of his beneficial use of the premises?

It may be that parents, by proper example and correctly enforced precepts, can greatly reduce the number of injuries resulting from the trespassing of children and their contact with the dangerous condition of the premises upon which such trespasses are made, especially if the parents have correct and positive convictions, with which the child may be indoctrinated in many ways; but the senses of sight, taste, hearing, touch, and smell in children of tender years are particularly eager for gratification, and their instinctive desire to examine and explore, to them, strange, mysterious and wonderful things and places, generally accentuated by much surplus energy, is often stronger than the influence of even the best and highest degree of parental effort to instruct and restrain.

These are matters of common knowledge, and the moral duty of landowners to supplement the duty of parents in respect to trespassing by children should certainly become a legal one when, under all the facts and circumstances in the case, a failure to do so amounts to wantonness, i. e., a reckless disregard or heedlessness for their safety.

The greater and farther removed from the natural and common in character the danger, and the greater the probability of contact therewith and injury therefrom by persons, especially children of tender years, who are merely technical, if not unconscious, trespassers, and the smaller the expense and inconvenience of eliminating the danger, the clearer appears to be the wantonness.

In the light of the known danger in turntables, high explosives, electric currents, and the like, and the disposition of children, was the act or omission of the landowner in most, if not all, the cases in which recovery for injuries to children has been allowed to stand, anything less than wantonness? We think there is, at least, evidence reasonably tending to prove wantonness in, at least, most of them.

The walls and spaces of a deserted building such as this, where children may play hide and seek, and hunt hens' nests, as the evidence shows they did do about this building, and otherwise gratify their childish instincts, are undoubtedly exceptionally attractive places to children, and an intrusion by children of the age of the deceased child should be presumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, to be not merely a technical, but an unconscious, trespass.

In Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Baroni, 32 Okla. 540, 122 Pac. 926, it was held proper to submit to the jury the question of contributory negligence, permitting the jury to take into consideration the age, experience, and maturity of the child, and the general rule appears to be that a child under seven years of age is incapable as a matter of law, and one between the age of seven and fourteen may or may not be capable, of contributory negligence, depending upon the age, experience, and capacity to understand, to appreciate, and avoid the danger to which the child is exposed under all circumstances of the case, the care required being the same care that a person of the same age, education, and mental and physical capacity uses under like circumstances, and the contributory negligence of such child is usually held to be a question for the jury. See notes to Schoonover v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. Ann. Cas. 1913B, 969; 1 Ann. Cas. 895; 17 Ann. Cas. 353, 14 Am. St. Rep. 590; 49 Am. St. Rep. 408.

In deference to the fact that this is the first time the doctrine of the "turntable cases" has been presented for the consideration of this court, we have quoted quite extensively from authorities touching and illustrating some of the variant views upon the same; but, in respect to such quotations, we do not desire to be understood as approving or disapproving further than expressly shown in this opinion.

In brief for defendant it is urged that it was not in duty bound to keep its unused pump station securely locked and barred from the entrance of children, and that the doctrine of the so-called "turntable" cases is not sound; but the question of wantonness as a ground for recovery is not discussed.

We deem it unnecessary to more specifically point out the logical sequence of the foregoing views touching any question presented by defendant, in view of the necessity of a reversal of this case upon a distinct ground hereinafter shown, except that it appears that the demurrer to the petition should have been sustained, in view of the fact that the allegations do not show a reckless disregard for the safety of such technical trespassers as the deceased boy, and wantonness is not expressly nor by necessary implication alleged.

It is true that the petition alleges facts from which wantonness might be inferred, if the court was at liberty to indulge such inference in favor of the pleader; but, "in the construction of a pleading challenged by demurrer before trial, nothing will be assumed in favor of the pleader which has not been averred, as the law does not presume that a party's pleadings are less strong than the facts of the case warrant." Atwood v. Rose, 32 Okla. 355, 122 Pac. 929.

It is urged by the defendant that the right of action for the death of Thompsons Cheek was personal to and expired with the original plaintiff, the father of the decedent; that it was not susceptible of revival for the reason that it did not exist after the death of the original plaintiff.

Section 4312, Stat. 1893 (§ 5280, Rev. Laws 1910), reads: "No action pending in any court shall abate by the death of either or both of the parties thereto. . . ."

But we do not understand this section to impart the quality of survivability to causes of action which do not have that 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

quality under the next preceding section (§ 4311, Stat. 1893, same being § 5279, Rev. Laws 1910), which reads: "In addition to the causes of action which survive at common law, causes of action for mesne profits, or for an injury to the person, or to real or personal estate, or for any deceit or fraud, shall also survive; and the action may be brought, notwithstanding the death of the person entitled or liable to the same."

These sections of our statutes were adopted from Kansas, and, in two cases decided by the courts of that state before such adoption, language is used which gives some color to the contention that an action for pecuniary loss resulting from death wrongfully caused under § 4313, Stat. 1893 (§ 5281, Rev. Laws 1910), is not within any provision of § 4311, supra; but due examination of these cases will show that this precise question should be regarded as not settled thereby, and as still open.

In Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Rowe, 56 Kan. 411, 43 Pac. 683, the latest of those cases, where a person wrongfully injured commenced action, and, while same was pending, died from another and independent cause, the court held that his entire cause of action for the injury survived, and did not abate under §§ 4311 and 4312, supra; the arguments therein as to the nature of the cause of action given by § 4313, supra, being inapplicable.

In Eureka v. Merrifield, 53 Kan. 794, 37 Pac. 113, the other one of these cases, it is held that § 4311, supra, construed with §§ 4312 and 4313, supra, "only permits actions to survive for injury to the person when death does not result from injury;" but, in that case, the only question was as to the sufficiency of the petition of the parents, as next of kin, suing for their own pecuniary loss sustained by reason of the wrongfully caused death of their child, in the absence of any allegation that the child, at the time of such death, was a nonresident of the state, or that no administrator had been appointed for his estate. The action was for "death" under § 4313, supra, and § 4314, Stat. 1893 (§ 5282, Rev. Laws 1910), and not for the personal injury for which he might have sued had he lived, the survivability of their cause of action was in nowise involved, the quoted holding of the court was apparently foreign to any question before it, and this language no doubt was merely intended to give expression to the indisputable view that the language "or for injury to the person," used in § 4311, supra, does not impart the quality of survivability to the cause of action for death given by § 4313, supra; these two causes of action being separate and distinct.

Section 4311, supra, however, apparently stamps with the quality of survivability every cause of action which would survive at common law, and every cause of action for injury to "personal estate," and, if the cause of action in this case survived the death of James Cheek, the original plaintiff, it must do so because § 4313, supra, does not give a right of action merely for a wrong to a domestic relation or to the person of the beneficiary, but stamps with the character of "estate" or property right the pecuniary interest of the father in the life of the child, at the time of the wrongfully caused death of the latter, which the former is allowed to recover.

Section 4313, supra, reads as follows: "When the death of one is caused by the wrongful act or omission of another the personal representatives of the former, may maintain an action therefor against the latter, if the former might have maintained an action had he lived, against the latter for an injury for the same act or omission. The action must be commenced within two years. The damages . . . must inure to the exclusive benefit of the widow and children, if any, or next of kin, to be distributed in the same manner as personal property of the deceased."

Section 4314, supra, reads as follows: "In all cases where the residence of the party whose death has been caused as set forth in the preceding section, is at the time of his death in any other state or territory, or when, being a resident of this state, no personal representative is or has been appointed, the action provided in the said section may be brought by the widow, or where there is no widow, by the next of kin of such deceased."

The death for which this action was brought occurred prior to the amendment of § 6893 (6261) Stat. 1890, by Sess. Laws 1909, p. 548 (Comp. Laws 1909, § 8985), which went into effect June 10, 1909 (see § 8418, Rev. Laws 1910, for history of act), and, under the provisions of § 6893, supra, the father was the sole heir, and therefore the only "next of kin" of the deceased child.

Section 4067, Stat. 1890 (§ 6586, Rev. Laws 1910), declares all things susceptible of ownership to be property within the meaning of the chapter relating to the nature of property, and § 4068, Stat. 1890 (§ 6587, Rev. Laws 1910), includes among its specifications of what may be owned "rights created, or granted by statute."

In Michigan C. R. Co. v. Vreeland, 227 U. S. 59, 57 L. ed. 417, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 192, an action founded upon the employers' liability act of Congress of 1908 (act April 22, 1908, chap. 149, 35 Stat. at L. 65, U. S. 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Comp. Stat. Supp. 1911, p. 1322), it is said: "The statute, in giving an action for the benefit of certain members of the family of the decedent, is essentially identical with the first act which ever provided for a cause of action arising out of the death of a human being,—that of 9 and 10 Vict. [chap. 93] known as Lord Campbell's act. This act has been, in its distinguishing features, re-enacted in many of the states, and both in the courts of the states and of England has been construed, not as operating as a continuance of any right of action which the injured person would have had but for his death, but as a new or independent cause of action for the purpose of compensating certain . . . members of the family for the deprivation, pecuniarily, resulting to them from his wrongful death."

In the same case Patterson, Railway Accident Law, § 401, is appropriately quoted as stating that the term "pecuniary loss or damage" is judicially employed, in cases arising under such statutes, as follows: "Not only to express the character of that loss to the beneficial plaintiffs which is the foundation of their right of recovery, but also to discriminate between a material loss which is susceptible of a pecuniary valuation, and that inestimable loss of the society and companionship of the deceased relative upon which, in the nature of things, it is not possible to set a pecuniary valuation."

The measure of damages recoverable under § 4313, supra, as held under similar statutes in other jurisdictions, is limited to the pecuniary loss sustained by the beneficiaries therein specified (Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. West, 38 Okla. 581, 134 Pac. 655; St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Long, — Okla. —, 137 Pac. 1156; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Lenahan, 39 Okla. 283, 135 Pac. 383; and Kansas P. R. Co. v. Cutter, 19 Kan. 83, 9 Am. Neg. Cas. 355), and this tends to show that a species of estate, a property right, was conferred upon the father, as next of kin, by this statute.

A recent case holding that a right of action for death under the statutes of Illinois, which do not appear materially different from our own in this respect, accrues immediately upon death, becomes an asset of the estate of the beneficiary, and survives the death of the beneficiary, is that of Union S. B. Co. v. Chaffin, 122 C. C. A. 598, 204 Fed. 412, and in that case the case of Pitkin v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 94 App. Div. 31, 87 N. Y. Supp. 906, which is to the same effect, is cited and quoted.

In notes to Gilkeson v. Missouri P. R. Co. 17 Ann. Cas. 763-776, several cases holding that the action does survive, as well as others holding that the action does not survive, are cited and reviewed, and the following excerpt from that note seems worthy of quotation here: "In other of the foregoing decisions adhering to the view that the action survives, the right of the beneficiary in the action has been considered a property right which is survivable, and passes to his representatives upon his death. In such cases the statute creating the cause of action is construed to create a new cause of action in favor of the beneficiaries for the damages sustained by them, and not as continuing the cause of action which the original deceased might have had if he had survived the injury. Cooper v. Shore Electric Co. 63 N. J. L. 558, 44 Atl. 633; Re Meekin, 164 N. Y. 145, 51 L.R.A. 235, 79 Am. St. Rep. 635, 58 N. E. 50, 8 Am. Neg. Rep. 490; Mundt v. Glokner, 24 App. Div. 110, 48 N. Y. Supp. 940, appeal dismissed in 160 N. Y. 571, 55 N. E. 297; Pitkin v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 94 App. Div. 31, 87 N. Y. Supp. 906. In Re Meekin, 164 N. Y. 145, 51 L.R.A. 235, 79 Am. St. Rep. 635, 58 N. E. 50, 8 Am. Neg. Rep. 490, supra, the court said: 'Thus it appears, both from the statute and the authorities, that the damages awarded for the negligent act are such as result to the property rights of the person or persons for whose benefit the cause of action was created. Nothing is allowed for a personal injury to the personal representatives or to the beneficiaries; but the allowance is simply for injuries to the estate of the latter cause by the wrongful act. The statute, as it has been held, is not simply remedial, but creates a new cause of action in favor of the personal representatives of the deceased, which is wholly distinct from, and not a revivor of, the cause of action, which, if he had survived, he would have had for his bodily injury.' In Cooper v. Shore Electric Co. 63 N. J. L. 558, 44 Atl. 633, the court said: 'The controlling feature in this legislation is that damages are made recoverable for causing death as compensation for the pecuniary injury the designated beneficiaries have sustained by reason of the death. If there be no widow or next of kin at the time of the death of the deceased, the pecuniary injury contemplated by the statute does not exist, and the action cannot be maintained. It is also clear that the pecuniary injury to be compensated for is that of the widow or persons who are next of kin at the time of the death of the deceased, and that the cause of action created by the statute inures to such persons as a vested right. By this statute a property right is created in the beneficiary of such a nature as . . . would give the action the quality of survivorship, and take it out of the 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

maxim, Actio personalis moritur cum persona.' In Haggerty v. Pittston, 17 Pa. Super. Ct. 151, an action by a father for the death of his daughter was continued, upon the father's decease, in the name of his administrator; the court considering the value of the life lost as a species of property which vested in the father. In Thomas v. Maysville Gas Co. 112 Ky. 569, 66 S. W. 308, the survival of an action brought by an administrator for the benefit of a sole beneficiary was sustained; the court holding that the action should be continued by the administrator, and the funds, when collected, held for the estate of the beneficiary. The court said: 'The fact that the defendant to the action succeeded in defeating a recovery until one or more of the beneficiaries died had no effect upon its liability to the administrator.'

But this Kentucky case cannot be regarded as of great weight as authority here, as the Kentucky statutes are materially different from our own.

The New York death statute does not appear unlike our own in any material respect, and in the Meekin Case cited, supra, it is further said in the opinion: "In Quin v. Moore, 15 N. Y. 432, it was held that the interest of the beneficiary was capable of assignment, which is a test of the right to revive. In deciding the case, the court said: 'The interest of Mrs. Kerns was also assignable. In respect to purely personal torts, it is true that at common law the right of action ceases with the life of the injured party. But in this case, although the tort was personal to the child who died, the statute comes in and declares that a right of action shall survive to the administrator. The theory of the statute is that the next of kin have a pecuniary interest in the life of the person killed, and the value of this interest is the amount for which the jury are to give their verdict. Neither the personal wrong or outrage to the decedent, nor the pain and suffering he may have endured, are to be taken into the account. . . . But the claim of the administrator, and through him of the next of kin, is altogether different. The statute imputes to them a direct pecuniary loss in being deprived of a life to them of greater or less value. . . . The interest which a person has in the life of another on whom he is dependent, or to whose services he is entitled, the legislature has chosen to regard as a pecuniary right, a right having the essential attributes of property, so that when it is taken away compensation is due.'"

The Pennsylvania and New Jersey statutes likewise appear substantially the same as our own in every respect material to this question, and in the New Jersey case cited, supra, it is said in the opinion: "The pecuniary injury of the beneficiary begins immediately on the death of the deceased, and is a continuing injury until compensated for under the conditions expressed in the act. Suit must be brought within one year after the death of the deceased; but how long the litigation may be protracted is problematical. If the death of the beneficiary before the end of the litigation discharges the liability of the wrongdoer, the legislative purpose that the wrongdoer should make compensation to the beneficiary for the pecuniary injury sustained by him would be defeated. Such a construction would be contrary to the policy of this legislation, and would thrust into the administration of a statutory proceeding, which our courts have declared should be beneficially construed, a technical rule of the common law of harsh injustice. The death of the beneficiary pending suit will have a controlling influence over the quantum of recovery. The personal injury sustained would be limited in duration and extent to his lifetime. But the death of the beneficiary pending suit cannot be made available to abrogate the liability of the wrongdoer incurred for the pecuniary injury already sustained. The right to compensation vested in the beneficiary immediately upon the death of the deceased. By the death of the beneficiary pending suit, there was neither an abatement of the action in the common-law sense, nor was the cause of action to be compensated for, discharged. It is contended, however, that, inasmuch as the statute does not provide for an executor or administrator for the beneficiary in case of his death before the suit is determined, the action, therefore, abates; but no purpose would be accomplished by introducing such a personal representative into the record. The legislature selected the personal representative of the original deceased as the party by whom the action should be brought, to whom the control of the suit was committed, to conduct it for the benefit of the next of kin."

It follows from what has been said that defendant's contention that the cause of action by the statutes given James Cheek, the father, as next kin of the deceased child, expired upon the death of the said James Cheek about ten months after the death of the child, cannot be sustained, and this action, originally begun by said James Cheek, was, upon his death, properly revived in the name of the mother, Fannie W. Cheek, as administratrix of the estate of James Cheek, upon a stipulation, duly signed and filed, which reads as follows: "It is hereby stipulated and agreed, and consent of the defendant is hereby given, that the above-entitled action may be revived in the name of Fannie W. Cheek, administratrix of the estate of James Cheek, deceased, and that said action may proceed in favor of the said Fannie W. Cheek, as administratrix of the said estate, and it is further agreed that an order to revive the same as above stated may be made by the court, or the judge thereof, on the 24th day of January, 1910, or at any time within five days thereafter, as it may suit the convenience of the court to hear the same."

It is also urged, and we hold, that the trial court erred in so instructing the jury as to allow recovery for the value of the child's services beyond the time of the death of James Cheek, the sole beneficiary under the statute, and in refusing to give the following requested instruction, to wit: "If you find a verdict for the plaintiff under the evidence and instructions, the amount of your verdict should be the actual pecuniary loss which James Cheek, the father of Thompkins Cheek, sustained during his lifetime on account of the death of his son, not exceeding the amount claimed in the petition, $10,000."

This follows necessarily from the limitations of the right given by § 4313, supra, to the pecuniary loss or damage suffered by the beneficiary, James Cheek, and there are decided cases to this effect. See Pitkin v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 94 App. Div. 31, 87 N. Y. Supp. 906; Cooper v. Shore Electric Co. supra.

This case should be reversed and remanded for proceedings in accord with the views herein expressed.

(Gose, Mount, and Chadwick, JJ., dissent.)

(December 31, 1913.)

The constitutionality of the minimum wage laws as applied to private employers generally has been sustained by the supreme court of Oregon in Stettler v. O'Hara, — Or. —, — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 139 Pac. 743. An appeal from this decision is pending in the United States Supreme Court at the date of the present note.

As to the constitutionality of a statute forbidding an employer to impose a fine upon or to withhold wages from an employee engaged in weaving, for any imperfections in the weaving, see Com. v. Perry, 14 L.R.A. 325, and note appended on statutory restrictions on contracts between master and servant.

See note to Winchester & L. Turnp. Road Co. v. Croxton, 33 L.R.A. 177, as to legislative power to fix tolls, rates, or prices, and also that to State v. Loomis, 21 L.R.A. 789, as to the constitutionality of statutes restricting contracts and business.

See also Arnett v. State, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1192, and note appended thereto.

I. As affecting public employees.

a. Of state.

The right of the legislature to fix a minimum wage for state employees has been sustained in the absence of express or implied constitutional restrictions.

Thus, in the absence of an express or implied constitutional restriction upon the power of the legislature to fix and declare the rate of compensation to be paid for labor or services performed upon the public works of the state, the legislature may enact a law prescribing a minimum wage for day laborers employed by the state or any officer thereof. Clark v. State, 142 N. Y. 101, 36 N. E. 817. No specific constitutional objections are mentioned in this opinion.

The case involved a canal laborer, and it is expressly found that he was not under an express contract, fixing his compensation. It is stated that the statute would have no application to a case in which the 81 L.R.A.(N.S.)

compensation had been thus fixed prior to the taking effect of the statute.

The superintendent of public works, upon whom the Constitution conferred certain power, and who had charge of the canals, was held not to be independent of the legislature, so as to render such a statute beyond the legislative power.

As to the constitutionality of statutes fixing minimum wages for teachers, see Bopp v. Clark, — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, and note appended thereto, dealing with employees of like character.

b. Of municipality.

So, the power of the legislature to prescribe a minimum wage for the employees of a municipality has been upheld.

The New York labor law, in so far as it provided that the employees of the several municipalities of the state shall receive not less than the prevailing rate of wages in the locality, was upheld as to its constitutionality in Ryan v. New York, 177 N. Y. 271, 69 N. E. 599. It was held, however, in that case, that an employee of the city who had continued to receive without protest for a period of six years the wages at a rate less than the prevailing rate waived any claim that he might have had at the time to insist that the wages should be fixed at a rate greater than that paid him. The court in the Ryan Case takes a different view of the power of the legislature over the municipalities of the state than is taken in the earlier case of People ex rel. Rodgers v. Coler, infra. In discussing the power of the legislature over municipalities, the court states that in the administration of the affairs of those subdivisions (municipalities) as well as in those of the state at large, the legislature is unrestrained unless by express provisions of the Constitution. Then, after referring to the local officers of the municipalities, the broad and general statement is made that "all of these agencies and employees of the several municipalities are doing the work of the state, which is the sovereign and master;" while in the Rodgers Case it is stated that "a municipal officer directing a local improvement is not the agent of the state." The prevailing opinion in the Ryan Case was written by Parker, Ch. J., who wrote the dissenting opinion in the Rodgers Case, and the Ryan Case is decided in accordance with Parker's view as expressed in the Rodgers Case. As pointed out in the prevailing opinion in the Ryan Case, there is a distinction between the cases, so that the actual decision in the one does not necessarily control that in the other, but the theory of the two cases cannot be reconciled.

II. As affecting private employees.

a. In general.

The power of enacting minimum wage legislation affecting employees of a private employer while engaged upon public works has been quite generally denied in cases prior to MALETTE v. SPOKANE. The fact that the wage is fixed without reference to the actual value of the work, or to that paid by others, is emphasized, as well as the increased cost of the work to the public.

A statute undertaking to fix the minimum rate of compensation to be paid to a particular and limited class of laborers employed upon any public work of the state, counties, cities, and towns, without regard to the actual value of such labor or the rate paid by other persons, natural or artificial, for the same kind of labor in the same vicinity, is unconstitutional. Street v. Varney Electrical Supply Co. 160 Ind. 338, 61 L.R.A. 154, 98 Am. St. Rep. 325, 66 N. E. 895. The contest in this case was between a contractor on a public work of a municipality and a laborer employed thereon.

So, a statute providing that the wages paid upon public works shall be not less than the prevailing rate for a day's work in the same trade or occupation in the locality where such public work is being done, and providing also that each contract for public work shall contain a provision that the same shall be void and of no effect unless the person or corporation making or performing it shall comply with the provisions of the act as to wages, and no such person or corporation shall be entitled to receive any sum, nor shall any officer, agent, or employee of the state or of a municipal corporation pay the same or authorize its payment to any person or corporation for public work where the provisions of the statute are violated, was held void in People ex rel. Rodgers v. Coler, 166 N. Y. 1, 52 L.R.A. 814, 82 Am. St. Rep. 605, 59 N. E. 716, in so far as it relieved the city from the obligation of paying the money due a contractor who has violated the provision of the statute. In the course of the prevailing opinion the right to fix a minimum wage is denied, it being stated by the court that the legislature cannot fix by statute the price which a municipal corporation must pay for labor or other services that it may be obliged to employ; at least, not when such regulations increase the cost beyond that which it would be obliged to pay in the ordinary course of business. "If it could do all these things," says the court, "it could virtually dispose of all the revenues of the city for such purposes as it thought best, and local self-government would be nothing but a sham and a delusion."

It will be noticed that the foregoing cases involve the power of the legislature over municipalities.

In answer to the argument that counties, cities, and towns are mere political and municipal subdivisions of the state through which the government is administered, therefore, since the state has power to fix the salaries of its officers and the wages it will pay to its agents and employees, it has the right to declare what rate of wages shall be paid the agent and employees of a county, city, or town, employed upon any public work, it is stated by the court in Street v. Varney Electrical Supply Co. 160 Ind. 338, 61 L.R.A. 154, 98 Am. St. Rep. 325, 66 N. E. 895, that while counties, cities, and towns are political and municipal subdivisions of the state, they are not govern-

Mr. Alex M. Winston, amicus curiae.

Ellis, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The facts out of which this controversy arose are stated in the opinion on the first hearing (68 Wash. 578, 123 Pac. 1005, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 986); but, in order to present a single, comprehensive review of the case, we deem it not amiss to restate them.

The legislature, in 1899, passed an act declaring that "hereafter, eight hours in any calendar day shall constitute a day's work on any work done for the state or any county or municipality within the mental agencies in such sense as to subject the management of their local affairs, involving the making of contracts for labor and material to be used upon local improvements, and the payment of the same out of the revenues of the counties, cities, or towns, to the arbitrary and unlimited control of the legislature. Such municipal subdivisions are corporations as well as political and governmental subdivisions, and as such corporations have the power to make contracts by which the rate of compensation for property sold to them is fixed, and they cannot be compelled by an act of the legislature to pay for any species of property more than it is worth, or more than its market value at the time and in the place where it is contracted for. That the power to confiscate the property of the citizens and taxpayers of the county, city, or town by forcing them to pay for any commodity, whether it be merchandise or labor, an arbitrary price in excess of the market value, is not one of the powers of the legislature over the municipal corporation, nor the legitimate use of such corporation as an agency of the state. Continuing, the court states that if an act compelled counties, cities, and towns to pay a certain minimum price for stone or brick, or to a merchant a minimum price for merchandise, when such stone, brick, or merchandise could be purchased at a less price, such legislation would shock every reasonable mind and would be universally condemned as unwarranted and unconstitutional; and for the same reason an act fixing the price of unskilled labor on all public works at a certain minimum price is a legislative interference with the liberty of contract by counties, cities, or towns.

In People ex rel. Rodgers v. Coler, supra, it is stated by the court that it is not entirely true that such a statute is a mere direction for the sovereign authority to one of his own agencies to contract in certain cases in a particular way. That it is all that and very much more, since it affects personal and municipal rights in many directions that are of vastly more importance than the mere form of a contract to perform municipal work. Continuing, the court states that it is true enough that a city is an agency of the state to discharge some of the functions of government, but these terms are not adequate to describe its true relations to the state or the people. It is further stated that a municipal officer directing a local improvement is not the agent of the state, but is the agent of the city, and the city alone is responsible for his negligence or misconduct.

Another view of the relation existing between the state and its municipalities is taken in the later New York case of Ryan v. New York, supra.

The power of the municipality to fix a minimum wage has also been denied.

Thus, where municipal contracts are required to be open to competitive bidding and to be let to the lowest bidder, an ordinance fixing the minimum wage for common labor on any public work or improvement let by contract has been held to be an unlawful attempt to limit and destroy the inalienable right possessed by every citizen to make any sort of a contract desired by him concerning the proper use and disposal of either his labor or his property. "The fundamental law of both state and nation," says the court, "gives every citizen the inalienable right to dispose of his labor in the wage market for whatever he deems best; and therefore a despotic, arbitrary, vicious, and utterly defenseless ordinance, depriving him from so doing, is an infringement on his constitutional privileges, and consequently absolutely null and void." State ex rel. Bramley v. Norton, 7 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 354, 5 Ohio N. P. 183. The contract in this case had not been entered into, the action being one to compel the corporation counsel to approve the contract. The ordinance provided that all specifications for doing work for the municipality should have a provision inserted therein fixing a minimum wage for common labor.

So it has been held under a provision requiring the submission of contracts for municipal work to competitive bidding, and the awarding of them to the lowest respon-state" (Rem. & Bal. Code, § 6572), and provided that "all work done by contract or subcontract on any building or improvements or works on roads, bridges, streets, alleys, or buildings for the state, or any county or municipality within the state, shall be done under the provisions of this act: Provided, that in cases of extraordinary emergency such as danger to life or property, the hours for work may be extended, but in such case the rate of pay for time employed in excess of eight hours of each calendar day, shall be one and one-half times the rate of pay allowed for the same amount of time during eight hours' service. And for this purpose, this act is made a part of all contracts, subcontracts or agreements for work done for the state or any county or municipality within the state." Rem. & Bal. Code, § 6573. The act further declared anyone violating its provisions guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction, subject to a prescribed punishment. Rem. & Bal. Code, § 6574.

In 1903, another act was passed, declaring that "it is a part of the public policy of the state of Washington that all work 'by contract or day labor done' for it, or any political subdivision created by its laws, shall be performed in work days of not more than eight hours each, except in cases of extraordinary emergency" (Rem. & Bal. Code, § 6575), and that all contracts for such work should provide that they might be canceled by the officers of the state, county, or city having supervision sible bidder, that it is not lawful to fix in the specifications, on the basis of which the proposals are invited, a minimum wage for common labor; and the fixing of such sum for any part or item of such work renders illegal the entire proceedings and the contract to which it leads. Frame v. Felix, 167 Pa. 47, 27 L.R.A. 802, 31 Atl. 375. Nor is it material whether the sum so fixed be or be not in point of fact in excess of what it is likely the competition among bidders would have made it. The contract involved was one let by the board of municipal water commissioners in its department, but this board was held subject to the same rules as the city.

A statute fixing the minimum wage at the current rate of per diem wages in the locality where the work is performed, and the maximum hours of labor at eight, was sustained in Re Dalton, 61 Kan. 257, 47 L.R.A. 380, 59 Pac. 336, in the prosecution of a contractor constructing a county courthouse and jail, for employing laborers for more than eight hours, and paying them the current rate of wages for said work for the longer days. The stress of this decision, however, is placed upon the right to limit the hours of labor, and nothing is said as to a minimum wage.

A similar holding appears in State v. Atkin, 64 Kan. 174, 97 Am. St. Rep. 343, 67 Pac. 519, and this holding was approved by the United States Supreme Court in 191 U. S. 207, 48 L. ed. 148, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 124.

The court in People ex rel. Rodgers v. Coler, 166 N. Y. 1, 52 L.R.A. 814, 82 Am. St. Rep. 605, 59 N. E. 716, does not have for decision nor does it decide the question as to the right of an employee of the contractor to recover the difference between what has been paid him and the minimum wage provided by law, but this right seems to be negated from the view taken of the statute by the court. Unless, however, such an employee may recover, it is difficult to see how either the city or the assessed property owner is benefited by allowing a contract to be let under a statute which requires a minimum wage, and which is 61 L.R.A. (N.S.)

stated in the opinion to greatly increase the price at which such contracts are let, and then allow the contractor to repudiate the payment of the minimum wage and pocket the excess. Whatever may be the price at which such contracts will be let in the future, in the particular case before the court, the sympathy that is expressed for the city and the assessed property owner is wasted.

After the decision in People ex rel. Rodgers v. Coler, the Constitution of New York was amended by providing that the legislature may regulate and fix the wages or salaries, the hours of work or labor, and make provisions for the protection, welfare, and safety of persons employed by the state or by any county, city, town, village, or any other civil divisions of the state, or by any contractor or subcontractor performing work, labor, or services for the state or for any county, city, town, village, or any other civil division thereof. That part of this provision relating to the hours of labor came up for discussion in People ex rel. Williams Engineering & Contracting Co. v. Metz, 193 N. Y. 148, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 201, 85 N. E. 1070, but not that relating to wages. For a discussion of the validity of limitation of hours of labor on public works, see note to Keefe v. People, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 131, and continuation thereof attached to the report of the Metz Case in 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 201.

In the following cases in this subdivision the constitutionality of minimum wage laws is not involved, but the cases are interesting in this regard and are included; without, however, attempting to be exhaustive of this class.

In McAvoy v. New York, 52 App. Div. 485, 65 N. Y. Supp. 274, an action by a laborer who had been employed by the city of New York at a less rate of wages than that directed by the statute, to recover the difference, the judgment of the trial court sustaining the defendant's demurrer to the complaint was reversed in the appellate division, and the reversal sustained by the court of appeals in 166 N. Y. 588, 59 N. E. 1125. The constitutionality of the of the work, in case of a violation of the statute (Rem. & Bal. Code, § 6576), and making it the duty of such officers to incorporate in all such contracts stipulations "as provided for in this act," and "to declare any contract canceled, the execution of which is not in accordance with the public policy of this state as herein declared." Rem. & Bal. Code, § 6577.

In pursuance of the public policy of the state so declared, the city of Spokane, on August 24, 1909, by ordinance No. A4422, so far as here material, provided that:

"Section 1. Hereafter eight (8) hours in any calendar day shall constitute a day's work on any work done for the city of Spokane, subject to the conditions hereinafter provided.

legislation was not raised in this case, and the only question discussed was whether the legislation applied to laborers employed directly by the municipality. It was held to so apply.

In People ex rel. North v. Featherstonhaugh, 172 N. Y. 112, 60 L.R.A. 768, 64 N. E. 802, where bids upon a public improvement had been received after the law had been declared unconstitutional and the improvement commissioners had announced that the requirement with reference to it would not be in force, it was held that the abutting owners who were assessed for the improvement could not complain of the specifications which required compliance with the labor law as to hours and wages. The successful bidder testified in this case that no item was included in his bid by reason of the specification providing for an observance of the provision of the labor law, and the contract entered into provided only that the contractor should faithfully comply with all provisions of the labor law of the state which "may now be in force."

In Knowles v. New York, 37 Misc. 195, 75 N. Y. Supp. 189, affirmed in 74 App. Div. 632, 77 N. Y. Supp. 1130, the right of a taxpayer to question the legality of a contract the bidding on which was done and the contract entered into before the New York labor law was declared unconstitutional, and which provided that the contractor should pay the prevailing rate of wages, was denied, and in the course of the opinion the court, in referring to the Rodgers Case, states that the decision held on the one hand that "the contractor was not bound to carry out the provision for the reason that it was imposed on him only because of such void statute, and, on the other, that the contract was legal and binding on the city in all respects and in full . . . it was held that a peremptory writ of mandamus should issue to compel the comptroller of the city to pay the contractor the entire contract price, without any deduction for the amount he had profited by refusing to carry out the said provision."

A contractor employed to erect a municipal building, who had contracted that

"Sec. 2. Hereafter all laborers employed by the day on municipal work, either directly by the city or by contractors, subcontractors, individuals, partnerships, associations or corporations, on all work for the city, shall receive and be paid not less than $2.75 for a calendar day's work of eight (8) hours. The provisions of this section shall apply to, and govern all work done for the city of Spokane and all work for any individual, firm, partnership, association or corporation which is done under the direction or under the supervision of, or which is to be accepted by the city of Spokane or any officer or agent thereof."

The ordinance further provided that, in cases of emergency, the hours for work might be extended, but that the rate of he would not permit any laborer in the employ of himself or subcontractor or other persons doing or contracting to do a whole or a part of the work embraced in his contract to work more than eight hours in a day, and that he would pay the rate of wages prevailing in the locality, and that the contract should be void unless he should fully comply with such provisions of the labor law, does not forfeit his right under the contract because, in the course of construction, doors, windows, and other manufactured woodwork required for the building and used in it were manufactured for the special purpose and at the request of the contractor by a manufacturer within the state, who employed workmen and mechanics, and paid them less than the prevailing rate of wages in the city of New York. Bohnen v. Metz, 126 App. Div. 807, 111 N. Y. Supp. 196, affirmed in 193 N. Y. 676, 87 N. E. 1115.

Nor does the contractor for the construction of a municipal building forfeit his rights under the contract by reason of the fact that he sublets the granite work to a corporation in another state where the work of quarrying, cutting, dressing, and trimming the granite is done, and the workmen paid at the prevailing rate of wages there, but at a less rate than the prevailing rate of wages for the same class of work in the city of New York. Ewen v. Thompson-Starratt Co. 208 N. Y. 245, 101 N. E. 894. The contractor and the subcontractor both agreed to comply with the provisions of the labor law.

b. Specific constitutional objections.

It is stated in Street v. Varney Electrical Supply Co. 160 Ind. 338, 61 L.R.A. 154, 98 Am. St. Rep. 325, 66 N. E. 895, that even if there were no express provision of any constitution, such legislative interference with the right of contract would be void for the reason that the authority to fix by contract the price to be paid for property, including human labor, is not ordinarily within the domain of legislation.

Very frequently, however, specific con-pay for excess time should be 1½ times the rate allowed for the same amount of time during the eight hours' service, and that the ordinance be made a part of all contracts thereafter made. By express stipulation and reference thereto, this ordinance was made a part of the contract for the public work the assessment for which is contested in this action.

On March 10, 1910, the city passed another ordinance, No. A5016, providing "that hereafter all work done by common laborers for the city of Spokane or for any contractor, subcontractor or other person doing work by contract or otherwise for the city of Spokane, shall receive the sum of three dollars ($3) per day for eight hours' labor," and that the ordinance should be in force from and after April 1, 1910.

On March 25, 1910, the city council, by ordinance, provided for the improvement of Sixteenth avenue by constructing therein a sewer, to be paid for by special assessments against the property benefited, and created an assessment district. The contract for the work was thereafter let to one Broad, and, when he had completed the work thereunder, an assessment roll was prepared, and notice of the time and place for hearing objections was given. The appellant, an owner of property in the district, appeared and objected to the confirmation of the roll. His objections were overruled, and he appealed to the superior court.

stitutional objections are raised to such legislation.

Such a statute is held to be a violation of a constitutional provision that no citizen may be deprived of his property without due process of law, in Street v. Varney Electrical Supply Co. supra. It is stated that if the minimum price to be paid by municipal subdivisions of the state for unskilled labor on public works exceeds the rate at which such labor can be obtained by other persons at the same place, the excess so paid for labor is taken from the citizens assessed for such work, not by due process of law, but by mere legislative fiat; that the citizens of the state who must, through assessments made upon their property, pay for public works of counties, cities, and towns, are entitled to have such work done at such rate of wages as the local agents and official representatives of such municipal subdivisions of the state may be able to secure by contract, and they cannot be required arbitrarily to pay higher wages than laborers employed on private work or improvements in their particular districts demand, any more than they can be compelled by similar legislation to pay a minimum rate of wages to laborers employed by them in their private business.

So, in People ex rel. Rodgers v. Coler, 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

From an adverse decision of that court, he prosecutes this appeal.

The evidence showed that the contractor, in the performance of his contract, paid $2.75 a day for each common laborer employed in the work, as required by the ordinance first above mentioned and by his contract. The court refused to hear testimony as to whether he paid $3 a day, as required by the second ordinance above mentioned. The evidence showed that the prevailing wage for common laborers in the city of Spokane and vicinity, at the time of the performance of the contract in August, 1910, was $2.25 a day, whether for a ten-hour, nine-hour, or an eight-hour day, and that in March, when the improvement ordinance was passed, the prevailing wage was $1.85 for a ten, nine, or eight-hour day. There was no evidence whatever as to any distinction in pay by reason of shorter hours, nor any evidence whatever that compensation for employment was ever computed by the hour. The contractor testified that 59 per cent of the cost of the work was paid out for common labor, and that, but for the ordinance, his bid would have been materially less.

The position taken by the appellant, as stated in the original opinion, and as adhered to in the briefs and argument on rehearing, is admirably summarized as follows: "That the legislature may fix the hours of labor upon all public works and for public work even in cities is now well 166 N. Y. 1, 52 L.R.A. 814, 82 Am. St. Rep. 605, 59 N. E. 716, it is stated that local property owners who must bear the expense of an improvement are entitled to the benefit of the best judgment and discretion of the city officers in making a contract for the work, and to the extent that such judgment and discretion are taken away by arbitrary enactment not in their interest, but in favor of opposing interests, their constitutional rights of liberty and property are invaded; and when the expense of the improvement is enlarged beyond actual and reasonable costs under ordinary business conditions, as it may be under a statute fixing the minimum wage at the prevailing rate of wages, the property of such owner is taken without due process of law.

Such a statute is also held to be a violation of the liberty to contract secured by the state Constitution, and undoubtedly within the protection of the Federal Constitution, and covered by the 14th Amendment thereof, providing that no state shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law. Street v. Varney Electrical Supply Co. supra.

So, in State ex rel. Bramley v. Norton, 7 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 354, 5 Ohio N. P.

settled, and no allusion to sustaining authority will be made. Indeed, that feature of the case is not challenged by appellant; but it is contended that, where the city is acting merely as an agent of the property owner, it is bound to do its work to his best advantage, and cannot empirically fix a wage and compel its payment by an independent contractor. Appellant bases his argument on two propositions: (1) That the ordinance is unreasonable, contrary to public policy, and oppressive; (2) that the assessment is in contravention of the Constitution of this state and of the Constitution of the United States, in that it takes the property of this appellant without compensation and without due process of law. Abandoning legal phraseology, the concrete question, put in plain English, is whether a city can improve the property of a citizen, either upon his petition or against his will, and tax an arbitrary sum therefor that puts the cost unreasonably above the cost of like work if done through the instrumentality of a private agency." Malette v. Spokane, 68 Wash. 578, 580, 123 Pac. 1005, 1006, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 986. The last sentence quoted seems to beg, rather than state, the real question. Of course, if the minimum wage is assumed to be unreasonably high, it would be indefensible on any theory, whether fixed by general statute or by ordinance, and whether paid out of a fund raised by general taxation or by special assessment.

183, a minimum wage fixed by a municipal ordinance is held to destroy the right of a citizen to contract as he desires.

And in People ex rel. Rodgers v. Coler, a minimum wage law is stated to be an interference with liberty and property.

In the case of Atkin v. Kansas, 191 U. S. 207, 48 L. ed. 148, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 124, it is stated that no employee is entitled of absolute right, and as a part of his liberty, to perform labor for the state, and no contractor for public work can excuse a violation of his agreement with the state by doing that which the statute under which he proceeds distinctly and lawfully forbids him to do. Further, it is stated that the proposition that the statute involved in this case denies to the contractor or his employee the equal protection of the laws is equally without any foundation, since the rule of conduct prescribed by it applies alike to all who contract to do work on behalf of either the state or of its municipal subdivisions, and alike to all employed to perform labor on such work. The statute here provided that not less than the current rate of per diem wages in the locality where the work is performed should be paid to laborers, and the contractor required his laborers to work more than the statute allowed, in order to obtain the current rate of wages in the locality where the work

The real questions are: (1) Is it within the power of any legislative body, whether of the state or city, to fix a minimum wage for common labor as applied to public work paid for by special assessment? In other words, is such legislation void as in contravention of the state and Federal Constitutions, in that it takes property without compensation and without due process of law? (2) Is the ordinance in question contrary to any public policy of the state, either expressed in, or implied from, state legislation? (3) Is the ordinance an unreasonable exercise of the right to prescribe the terms of contract by one of the parties, or is the amount prescribed an unreasonable wage? We will endeavor to discuss these questions, so far as may be, separately.

1. Is it within the legislative power, either of state or city, to prescribe a higher rate of wages than the prevailing rate as a minimum of wages to be paid for common labor in the doing of a public work to be paid for by special assessments against the property specially benefited thereby? The principal argument directed against such laws, when enacted by the state itself, is the claim that they necessarily increase the cost of the work. If, therefore, laws having exactly the same tendency have been upheld, such decisions furnish direct authority for upholding a frank and undisguised minimum wage law. As stated in the original opinion, it is now was performed. The decision dwells altogether on the limitation of hours of labor.

So it has been held unconstitutional as being class legislation. Street v. Varney Electrical Supply Co. supra.

And in People ex rel. Rodgers v. Coler, supra, it is stated that a statute requiring the payment of minimum wage at the prevailing rate diverts money or property of the city, or that of local property owners, from strictly city purposes, and devotes it to private interests, or to the interests of a class of citizens.

A statute fixing the minimum wage of common laborers on public works is in violation of a constitutional provision procuring to every citizen of a state the inalienable right to personal liberty and the pursuit of happiness. Street v. Varney Electrical Supply Co. 160 Ind. 338, 61 L.R.A. 154, 98 Am. St. Rep. 325, 66 N. E. 895.

It is stated in People ex rel. Rodgers v. Coler, 166 N. Y. 1, 52 L.R.A. 814, 82 Am. St. Rep. 605, 59 N. E. 716, that a statute which requires a municipality to pay a minimum wage which is greater than that provided under its contract with its employees requires a payment for other than a city purpose, and violates a constitutional provision limiting payment to payment for city purposes.

too well settled to require citation of authority that the legislature may fix the hours of labor upon all public work and for public work, even in cities. It is also true, as there stated, that "laws fixing the hours of labor, and providing that no less than the going rate of wages shall be paid under contracts such as we have before us, have been generally upheld." To put the matter more exactly, we add that laws fixing the hours of labor have been generally upheld by the courts, even when coupled with the provision that the laborer shall receive for the shorter day prescribed a minimum of wages "not less than the current rate of per diem wages in the locality where the work is performed." Obviously this is a provision for pay above the "going rate of wages" for the same amount of time. Re Dalton, 61 Kan. 257, 47 L.R.A. 380, 59 Pac. 336; State v. Atkin, 64 Kan. 174, 97 Am. St. Rep. 343, 67 Pac. 519; Atkin v. Kansas, 191 U. S. 207, 48 L. ed. 148, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 124; Byars v. State, 2 Okla. Crim. Rep. 481, 102 Pac. 804, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 765. As said in Atkin v. Kansas, supra, quoting from Re Ashby, 60 Kan. 101, 55 Pac. 336: "When the eight-hour law was passed, the legislature had under consideration the general subject of the length of a day's labor, for those engaged in public works at manual labor, without special reference to the purpose or occasion of their employment. The leading idea clearly was to limit the hours of toil of laborers, workmen, mechanics, and other persons in like employments, to eight hours, without reduction of compensation for the day's services." The case so quoted by the United States Supreme Court, Re Ashby, is in itself a clear demonstration that the maximum hours law there under consideration had the necessary effect of fixing a minimum daily wage above the current rate for the same class of work. Moreover, it seems to have been overlooked that the eight-hour law of this state, so far as overtime is concerned, expressly provides a minimum wage which would necessarily be above the going rate for the same amount of time. In § 6573, above quoted, it is provided that in cases of emergency the hours of work may be extended; "but in such case the rate of pay for time employed in excess of eight hours of each calendar day, shall be one and one-half times the rate of pay allowed for the same amount of time during eight hours' service." A similar provision is found in the eight-hour law of Kansas, and it was for the violation of that provision, as well as the eight-hour provision, that the defendant in Atkin v. Kansas, was convicted (see stipulated facts, 191 U. S. page 210). The 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

same provision is also found in an eight-hour law contained in a legislative charter of the city of Buffalo, and was upheld as constitutional and valid, and a contractor was held criminally liable for its violation. People v. Warren, 77 Hun, 120, 28 N. Y. Supp. 303; People ex rel. Warren v. Beck, 10 Misc. 77, 30 N. Y. Supp. 473.

Assuming, as seems to be assumed both in argument and in the original opinion in the case before us, that any minimum of wages fixed above the current rate necessarily increases the cost of the work (a thing by no means certain), then it cannot be denied that a provision such as above quoted from the Kansas law would have precisely the same effect. If the one would increase the cost of the work, so, also, would the other, as a simple example will demonstrate. Assuming the current rate of per diem wages to be $2 for a ten-hour day, and assuming, also, a uniform efficiency in the work of a given laborer, then it follows that the minimum wage of $2 a day for, let us say, an eight-hour day, is just exactly 40 cents more for the same work than it would cost but for the minimum wage provision. As another illustration, the evidence in the case before us shows that the observance of our own eight-hour law alone would have had precisely the same effect on the contract here in question. The contractor himself testified in effect that, but for the minimum wage ordinance, the labor on this work would have cost him $2.25 a day for an eight-hour day, while the number of hours constituting a day's work customary at the time and place was ten hours. It is too plain for argument that every maximum hours law prescribing less than the number of hours usually constituting a day's labor, when coupled with a provision for minimum pay not less than the current rate for a day's labor, is a minimum wage law pure and simple, prescribing a wage above the current rate for the same class of labor. Every objection, therefore, which can be logically or legally raised against an undisguised minimum wage law, can be advanced, just as logically and just as legally, against the usual eight-hour law. The appellant seems to recognize this fact, since he argues that there are only two grounds upon which courts have held valid laws limiting the hours of labor; that one applies to work hazardous to the health of the employees, as working in mines, mills, and the like, which, of course, rests upon the police power of the state (Holden v. Hardy, 169 U. S. 366, 42 L. ed. 780, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 383) or where the employee is a child or woman, which also rests upon the same power (State v. Buchanan, 29 Wash. 602, 59 L.R.A. 342, 92 Am. St. Rep.

930, 70 Pac. 52; State v. Somerville, 67 Wash. 638, 122 Pac. 324), and that the other exception is based upon the principle that, when the state or any of its municipalities performs public work, it then, as an employer, has the right to fix the terms upon which it will permit labor to be done for it.

As examples of the last-mentioned class decisions, appellant cites Atkin v. Kansas, supra; Curtice v. Schmidt, 202 Mo. 703, 101 S. W. 61, 66, 10 Ann. Cas. 702; and our own decisions, Re Broad, 36 Wash. 449, 70 L.R.A. 1011, 78 Pac. 1004, 2 Ann. Cas. 212, and Gies v. Broad, 41 Wash. 448, 83 Pac. 1025. It is true that the cases cited and also the Oklahoma case, Byars v. State, 2 Okla. Crim. Rep. 481, 102 Pac. 804, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 765, were based upon the latter ground, which is clearly and logically expressed in Atkin v. Kansas, supra, by the late Justice Harlan, speaking for the Federal Supreme Court, as follows: "The improvement of the boulevard in question was a work of which the state, if it had deemed it proper to do so, could have taken immediate charge by its own agents; for it is one of the functions of government to provide public highways for the convenience and comfort of the people. Instead of undertaking that work directly, the state invested one of its governmental agencies with power to care for it. Whether done by the state directly or by one of its instrumentalities, the work was of a public, not private, character. If, then, the work upon which the defendant employed Reese was of a public character, it necessarily follows that the statute in question, in its application to those undertaking work for or on behalf of a municipal corporation of the state, does not infringe the personal liberty of anyone. It may be that the state, in enacting the statute, intended to give its sanction to the view held by many that, all things considered, the general welfare of employees, mechanics, and workmen, upon whom rest a portion of the burdens of government, will be subserved if labor performed for eight continuous hours was taken to be a full day's work; that the restriction of a day's work to that number of hours would promote morality, improve the physical and intellectual condition of laborers and workmen, and enable them the better to discharge the duties appertaining to citizenship. We have no occasion here to consider these questions, or to determine upon which side is the sounder reason; for, whatever may have been the motives controlling the enactment of the statute in question, we can imagine no possible ground to dispute the power of the state to declare that 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) no one undertaking work for it or for one of its municipal agencies should permit or require an employee on such work to labor in excess of eight hours each day, and to inflict punishment upon those who are embraced by such regulations and yet disregard them. It cannot be deemed a part of the liberty of any contractor that he be allowed to do public work in any mode he may choose to adopt, without regard to the wishes of the state. On the contrary, it belongs to the state, as the guardian and trustee for its people, and having control of its affairs, to prescribe the conditions upon which it will permit public work to be done on its behalf, or on behalf of its municipalities. No court has authority to review its action in that respect. Regulations on this subject suggest only considerations of public policy. And with such considerations the courts have no concern." While, as shown by this quotation, the Supreme Court did not deem it necessary to place the decision on any other ground than the power of the state to prescribe the terms upon which contracts with it or its agent, the municipality, might be made, it is significant that it also suggests another ground, namely, the promotion of the "general welfare of employees, mechanics, and workmen, upon whom rests a portion of the burdens of government," and as tending to the production of better citizenship, thus unmistakably intimating that the act might also be soundly sustained as an exercise of the police power.

The appellant argues, and seems to have impressed the members of Department 1 of this court, save the late Chief Justice Dunbar, with the view that though this court and other courts have held the eight-hour law sufficiently valid and constitutional to sustain a criminal prosecution, and though an exactly parallel ordinance to the one here in question was held by this court sufficiently valid to sustain an action by a laborer for the collection of a part of the minimum wage above the current rate for overtime, which was withheld by the contractor (Gies v. Broad, 41 Wash. 448, 83 Pac. 1025), still those cases do not sustain, as constitutional, either the eight-hour law or the minimum wage ordinance as applied to contracts for public work to be paid for by special assessment, nor the minimum wage ordinance as to any work, since in the original opinion it is said: "So far as we have been able to find, laws fixing a minimum of wages for unskilled labor have been uniformly condemned."

The case of Clark v. State, 142 N. Y. 101, 36 N. E. 817, was not cited on the first hearing, and was hence excusably overlooked. In that case a statute of the state of New York fixing minimum wages for day laborers on public works of the state was upheld by the court of last resort of that state, using the following language: "It must be assumed that the legislature, and all other public bodies intrusted with the functions of government, general or local, will use the power conferred by the Constitution or the law fairly, and in the public interests. There is no express or implied restriction to be found in the Constitution upon the power of the legislature to fix and declare the rate of compensation to be paid for labor or services performed upon the public works of the state. That legislation is doubtless open to criticism, from the standpoint of sound policy and expediency; but the courts have nothing to do with these questions, so long as it is not in conflict with the Constitution; and we think that a general law regulating the compensation of laborers employed by the state, or by officers under its authority, which disturbs no vested right or contract, was within the power of the legislature to enact, whatever may be said as to its wisdom or policy."

We are persuaded that the view expressed in the original opinion that, in Gies v. Broad, supra, this court did not, in fact, hold the minimum wage ordinance of Spokane there involved constitutional, and the statement that "the sum of the court's holding" in that case was "that the contractor could not take a wage from a property owner and convert it, or any part of it, to his own use," must be modified. As a matter of fact, that was one result of the holding in that case, but was far from its sum. As shown by the opinion itself, the court could not have held that, nor anything else touching the merits of the case, until it first decided that the ordinance was constitutional and valid. The amount involved was only $15.91, and the only thing which gave the court jurisdiction of the appeal for any purpose was the question of the constitutionality of the ordinance. As pointed out by the court: "The appeal is brought within the jurisdiction of this court by reason of the fact that the action involves the validity of the ordinance above mentioned; the appellant contending that that part of the ordinance which fixes the minimum sum to be paid as wages for a day's labor on any public improvement undertaken by the city of Spokane is unconstitutional and void." The court then held that, under the rule announced in Henry v. Thurston County, 31 Wash. 638, 72 Pac. 488, no other question save that of the validity of the ordinance could be reviewed, adding: "If we find the ordinance valid, the inquiry is ended; if invalid, the judgment fails because founded on the ordinance." The following language used by Department 1, touching the opinion in Gies v. Broad, seems, therefore, hardly justified: "In this opinion there is an expression which, although not necessary to the decision, may, if taken without qualification, seem to support the contentions of the respondent. It follows: 'The principle involved in that case [Atkin v. Kansas, 191 U. S. 207, 48 L. ed. 148, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 124] is not distinguishable from the principle involved in the case now before us. For, surely, if it be within the power of the state to limit the number of hours a laborer may be permitted to labor in one calendar day on any public work undertaken by it, it can fix the minimum sum that shall be paid him as wages for such labor. The power to do either must rest on the principle that 'it belongs to the state, as the guardian and trustee for its people, and having control of its affairs, to prescribe the conditions upon which it will permit public work to be done on its behalf, or on behalf of its municipalities.''" The language was not only "necessary to the decision," but must be "taken without qualification," since it decided the only question in the case of which this court had jurisdiction. The matter of estoppel as against the contractor to dispute a $15 debt could not give this court jurisdiction in the absence of the constitutional question. Since no member of this court has yet expressed a readiness to frankly overrule the decision in Gies v. Broad, the conclusion seems irresistible that the ordinance here in question must be held valid.

But it is argued that Gies v. Broad and Atkin v. Kansas, and, by parity of reason, State v. Atkin, 64 Kan. 174, 97 Am. St. Rep. 343, 67 Pac. 519 (which was affirmed by the last-mentioned case), and Byars v. State, 2 Okla. Crim. Rep. 481, 102 Pac. 804, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 765, do not determine the constitutional question because they did not arise at the instance of a taxpayer or of a protesting property owner. To the writer of this opinion, however, it seems hardly probable that the supreme courts of three states and the Supreme Court of the United States would have overlooked a phase of the question which, if counsel's contention be correct, must have made the decision of each of those courts different, since no court will be presumed to hold a man liable criminally, or even financially, for violating a void law. As pointed out in Re Broad, 36 Wash. 449, 70 L.R.A. 1011, 78 Pac. 1004, 2 Ann. Cas. 212, the unconscionable conduct of the contractor would not be a pertinent argument in such a case. As a matter of fact, the very contention now made appears to have been made in State v. Atkin, supra, which arose out of a contract for work paid for by special assessments. At any rate, the point was considered. The supreme court of Kansas said (see opinion, 64 Kan. page 175): "The law which appellant violated must have its application in the light of the fact that municipal corporations are the creatures of the state. The legislature gives them being. They let contracts for the improvement of streets under express authorization of the legislature, and cannot do so in the absence of such authority. In this instance the lawmaking power provided that the cost of the paving which the appellant was constructing should be paid by assessment against the abutting property. It might have provided a different method of payment, or withheld entirely from the city the right to improve its streets." And again (see opinion, 64 Kan. page 179): "The fact that the abutting property owners are charged more for the improvement by the application of the restrictive provisions of the law reducing the hours of labor may be admitted; yet if the work had been done by the state itself, which, as we have shown, has supreme authority in such matters, the property owners could not complain that it employed and paid its servants conformably to the statute in question. There can be no distinguishing difference between the acts of the contractor in the employ of the county, passed upon in the case of Re Dalton, 61 Kan. 257, 47 L.R.A. 380, 59 Pac. 336, and those of the appellant here. Both were proceeding under contracts made with them by the agents of the state, and the principal had power to direct that eight hours should constitute a day's work for all persons laboring in its behalf." With these facts and this holding before it, the Supreme Court of the United States affirmed the judgment of the supreme court of Kansas without reservation, on the ground that the work was of a public character, saying of the act, "indeed, its constitutionality is beyond all question." This, notwithstanding the fact that the contractor's conduct, as shown by the agreed facts (191 U. S. page 210), was attempted to be excused by the fact that his contract with the laborer was for pay by the hour at the current hour rate, apparently in order to evade the minimum wage provision of the Kansas eight-hour law to which we have referred. Moreover, the brief for the plaintiff in error printed in the report of the case shows that the fact that the work was paid for by special assessments was called to the attention of the United States Supreme Court. It seems plain, therefore, when the actual facts involved and the opinion of the Kansas court, affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, are considered, that it does sustain the decision in Gies v. Broad, supra, and that when Department 1 of this court, in the first opinion in this case, reaffirmed allegiance to the doctrine laid down in Atkin v. Kansas, it was mistaken either in its view of the actual bearing of that case or in its reaffirmation of allegiance.

The case of Byars v. State, supra, a well-considered case, arose out of the violation of the Oklahoma eight-hour law also in connection with a contract for public work to be paid for by special assessments against the property benefited, and the same contention was made against the constitutionality of the law as is made in this case. That the court acted advisedly and did not overlook that point is shown by the following language: "Counsel for the defendant contend: That under the terms of this statute, under the guise of a police regulation when it is not so in fact, the right of the employer and employee to contract is abridged in such a manner as to be an infringement upon the constitutional rights of both parties. That said statute is invalid because it contravenes the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and that 'the contract for paving is not "entered into by and on behalf of the city of Guthrie." The city of Guthrie as a municipality is acting simply as an agent of the property owner, whose property abuts on the streets along the proposed improvement. While the city has supervisory power over the streets, the improvement, as shown by the statement of fact, is to be paid for solely by the property owners. Work of the kind mentioned therein does not come within the purview of the statute. Work in behalf of the city would be work for which the city was liable, and which was to be paid for by the city, and not abutting property owners.' We believe the contention of counsel for defendant is without merit, and is unsupported by reason or authority. We see in this law no infringement of constitutional rights." The opinion discusses, approves, and follows the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the Atkin Case, construes the Oklahoma statute as similar to that of Kansas, and closes as follows: "The opening, construction, and maintenance of public highways is purely a governmental function, whether done by the state directly or by one of its municipalities, for which the state is primarily responsible. And it is immaterial whether such public work is paid for by the state, the county, the city, or by the benefited property owners. It is a work of a public, not private, character. The manner of payment does not change the character of work."

In Curtice v. Schmidt, 202 Mo. 703, 101 S. W. 61, 66, 10 Ann. Cas. 702, the supreme court of Missouri held valid an eight-hour labor ordinance of Kansas City incorporated in a contract where the work was to be paid for by special assessment and where the objection was raised by the property owner in contesting the assessment. The court expressly refused to base its holding upon the ground that such work was always done at so much an hour, but placed it on the ground that the ordinance was, in any event, constitutional, citing, among others, the cases of State v. Atkin and Atkin v. Kansas, supra.

It is thus plain that there is ample authority to be found, both in state and Federal decisions, to sustain the power of the legislative body, either of the state or of the city, to prescribe a reasonable minimum of wages even above the going rate for common labor performed on public work, and even when the work is to be paid for by special assessments against the property benefited thereby, and the courts have no power to pass upon the wisdom of the measure. We quote again from Atkin v. Kansas: "No evils arising from such legislation could be more far-reaching than those that might come to our system of government if the judiciary, abandoning the sphere assigned to it by the fundamental law, should enter the domain of legislation, and upon grounds merely of justice or reason or wisdom annul statutes that had received the sanction of the people's representatives. We are reminded by counsel that it is the solemn duty of the courts in cases before them to guard the constitutional rights of the citizen against merely arbitrary power. That is unquestionably true. But it is equally true—indeed, the public interests imperatively demand—that legislative enactments should be recognized and enforced by the courts as embodying the will of the people, unless they are plainly and palpably, beyond all question, in violation of the fundamental law of the Constitution. It cannot be affirmed of the statute of Kansas that it is plainly inconsistent with that instrument; indeed, its constitutionality is beyond all question." The true friends of constitutional government should be the last to counsel a departure from this rule, since its strict observance seems the only antidote for a growing sentiment in favor of pure parliamentary government. Since the question is one involving the Federal Constitution, it would seem that the Atkin decision ought 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

to have more weight than that of the supreme court of Indiana in Street v. Varney Electrical Supply Co. 160 Ind. 338, 61 L.R.A. 154, 98 Am. St. Rep. 325, 66 N. E. 895, announced only a few months earlier than that in the Atkin Case. The two cases present precisely the same constitutional questions, and the decision of the United States Supreme Court is diametrically opposed to that of the Indiana court, as quoted from at length in the former decision in this case.

The foregoing authorities make it clear that, if street improvement work paid for by special assessments is public work performed under authority conferred by the sovereign power of the state, no constitutional guaranty is impaired by the ordinance in question. That such work is public work cannot be questioned. The power of the city to levy special assessments to pay for public work is referable solely to the sovereign power of taxation delegated to it by the state under direction of the Constitution, art. 7, § 9; Rem. & Bal. Code, § 7507, subdivs. 10 and 13; Hamilton, Special Assessments, § 47. "It is axiomatic that private property may be taken for public use under the right of taxation, the power of police, or that of eminent domain. In the latter case, compensation must be made to the owner, while under the police power it is principally a matter of legislative discretion. Under the power of taxation for general governmental purposes, private property may in effect be confiscated, but, under the power of special assessment, the limitation is the extent of the benefit conferred, as we shall see later. However, it is now settled in the Federal courts, and in the courts of last resort of practically every state of the Union which recognizes the power of special assessment, except Colorado, that all such assessments are laid under the taxing power." Hamilton, Special Assessments, § 49. It is neither an exercise of the power of eminent domain nor of the police power. Hamilton, Special Assessments, §§ 39, 40, 44. We must not confuse the mode of payment for public work with the character of the work. We must not confound the mode of payment with an ownership or property interest in the subject-matter to which the work is applied. We must not confound the mode of taxation with the purpose of taxation. The work of improving a public street is public work and the street is a public street. The special tax is to pay for public work. The right to levy a special tax to pay for public work rests not in the citizen's property interest in the work itself, but only in the special benefit of the work to his property. The work is none the less public work done by the city as an agency of the state, though done also in a quasi corporate or administrative capacity, as distinguished from its purely governmental functions. The property owner cannot be assessed beyond his benefit, no matter what elements enter into the cost of the work. The language above quoted from the supreme courts of Oklahoma and Kansas and from the United States Supreme Court thus becomes directly pertinent and determinative of the question here presented.

While cogent reasons might be advanced for sustaining legislation of this character as a proper exercise of the police power of the state delegated by our Constitution to cities of the state, we find it unnecessary to place the decision on that ground or to discuss that question, since the state courts to which we have referred and the Supreme Court of the United States have sustained legislation which cannot be distinguished either in principle or in effect from the ordinance here in question, upon the simple ground that "it belongs to the state as the guardian and trustee for its people, and having control of its affairs, to prescribe the conditions upon which it will permit public work to be done on its behalf, or on behalf of its municipalities." Atkin v. Kansas, 191 U. S. 207, 48 L. ed. 148, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 124; Gies v. Broad, 41 Wash. 448, 83 Pac. 1025.

2. It is contended that, even conceding the power of the state to adopt a minimum of wages to be paid to laborers on public works carried on through the agency of its municipalities, still the city has no such power. It is argued that the ordinance is void because it seeks to declare a matter of public policy, and it is asserted that neither this court nor the city council has any power to define a question of policy.

As far as this court is concerned, the truth of the claim is so elementary that it may be passed with a simple admission. As to the power of the council, the question can hardly be so summarily dismissed. It is the clear intention of the Constitution to give to cities of the first class, of which the city of Spokane is one, the largest measure of local self-government compatible with the general authority of the state. Const. art. 11, § 10. It can "make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary, and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws." Const. art. 11, § 11. By virtue of the general law, it has "all the powers which are now or may hereafter be conferred upon incorporated towns and cities by the laws of this state, and all such powers as are usually exercised by municipal corporations of like character and degree, whether the same shall be specifically enumerated in this act or not." Rem. & Bal. Code, § 7518. It can make "all regulations necessary for the preservation of public morality, health, peace, and good order within its limits." Rem. & Bal. Code, § 7507, subdiv. 36. All of these powers it assumed in its charter adopted pursuant to the general law. As to matters of local concern, wider powers than those conferred upon cities of the first class by the Constitution and laws of this state can hardly be conceived. It seems plain, therefore that, unless the ordinance in question is contrary to some public policy of the state, either expressed by statute or implied therefrom, it must be held valid.

It is not claimed that it contravenes the policy of the state as declared in any express statutory enactment, but it is urged that it is contrary to public policy in that it increases the cost of public work. As we have seen, the state eight-hour law contains in itself a minimum wage provision as to emergency overtime, which is in excess of the prevailing wage. Rem. & Bal. Code, § 6572. Even exclusive of this provision, it has the effect of a minimum wage law. The prevailing daily wage in Spokane was shown to be the same for an eight, a nine, or a ten-hour day. Hence, assuming no increased efficiency by reason of fewer hours of work, the law would either increase the number of men simultaneously employed at the same rate of pay as for ten-hour days, or would increase the number of days of employment for the same number at the same rate. It follows that it tends to increase the cost of work in exact proportion to the fewer hours in the working day. The eight-hour law manifests a public policy on the part of the state to better the condition of laborers employed upon public work. The purpose of the minimum wage ordinance is precisely the same, and the policy which sustains the one warrants the other. We fail to find wherein the ordinance in question is contrary to any public policy of the state, either as declared or implied in any statutory enactment. On the contrary, it is in accord with the policy which underlies the eight-hour law.

But it may be remarked, in passing, that it is by no means the general consensus of informed opinion that either maximum time or minimum wage laws, not exceeding a reasonable living wage, when fairly tried out, will have the necessary effect of increasing the cost of work to any material extent, especially when applied only to public work. The evidence shows that there is no scarcity of laborers in Spokane, and it would seem that the shorter hours of labor and higher daily pay would necessarily attract many of them. The city and those doing its work by contract would thus have the choice, and could select the more efficient laborers. This would unquestionably tend to counteract in efficiency the added cost caused by shorter hours and higher pay. Contractors would, in time, learn this fact, and make their calculations and bids accordingly. For a thoughtful discussion of this phase of the law, see an article in Atlantic Monthly for September, 1913, by James Bates Clark, professor of economics in Columbia University, by no means an appreciation, also an article by Sidney Webb in the Journal of Political Economy for December, 1912, page 979.

It is also asserted in the original opinion that, in its control and improvement of streets, "the city acts in its proprietary capacity," and that, where the work is paid for by special assessment, "its council is the agent of the property owner;" the argument apparently being that the power of the council is limited by the strict rules of a private agency. It is true that the expressions to the effect of the first above quotation are found in many of the adjudicated cases, some of them our own; but these expressions are always stated in a qualified way. No well-considered case goes farther than to say that the city's power to improve streets is not a purely governmental function "in the strict sense." The cases usually related to the liability of the city for injuries by reason of defective streets and the like, and the liability is the same whether the improvement of the streets was paid for out of the general fund or by special assessment against the property benefited. Sutton v. Snohomish, 11 Wash. 24, 48 Am. St. Rep. 847, 39 Pac. 273. It is obvious that the mode of payment does not impress a character upon the work as public or private. No distinction has ever been made between the two classes of streets so far as their public character is concerned, or so far as the quality of the city's ownership is concerned. In neither is the city's ownership of that purely private quality which is found in its ownership of public utilities built and operated by it for hire or profit, such as waterworks or municipal lighting plants. It is only where the work is "of private advantage and emolument" to the corporation that the city "quo ad hoc is to be regarded as a private company" in the strict sense. Bailey v. New York, 3 Hill, 531, 38 Am. Dec. 669; 28 Cyc. p. 125. On the other hand, "public duties are, in general, those which are exercised by the state as a part of its sovereignty, for the benefit of the whole public, and the discharge of which is delegated or imposed by the state upon the municipal corporation. They are not exercised either by the state or the corporation for its own emolument or benefit, but for the benefit and protection of the entire population. Familiar examples of such governmental duties are the duty of preserving the peace, and the protection of property from wrongdoers, the construction of highways, the protection of health, and the prevention of nuisances." Hart v. Bridgeport, 13 Blatchf. 289, 293, Fed. Cas. No. 6,149. These authorities are cited with apparent approval in Seattle v. StIRRat, 55 Wash. 560, 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1275, 104 Pac. 834. That case can therefore hardly be considered as authority for the claim that street work, however paid for, is not public work. It would seem that, as to the control and improvement of its streets, the functions of the city partake of both the governmental and corporate qualities; governmental in that the power and duty to open and improve the highways rests primarily in the state as an attribute of sovereignty, and is delegated by it to the city as a governmental agency of the state; corporate in that the streets of the city, in addition to being a matter of public concern to the people of the whole state, like other highways, are also of more intimate concern to the corporate community as such. But the discussion of this phase of the question would seem to be largely academic, since, even if the work be considered purely a matter of private concern to the city, it, like any other person, can prescribe the terms upon which it will contract.

It is true, also, that it is sometimes stated that the city, in making improvements and levying special assessments to pay therefor, is the agent of the property owner. "These statements are, however, mere dicta, representing an analogy but not a principle. The municipality is the superior imposing a tax, not an agent binding a principal by contract. Whenever the question becomes a practical one, it is held that the public corporation or quasi corporation is not the agent." 1 Page & Jones, Taxation by Assessment, § 16, p. 32. It is obvious that the agency is merely conventional and lacks nearly all of the elements of an ordinary agency. The authority does not emanate from the supposed principal. The work is not that of the supposed principal. He cannot discharge the supposed agent, nor direct the agent in the performance of the work. He pays for the work by an enforced, involuntary charge as he pays other taxes. "While the general theory of assessments for benefits presents some points of resemblance to quasi contract, assessment is not a form of quasi contract other than as taxes generally are." 1 Page & Jones, Taxation by Assessments, § 18, p. 35. It seems more exact to say that the council is the agent of the law, both in letting the contract and in levying the assessment. Hamilton, Special Assessments, p. 400; 1 Page & Jones, Taxation by Assessment, § 19. As we have seen, the power to levy the special assessment is traceable solely to the taxing power of the state. In the absence of constitutional or statutory restraint, this power is subject to no other fundamental limitations than these: "It must be for a public purpose, as taxation can be exercised for none other; the property upon which the charge is laid must be peculiarly and specially benefited by the work; and the charge must be apportioned according to the benefits by some reasonable rule, and must not exceed such benefits." Hamilton, Special Assessments, § 54. In the absence of some special provision that the work must be let to the lowest bidder, it would seem that the property owner whose property is assessed for a special improvement, but only to the amount in which it is benefited thereby, would have no more right to complain of the effect of a maximum hours law or a minimum wage law, as increasing the cost of the work, than would a general taxpayer where the work is to be paid for out of the general fund. Indeed, it would seem that he has less reason to complain, since, in theory at least, he gets a direct quid pro quo for the expenditure, while the general taxpayer does not. It will be noted that the quotation from Hamilton in the original opinion is guarded in this respect. We quote again the part stating the condition upon which such provisions have been held to invalidate the assessment: "Where contracts for local improvements are required by law to be awarded to the responsible bidder offering to do the work for the lowest sum, any provision in the specifications tending to increase the cost and make the bids less favorable to the property owners is illegal and void. Such provisions are commonly restrictive of the hours of daily labor that men employed by the contractor may work, or forbidding the employment of Chinese or alien labor, or fixing the minimum rate of wages. Whatever form this restriction assumes will be disregarded by the courts, if the conditions increase the cost of the work to the taxpayers." Hamilton, Special Assessments, § 452. Obviously, if it is left to the discretion of the council to determine what elements of cost shall enter into the work, and whether the work shall be done by contract at all, or whether by the city itself and the cost assessed to the property benefited, and, if done by contract, there is no requirement that it be let to the lowest bidder, then the rule stated by Hamilton would have no application. So long as the council acted in good faith, a general law or a general ordinance not unreasonably increasing the cost of the work would not invalidate the assessment.

But it is claimed that "the charter of the city of Spokane provides that contracts for work of the kind here undertaken shall be let upon competitive bids. It is also the policy of the state, as declared by the legislature, that all contracts for local improvements shall be done by contract upon like bids." Malette v. Spokane, 68 Wash. 578, 123 Pac. 1005, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 986. As to the second statement above quoted, we have been cited to no statute of this state or legislative declaration of any kind requiring work by cities of the first class on local improvements such as here undertaken to be done by contract upon competitive bids, or directing that it must be done by contract at all; and diligent search has failed to reveal any such statute. On the contrary, the statutes (Rem. & Bal. Code, § 7507, subdivs. 10 and 13) declare: "Any such city shall have power . . . (10) To provide for making local improvements, and to levy and collect special assessments on property benefited thereby, and for paying for the same or any portion thereof. . . . (13) To determine what work shall be done or improvements made at the expense, in whole or in part, of the owners of the adjoining, contiguous, or proximate property, or others specially benefited thereby, and to provide for the manner of making and collecting assessments therefor." And that (Rem. & Bal. Code, § 7560): "Any city of the first class having authority to provide for making local improvements and to levy and collect special assessments on property benefited thereby, and for paying for the same or any portion thereof; and to determine what work shall be done or improvements made at the expense, in whole or in part, of the owners of the adjoining, contiguous, or proximate property, or others specially benefited thereby, and to provide for the manner of making and collecting assessments therefor, may exercise such authority by general or special ordinance, or by general and special ordinance jointly." And that (Rem. & Bal. Code, § 7567): "Cities of the first class shall by ordinance prescribe the method by which this act shall be put into operation, and any provisions herein which may be made applicable to existing delinquent assessments may be extended by ordinance to them." See, also, the following sections of the statute: 5802, 7518, 7529, 7530, 7531, 7570, 7572, 7578, and 7894. These statutory provisions all indicate a clear intention to leave the whole matter of making such improvements in cities of the first class to the discretion of the city, subject to its charter provisions. In the absence of some statute directing that the work shall be done by contract, any city may do it either by contract or through its own officers, and assess the cost against the abutting property in proportion to the benefits. "It was not essential that the town should let any contract at all for doing the work. We see no reason why it could not have made the entire improvement through its own officers and assessed the cost thereof on the property fronting upon the street in proportion to benefits. We find nothing in the statute which forbids it." Tumwater v. Pix, 18 Wash. 156, 51 Pac. 354. The right of a city to include in assessments items not fixed by competition has been sustained by this court. For example, interest in case of reassessment (Northwestern & P. Hypotheek Bank v. Spokane, 18 Wash. 456, 51 Pac. 1070; Philadelphia Mortg. & T. Co. v. New Whatcom, 19 Wash. 225, 52 Pac. 1063; Young v. Tacoma, 31 Wash. 153, 164, 71 Pac. 742); engineering expenses and the like (Re Jackson Street, 62 Wash. 432, 435, 113 Pac. 1112; Re South Shilshole Place, 61 Wash. 246, 251, 112 Pac. 228). It would seem that the discretion of the city, in so far as not controlled by its charter, and, so long as it is exercised in good faith, and not in such manner as unreasonably to increase the cost of the work, will not be interfered with.

As to the second claim, we fail to find any provision in the charter of Spokane providing that such work must be done by contract. That matter is left to the discretion of the city council or board of public works, and, when it is decided to do the work by contract, there is no provision that it shall be let to the lowest bidder. The provisions applicable are as follows:

"Sec. 97. The board of public works shall have exclusive charge of the improvement and extension of all streets and alleys. They shall have charge of improving or altering all sewers. They shall have charge of the waterworks and all improvements and changes in the same. They shall have charge of laying all water pipes and doing everything that pertains to the conduct of the waterworks and the water supply system of the city. They shall also have charge of all things pertaining to the drainage of the city. They shall have charge of all bridges and the erection and improvement of the same. They shall have charge of the employing of all persons in discharge of the duties herein mentioned. They shall 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) have charge of the erection and improvement of public buildings and the inspection of private buildings.

"Sec. 98. When it shall be decided to do work by contract, they shall advertise at least ten days in two daily newspapers of the city for bids, accompanied by a certified check to an amount to be fixed by the board and named in said advertisement, not exceeding 10 per cent of the estimated cost of the work, reserving the right to reject any and all bids; provided, that in all contracts awarded, in which the probable amount of expenditure would exceed $1,000, the publication shall be made for a period not less than twenty days. If the mayor and city council shall by resolution declare an emergency to exist, the publication herein provided for may be dispensed with.

"Sec. 99. The board shall have charge of all public works of every kind, where not otherwise provided for in this charter, and charge of furnishing all material and supplies for such work, and shall report to the city council such work, as it shall deem necessary and proper to be performed for the city, and if the council shall concur with the board, the board shall have power to enter into contracts therefor and for the performance of such other public works, as may be authorized or directed by the city council.

"Whenever proposals for supplies for work shall be advertised to be let to the lowest bidder, a specified day and hour shall be named, when such bids shall be opened. Such bids shall be made in duplicate, one to be furnished to the mayor and one to the clerk of the city commissioners, and such bids shall be accompanied by an affidavit of the bidder, that the same is made in good faith, and there is no collusion or understanding between him and any other bidder on such work. Such bids may be handed in any time before the hour designated for opening the same; and all bids, original and duplicate, shall be opened at the hour named, in public and in the presence of such persons as may see fit to attend such opening of bids. As soon as the bids are opened, the clerk or other officer with whom the same are filed, shall, in the presence of the board or officer opening them, record the same in a book kept for that purpose; provided, nothing herein shall be construed to prevent the rejection of any or all bids tendered when so deemed to be proper."

It will be noted that the board has the power to reject any and all bids, and that it is only in connection with proposals for supplies that the lowest bidder is mentioned at all. There is apparently a discretion even in that case as to whether the advertisement shall be for letting to the lowest bidder or not. These charter provisions are far from being of that mandatory character which would override the general statutes of the state or general ordinances of the city, applicable alike to all work whether done by contract or not. Since the work might be done without letting a contract at all, it is plain that the competitive principle would have no such drastic application as to prevent the city from providing reasonable conditions under which the work might be done, even though such conditions tended in some degree to modify competition in some particular.

3. Finally, it is urged that the ordinance is unreasonable, and, in its last analysis, the opinion on the first hearing rests upon the initial assumption that any minimum of wages materially above the prevailing rate is unreasonable per se. With this we cannot agree. The reasonableness of an ordinance is always open to review by the court where it is passed under the general powers of the city, and not in direct response to a statutory direction; but, even in such cases, the ordinance is entitled to a presumption of reasonableness until the contrary is made to appear to the court in some manner. Judge Dillon lays down the following rule: "But the power of the court to declare an ordinance void because it is unreasonable is one which must be carefully exercised. When the ordinance is within the grant of power conferred upon the municipality, the presumption is that it is reasonable, unless its unreasonable character appears upon its face. But the courts will declare an ordinance to be void because unreasonable upon a state of facts being shown which makes it unreasonable. If the ordinance is not inherently unfair, unreasonable, or oppressive, the person attacking it must assume the burden of affirmatively showing that, as applied to him, it is unreasonable, unfair, and oppressive." 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 5th ed. § 591. The court, in such cases, will take notice of existing conditions and circumstances, and, if it cannot say that the ordinance is, on its face, unreasonable in view of all of the conditions, it will not declare the ordinance void for that reason. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 327. "Courts, in passing upon the reasonableness or unreasonableness of a statute, and deciding whether the legislature has exceeded its powers to such an extent as to render the act invalid, must look at the terms of the act itself, and bring to their assistance such scientific, economic, physical, and other pertinent facts as are common knowledge and of which they can take judicial notice." State v. Somerville, 67 Wash. 638, 641, 122 Pac. 324, 326; 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

We will take notice of the fact that the cost of living, even as contributed to by the actual necessities of life, has greatly increased within the past few years, and that this increase has been out of proportion to the increase in the prevailing wages of common laborers. It is admitted that, if the ordinance was reasonable, it is valid; but counsel insists that, as there exists no direct statutory enactment authorizing its passage, the ordinance must be shown to be "reasonable within the meaning of that term as applied to the judicial mind." It would be more exact to say that the burden is even then upon those attacking the ordinance to show that it is unreasonable. Aside from its recognition of constitutional and statutory inhibitions, the judicial mind is not different from any other mind. It must consider the circumstances, the purposes, and the reasonable tendency of the ordinance to meet such purposes. If the purpose is lawful, and the means reasonable, the ordinance cannot be declared invalid. The seventh biennial report of the commissioner of labor of this state, for 1909-10, presents a table bearing on the cost of living, which was cited at the second but not at the first hearing of this case. The commissioner, on pages 39 and 40, referring to this table, says: "Prices for 1900 are given as a base, and increases or decreases in the cost of the different commodities considered are shown for a period of years terminating with 1910. For the latter year, a final comparison is presented with prices quoted in 1900. An analysis of the tabulations supplies abundant evidence in support of the common conviction that the cost of living is advancing out of proportion to increases in compensation paid to wage earners. Moreover, it is important to note that in the list of commodities which have advanced most rapidly are included such staples as rye, graham and wheat flour, rice, eggs, lard, beans, ham, bacon, and fresh meats; the average increase in cost of the above commodities for the period mentioned being 72 per cent." The commissioner also states (biennial report for 1909-10, p. 6) that from all of the assembled facts, and as a result of the investigations of the bureau, it is evident that wages have failed to keep pace with the advance in living expenses. This is also a matter of common knowledge. There is no testimony to the contrary. In view of these conditions, can anyone say that a wage of $2.75 a day is, as a matter of law, more than a reasonable living wage? The unit, as applied to the problem of living, is the family, not the individual, and $2.75 or even $3 a day can hardly be complacently pronounced as an unreasonable sum for supporting such a unit. (It may be remarked in passing, however, that a comparison of the later with the earlier ordinance, which it does not repeal, indicates that it was probably never intended to apply to work done on the local improvement plan.) To hold that the payment of any sum which we cannot say is above a reasonable living wage, though it may be above the prevailing rate of wages, is a mere gratuity, would be to sacrifice the fact to a mere term. Such a holding would be an indictment of our civilization.

The judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

It is but fair to the members of Department 1 to say that the controlling questions in this case were much more thoroughly briefed and discussed on the rehearing than on the first presentation.

Main, Morris, and Fullerton, JJ., concur.

Parker, J.:

Upon more mature consideration, I am constrained to concur in the foregoing opinion, though it overrules the decision rendered by Department No. 1, in which I concurred. I was led to entertain the views expressed in the former decision because it then seemed to me that there was a distinction to be drawn between work done by the city, to be paid for out of its general funds, and work done under the supervision of the city officers, to be paid for by special assessment against the benefited property, in that the former constituted an act of the city in its own behalf without any element of agency being involved, while the latter constituted an act of the city officers as agents of the property owners who were to pay for the improvement by special assessment against their property. However, a review of the authorities cited in Judge Ellis' opinion convinces me that no such distinction can be rested upon sound legal grounds. The notion of agency on the part of municipal officers for the property owners in the making of local improvements, somewhat loosely expressed in the decisions of the courts, I apprehend, for the most part, arose from the fact that, in the early history of local improvements and assessments, they were not made save by consent of the property owners or some considerable majority of them. This, not for want of legislative power to provide otherwise, but because of legislative restrictions against forcing such improvements and assessments upon property owners except by consent of some specified majority of the owners of the property within the particular district involved. Under existing laws in this state, such improvements and assessments can be lawfully made even against the will of all of the property owners of the district involved. This being true, I am now of the opinion that the officers of the city, so far as their powers are concerned, do not represent the owners of property to be assessed for local improvements in any different capacity than they represent the general taxpayer when carrying on a public work for the city, to be paid for by general taxation, and that the former is as purely public work as the latter.

The review of the statutory and charter powers of Spokane relative to the making of local improvements and assessments, made by Judge Ellis, seems to render it plain that such improvements are not required to be done by contract, nor to be awarded to the lowest bidder when done by contract, so far, at least, as labor is concerned; so that the element of competition in that regard is not, by law or charter, required in the making of such improvements any more than when the city employs a servant in any capacity. This problem, it seems to me, in its last analysis, is simply a question of the power of the city, through its duly constituted officers, to contract for public work involving the discretion of such officers to pay or cause to be paid reasonable compensation for such work. Viewed in this light, I am of the opinion that it was not an abuse of discretion on the part of the city authorities to fix the minimum compensation of laborers employed upon public work of the city at the amount they did by the ordinance here involved.

At the former hearing, having in view a distinction between work done by the city at the expense of the general taxpayers and work done by the city officers at the expense of special assessment payers, and that the latter partook of the nature of private work between employer and employee, which I now concede to be erroneous, and the argument of counsel being then directed largely to the city's police power, I was convinced that the city possessed no such police power as would enable it to fix a minimum wage as between private employer and employee. Whether the state, by legislative enactment, may not fix a minimum wage as between private employer and employee, is quite a different question, as to which I refrain from expressing an opinion at this time. But I do not think the question of police power is involved in this case at all,—no more than it is when the city employs a servant and fixes his compensation. Should the compensation so fixed be clearly excessive, a taxpayer may have the right to interfere by proper proceedings in court just as he would have the right to so complain were the city buying supplies and paying a clearly excessive and unwarranted price therefor. I am not able to see that the property owner paying a local assessment would have any different or higher right to complain. I apprehend, however, that such unwarranted use of public funds by the city authorities would have to be of such a flagrant character that reasonable minds could not differ relative thereto, before the courts could be induced to interfere. We have no such case here.

I am free to say that upon the former hearing I was as fully convinced of the correctness of the views expressed by the writer of the opinion as he was himself, but more mature consideration of the real question involved has led me to the views I here express, and I therefore concur in the foregoing opinion.

Crow, Ch. J.:

I concur with Judge Parker. Although I signed the former opinion, I am now convinced that the judgment of the trial court should be affirmed.

Gose, J.:

I still adhere to the conclusion reached by the court at the first hearing. 68 Wash. 578, 123 Pac. 1005, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 936. The concrete question presented is: Can a city arbitrarily fix a minimum wage, approximately 25 per cent in excess of the current wage, and assess the same against the property benefited by the improvement upon which the labor has been performed, in the absence of express or clearly implied authority from the state? In my opinion it cannot do so. "Courts will review the question as to reasonableness of ordinances passed under a grant of power general in its nature, or under incidental or implied municipal powers, and if any given ordinance is found unreasonable will declare it void as a matter of law." McQuillin, Mun. Ord. § 182. The power of the state itself to fix a minimum wage is not before us, for it has not as yet legislated upon that subject, nor has it expressly delegated the power to cities to do so. The needs of the laborer resulting from the higher cost of living are beside the question. Upon that subject I raise no issue. The question is: Shall the reasonableness of the ordinance be measured by the current wage, or by what the court conceives the current wage ought to be? I think the former must be the test until the state itself has definitely spoken. Up to the present it has never been held to my knowledge that a city may make a donation to a citizen under color of law, and assess the bounty against the property of an objecting owner. I cannot escape the conclusion that a payment for a public work, 25 per cent in excess of the price at which other citizens stand ready to do the work, where the work is done by the city upon the assessment plan, is, in the absence of clear statutory warrant, in the nature of a bounty. If the city may fix a minimum wage largely in excess of the current wage, it may with a like consistency fix a minimum price for all material that enters into a public work, for the larger part of the cost of most material is human labor; and the man behind the brick and cement—that is, the man who furnishes the labor to put in into usable form—is as worthy of legislative protection as the man who puts it down. Whether the council is the agent of the property owner, as Judge Chadwick concluded, or the "agent of the law," as Judge Ellis concludes, where it acts under a general grant of power, its acts must be subject to the test of reasonableness. Until the state has definitely declared a policy fixing a minimum wage upon all work done for it and its members, whether paid for by general taxation or by assessment upon the property benefited, I feel constrained to take the view that an ordinance like the one in question is unreasonable.

I have contented myself with a brief statement of my view because the subject was fully treated by Judge Chadwick following the first hearing. I therefore dissent.

Mount, J.:

I concur in the view expressed by Judge Gose.

Chadwick, J.:

I concur in what is said by Judge Gose. The result of the court's decision is that a city council can, in order to meet what it conceives to be the living expenses of a citizen, arbitrarily take from the substance of one man and give it as a bounty to another, and that without measuring or even considering the ability of the subject of its impressment to pay the tax. The opinion of the court has taken a wide range, but it should be borne in mind that we did not in our former opinion hold the ordinance to be unconstitutional.

We did not hold that the legislature might not by general law authorize a city to pass the ordinance in question.

We did not hold that a city could not by charter amendment provide for the payment of a minimum wage higher than or even unreasonably higher than the current or going wages.

We did not hold that a city could not fix a wage scale to be paid its employees out of the general fund, or that it could not fix the hours of labor. Our holding was in its essence no more than this: That an agent is bound to do for his principal when pursuing the trust relation as well as he could have done for himself. Until the decision in this case was pronounced, this principle had been regarded as fundamental.

It may be inferred from what is said in the majority opinion that we held the ordinances of the city of Spokane fixing a minimum wage to be unconstitutional. In the former opinion the constitutionality of the ordinances was not questioned. The judges who participated in that decision, with one exception, had no doubt that such ordinances, if properly passed, would do no violence to any constitutional guaranty of personal or property rights.

There is and there can be but one question for solution; that is, whether an ordinance passed without the sanction of a general law passed by the legislature and approved by the governor, which fixes a wage from 25 to 40 per cent higher than the current wages for like labor in the same place, can be taxed against an unwilling citizen without violating that fundamental principle of the law that municipal ordinances must be reasonable. We held under the facts of the case before us that the difference was so great that the ordinance was in its operation unreasonable. We did not hold or preclude ourselves from holding under a different state of facts that the wages fixed by the ordinance might not be reasonable. The majority opinion seems to me to be an endeavor to meet a sociological problem with which this court can have nothing to do, for it is a legislative and political question, and the argument of the majority does not touch the premise of the question before us. If approached at all, it is lost sight of in the assertion of those beneficent principles which are at the present time engaging the attention of thoughtful persons all over the world and which will be in time taken care of by appropriate legislation. In the absence of the authority to which Judge Gose has adverted, courts cannot and should not be influenced by the opinions of political propagandists, however engaging and however reasonable they may seem to be. Humanitarian impulses are the wellsprings of social progress, but to define them and to put them into the forms of law is not the work of the courts. Their work is limited by narrower bounds, and wisely so, for people of this and all English speaking countries have undertaken by express limitation and by the strongest implications to keep the lawmaking powers in the people themselves. The duty of a court is to follow the law as made by the people, and not to create a rule to meet a situation however urgent, for the power to frame a humanitarian impulse into law (judge-made) implies a power to frame a law that will usurp and cripple the rights of the people.

We have the law before us; Judge Gose has said in his dissenting opinion what it is; that is, that the power to do these things is in the legislature, and, until it has spoken, it is the duty of the court to follow the law as it finds it. In this case the court has followed a humanitarian impulse, and to that extent its action is to be applauded, but in doing so it has violated principles and commands that may invite those whose petitions should be more properly addressed to the lawmaking powers, to go to the courts and invoke the sympathy of the judges to the end that it will meet conditions not theretofore recognized by the people or by their representatives. This means but one thing,—judicial legislation, which is judicial tyranny. This is especially so in this case. After the original decision was pronounced, the legislature convened in regular session. Bills were introduced in both the house and senate, and an attempt was made to pass a law legalizing that which this court had held to be invalid. The bills were killed. The idea of taking from one and giving to another found no favor with the legislature. This fact, coupled with the decision previously rendered, would in itself be sufficient under the hitherto accepted canons of statutory construction to warrant a reaffirmation of our previous decision. To hold otherwise makes this case sui generis.

I want to take exception to the concluding clause of the majority opinion: "It is but fair to the members of Department 1 to say that the controlling questions in this case were much more thoroughly briefed and discussed on the rehearing than on the first presentation." I deny that the real question before the court was more thoroughly briefed and discussed on the rehearing. Every question that was properly before the court was briefed and orally argued. The former opinion of the court was given the mature consideration of every member of the court and was sanctioned by all with two exceptions, one dissented and the other was uncertain at the time. The briefs submitted on rehearing were longer. They quoted from the words and works of political economists and humanitarians, but they nowhere touched the law any closer than did the original briefs. In fact they went beyond the law and in some particulars, as it seems to me, are open to the criticism that they are coercive or, at least, an invitation to the court to subscribe to the political side of the controversy. In this sense they were offensive and should have been stricken. Personally, I would be glad to see every man who labors paid a fair wage, more than a going wage, for I know that wages are too often hammered down to meet the bare necessities of the wage earner; but I have not the means to pay those who should be paid more, nor have I the right, when sitting in judgment on the affairs of my fellow men, to say that my neighbor shall pay more, and that by judicial mandate.

The humanitarian or economic phase of the question is not properly before the court, as I have undertaken to demonstrate; but, since it has been discussed, I have this to say:

In considering the necessity of the man who works upon a paving job, it is possible that the court has overlooked the rights and necessities of the small home owner whose property is improved against his will and who is really unable to meet an arbitrarily added cost. He may be no less a laboring man than the man who works upon a street contract. The fact that a man works for a paving contractor has not hitherto, either in law, equity, or morals, given him a right to be considered over the man who is working in some shop or factory, or in some store or printing office, and who is undertaking to build for himself and his family a comfortable home. To this man who labors the rule of the majority may mean loss and confiscation. A question of ethics might arise if the court had looked at both sides of the question and had been willing to see the necessities, the struggles, of the wage earner who is also the small home owner, and who is, in virtue of a court-made law, made to bear a burden he had no reason to expect, and which he must have assumed to be beyond the power of the court to declare.

By what right the majority assumes to disregard the testimony in this case, and upon the report of the commissioner of labor say what is a reasonable wage, I am at a loss to know; courts have hitherto based their conclusions upon testimony; but, assuming that the court is right, I could, if it were proper to do so, furnish documents and opinions of equal merit and of equal force to sustain the proposition that the modern tendency of our municipalities to create assessment districts, to issue bonds, to put charges upon property, to buy prosperity on credit, must in the end inevitably force the one who now owns a home to give it up, and at the same time deter the one who desires to put into realization the home instinct which is dominant in the heart of every normal man. Let it be remembered that in compelling the home owner to pay from 25 to 40 per cent more for the workman the city furnishes him than he would have to pay if he had employed the same man, and this to meet the increased cost of living, the money collected for that purpose comes in the main from those who are equally deserving and whose necessities are equally as great. The court has made the necessities of the one his fortune. It has made the helplessness of the other his misfortune.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT. (Department No. 2.)

H. A. RASER, Appt.,

v.

GEORGE A. MOOMAW and Wife, Respts.

(78 Wash. 653, 139 Pac. 622.)

Fraud — introducing impostor to broker — liability for loss.

One who, with knowledge of the fraud, introduces to a money broker without knowledge of or means of knowing the facts, a person impersonating the owner of real estate, stating that he desires to borrow money on the property, and thereby enables him to secure a loan which cannot be recovered because the borrower is an impostor and insolvent, is liable to make good the loss resulting to the broker from the transaction.

(March 26, 1914.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for King County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for alleged fraud and deceit in aiding an impostor in securing money from plaintiff. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Clise & Poe, for appellant:

If a person states as true, as of his own knowledge, material facts susceptible of knowledge, to one who relies and acts thereon to his injury, he cannot defeat recovery by showing that he did not know that his representations were false, or that he believed them to be true.

Note. — Liability of one who introduces or identifies an impostor, for fraud perpetrated by him.

Research has disclosed no case similar to RASER v. MOOMAW, passing upon the above question, except Lahay v. City Nat. Bank, 15 Colo. 339, 22 Am. St. Rep. 407, 25 Pac. 704, the opinion of which is quoted in the RASER CASE. It should be observed,

Fullerton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In this action the appellant sought to recover from the respondents for fraud and deceit. In his complaint the appellant stated his cause of action as follows:

"Plaintiff complaining against defendants alleges:

"I. That plaintiff is now and at all times herein mentioned was engaged as a real estate broker in the city of Seattle.

"II. That at all the dates and times herein mentioned, the defendants were husband and wife, and as such constituted a community under the laws of the state of Washington.

"III. That during the month of November, 1910, the defendant George A. Moomaw, acting on behalf of said community, for the purpose of inducing plaintiff to procure the loan hereinafter described, introduced him to a woman whose true name is to plaintiff unknown, and then and there represented her to be Annie L. Knowles, of Seattle, Washington, and also the owner of lot 10, block 3, Noah Fleckinger's Town Plat Cove addition to Seattle.

"IV. That at the time of said introduction, said defendant further represented to plaintiff that said woman desired to borrow the sum of $1,500 secured by a note and mortgage upon said premises, and that in the event said loan were made, she would pay to plaintiff and the defendants a broker's commission.

"V. That relying upon said introduction and the representations made by said defendant, plaintiff, on the 2d day of December, 1910, in the ordinary course of business, induced one of his clients, S. M. Obradovich, to loan said woman the sum of $1,500 upon her note and mortgage covering said premises, bearing interest at 7 per cent per annum, which said note and mortgage were wrongfully made, executed, and delivered by said woman as Annie L. Knowles, and by reason of the representations of defendants to him made, plaintiff informed his said client that said woman was Annie L. Knowles.

"VI. That said defendants knew, or in the exercise of reasonable prudence and caution should have known, that said woman was an impostor, and that her true name was not Annie L. Knowles, but that she assumed the same for the purpose of cheating and defrauding this plaintiff.

"VII. That plaintiff did not know, and had no means of knowing, that said woman was not the person whom said defendant represented her to be, or that she was not the owner of said property and entitled to make, execute, and deliver said note and mortgage thereupon, but wholly relied, and was expected by defendants to rely, upon said introduction and representations of however, that the Lahay Case not only supports the conclusion reached in RASER v. MOOMAW, but seems to go farther as respects the proof necessary to show knowledge of the falsity of the identification, the court in the Lahay Case apparently approving the rule that one who introduces an impostor, making a positive statement as to identity, when in fact he has no positive knowledge on the matter, and the other party does not know its falsity, is liable to such other party for the damages sustained in consequence of reliance upon the false statement, without further proof that the one making the statement knew that it was false.

defendants as to her identity and authority to execute and deliver said note and mortgage.

"VIII. That it subsequently developed and is a matter of fact that said woman was not Annie L. Knowles, but was some other person, and has since been convicted and sentenced to prison for frauds similar to the one practised by her upon plaintiff, by reason of which the note and mortgage given to S. M. Obradovich are worthless, and plaintiff was compelled to pay him the amount thereof, to wit, the sum of $1,500, together with interest upon said sum from the 2d day of December, 1910, at the rate of 7 per cent per annum.

"Wherefore plaintiff demands judgment against the defendants and each of them in the sum of $1,500, together with interest thereupon from the 2d day of December, 1910, until paid, and for costs and disbursements herein laid out and expended to be taxed."

To the complaint a general demurrer was interposed by the respondents, which the trial court sustained. The appellant thereupon declined to plead further, and a judgment of dismissal was entered, from which he appeals.

The essential elements necessary to constitute actionable fraud and deceit are in the main well settled. These elements are correctly set forth in 20 Cyc. 13. It is there said that "it must appear: (1) That defendant made a material representation; (2) that it was false; (3) that when he made it he knew that it was false, or made it recklessly, without any knowledge of its truth, and as a positive assertion; (4) that he made it with the intention that it should be acted upon by plaintiff; (5) that plaintiff acted in reliance upon it; and (6) that he thereby suffered injury."

Tested by these principles it seems to us clear that the complaint states a cause of action. The element of materiality is found in the allegation that the representation was made for the purpose of inducing the appellant to procure a loan for the woman introduced, and the allegation that the appellant did not know, and had no means of knowing, that the woman was not the person whom he represented her to be; the element of false representation, in the third, sixth, seventh, and eighth paragraphs of the complaint; the element of knowledge, from the general tenor of the complaint, and from the sixth paragraph particularly; the element of intention, from the third paragraph, which avers that the introduction was made for the purpose of inducing the appellant to procure a loan for the woman introduced, and from the seventh paragraph, to the effect that the appellant wholly relied, and was expected by the defendants to rely, upon the introduction and representation of the respondents as to the woman's identity; the element of reliance on the representations, in the fifth and seventh paragraphs of the complaint; and the element of injury, from the allegation that he induced his client to make the loan and was afterwards compelled to repay the money loaned to his client. It may be true that the complaint is not as full as could be desired; and it may be true, also, that certain of its paragraphs are subject to a motion to make more definite and certain, but we are clear that that complaint contains the elements of a good cause of action, and is sufficient as against a general demurrer.

We shall not notice in detail the objections the respondents urge against the complaint. The principal one is that the complaint shows on its face that the appellant did not act with ordinary care or business prudence in ascertaining the identity of the woman claiming herself to be Annie L. Knowles; in support of which it is argued that the appellant should not have relied upon the respondents' representations, but should have inquired elsewhere concerning her identity. But, overlooking the moral side to such an argument,—coming as it does from the very persons who made the false representations,—the argument itself is not sound, in view of the allegation in the complaint to the effect that the appellant did not know, and had no means of knowing, that the woman introduced was not the person whom the respondents represented her to be, or the owner of the property she offered to mortgage; there being nothing on the face of the record or the subject-matter of the controversy, which indicates that the allegation is not true. The allegations may be subject to dispute after issue is joined upon them, but they are sufficient in the respect questioned until they are put in issue.

The respondents cite and quote at length from the case of Pigott v. Graham, 48 Wash. 348, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1176, 93 Pac. 435, claiming it to be controlling of the question at bar. That case, it is true, was an action for deceit in which the court held that the plaintiff had no right to rely upon the representations of the defendant. But the decision was rested on the fact that the subject-matter of the controversy was before the very eyes of the complaining party when the false representations concerning it were claimed to have been made, and the court held this fact estopped the plaintiff to complain of the false representations. But the facts in the case before us are different. Here, as we say, it is alleged that the appellant did not know, and had no means of knowing, the representations were false, and the surrounding conditions do not belie the allegation.

The case at bar is novel in the respect that on the facts presented it seems to have no exact counterpart in the reported cases. At least none has been called to our attention, and our own research has discovered none. The case most nearly approaching it upon the facts is, perhaps, the case of Lahay v. City Nat. Bank, 15 Colo. 339, 22 Am. St. Rep. 407, 25 Pac. 704. In that case Lahay had falsely identified to the bank the holder of a certificate calling for the payment of money as the person who was named in the certificate. The bank officers did not know either the person holding the certificate or the person named therein, and on the faith of the representations made by Lahay paid the money due thereon to the holder. It afterwards developed that the person identified was not entitled to cash the certificate, and the bank was compelled to pay the money a second time at the suit of the true owner. After doing so it brought an action against Lahay to recover as for deceit upon his false representation, and recovered in the trial court. On the appeal of Lahay the judgment was affirmed in the reported case. Passing upon the questions urged for reversal, the court said: "The action is founded upon the deceit practised upon appellee by appellant, by means of which appellee was induced to pay the amount of the certificate to D'Armenthal, who had no claim to the money, instead of to John Phillipe, who alone was entitled to receive the same. Counsel contend, however, that appellant is not liable on account of his false statement, because he is not shown to have had knowledge of its falsity at the time of making the same. The question thus presented was before the court, and carefully considered in an early case. See Sellar v. Clelland, 2 Colo. 532. It was then held that the intention of one party to deceive and defraud another was sufficiently made out by showing that a false affirmation had in fact been made by the party, concerning a matter about which he had no actual knowledge, under circumstances showing that the matter spoken about was better known to the party making the representations than to the other party. And to the general rule requiring a party relying upon false representations to show, not only that they were false, but that the party making the same knew such to be the case, some exceptions were pointed out; as when one, as in this case, positively assures another that a certain statement is true, professing at the time to speak of his own knowledge, and about a matter not known to the party to whom the representations are made, 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) he cannot be allowed to complain because another has placed too much reliance upon the truth of what he himself has stated. In the language of the learned judge writing the opinion in the case of Sellar v. Clelland, supra: 'In such a case the proof would seem to be complete when it was shown that the defendants made the representations; that they were made to induce plaintiffs to enter into the contract; that, relying upon the same, they did enter into the contract; that the representations were false; that the plaintiffs sustained damage; and that such damage was occasioned by reason of the falsity of such representations'. The statute of frauds and perjuries cannot be invoked in this case to shield appellant. His liability does not grow out of any special promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another; nor is he sought to be held upon any agreement required to be in writing. Appellant is shown to have stated as of his own knowledge that Paul D'Armenthal was in fact John Phillipe, and that this representation was made for the express purpose of inducing appellee to pay over the money. It is also shown that the bank, relying upon such representation, did pay the money to D'Armenthal, supposing him to be John Phillipe entitled to receive the same. The representations were in fact false, and damages were sustained thereby. Every element necessary to a recovery under the decision in Sellar v. Clelland was here made out. The correctness of the decision in that case is not questioned. It is well supported by authority, and must control here." This case in principle is the same as the case at bar, and is authority for the conclusion that false representations as to the identity of a person are actionable, if made to induce another to act thereon, and such other does so act thereon to his prejudice.

The judgment appealed from is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to overrule the demurrer and permit the case to proceed in due course.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

LANSING E. LINCOLN, Admr., etc., of Ion Lincoln, Deceased, Plff. in Err.,

v.

DETROIT & MACKINAC RAILWAY COMPANY.

(— Mich. —, 146 N. W. 405.)

Death — minor — action by parent.

1. An action for the benefit of a parent for the instantaneous death of his minor son through another's negligence is not precluded under a statute providing that if the negligence is such as would, if death had not ensued, have entitled the person injured to maintain an action to recover damages in respect thereof, an action may be maintained for the benefit of his next of kin, by the fact that recovery is limited to the loss of the child's earnings during minority and that the child could not have recovered for loss of such earnings.

Evidence — death — presumption of care.

2. The presumption of due care on the part of one drowned while using an unsafe boat will support a recovery for his death against the one who let the boat to him, and is shown to have been guilty of negligence in so doing.

(March 26, 1914.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Arenac County to review a judgment in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's

Note. — Nature of right of action in favor of injured person, which will satisfy the condition of the death statute in the event of his death.

But one case in addition to LINCOLN v. DETROIT & M. R. Co. has been found to discuss the precise question indicated by the above title. That case, Johnson v. Eau Claire, 149 Wis. 194, 135 N. W. 481, involves a statute giving a right of action for the benefit of relatives of the deceased whenever death is caused by wrongful act or neglect such as would have entitled the party injured to recover if death had not ensued. In harmony with the LINCOLN CASE the court said in effect that, although the damages recoverable under the statute were different from those that could have been recovered by the deceased if death had not ensued, still the right of action under the death statute was not affected, since the question whether the deceased, had he survived, could have maintained an action, is the test of the right to maintain the statutory action and recover.

There are other cases which refer to the difference between the damages recoverable by an injured person, and those which his representatives may recover if the injuries result in death, but none of them have been found even to intimate that this in any way affected the right of action under the death statute. Those cases therefore are of no value in the present connection. No attempt has been made to present the cases of instantaneous death, or the decisions in which the deceased, if he had survived, would have been denied recovery under defenses of release, compromise, assignment, contributory negligence, imputed negligence, assumption of risk, fellow servants, or want of notice to the defendant where notice 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) intestate, for which defendant was alleged to be responsible. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William C. Cook and Tom Bechraft for plaintiff in error.

Mr. James McNamara, with Messrs. Henry, Henry, & Henry, for defendant in error:

There can be no recovery because if death had not ensued, "the party injured," Ion Lincoln, could not have sued the defendant for the recovery of his earning power, for that belonged to his parents.

Within the confines of the "death act," must be found the right to claim damages against defendant, if it exists, and if this statute does not give the right for recovery, then no right exists.

is required, as in the case of a municipal corporation.

So, also, as to cases which turn upon the fact that, although the defendant's conduct was such as is ordinarily actionable, the deceased, had he survived, could have maintained no action because of some personal disability, or because of some other technical reason. As an example of such cases, reference may be had to Wilson v. Brown, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 154 S. W. 322, holding that a statute giving a right of action for death from a wrongful act of such a character as would, if death had not ensued, have entitled the party injured to maintain an action,—did not authorize an action by a guardian in behalf of his wards for the killing of their mother by her husband, where, as in Texas, a married woman cannot maintain an action against her husband for a tort committed against her by him.

Generally, as to parents' common-law right of action for loss of services of child whose death is caused by negligence, see the notes to Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Beall, 41 L.R.A. 807, and Stevenson v. Ritter Lumber Co. 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 316.

Stone, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant owns and operates a railway system running from Pinconning, Bay County, to Linwood, in said county, and elsewhere. It owns, in connection with its railway system, a pleasure resort located along its right of way at its station at Linwood, which resort is contiguous to the waters of Saginaw bay. In connection with this summer resort, it operates and controls certain amusement features, to wit, stands, bathing, boating, and other devices for the amusement of the public, for profit.

On June 17, 1912, plaintiff's intestate, a boy sixteen years of age, was a passenger for hire on excursion rates from his home in Pinconning to said summer resort, to attend a school children's picnic thereat. Upon his arrival at said resort he secured a ticket from the defendant's ticket agent for the use of one of defendant's rowboats. He presented the ticket to another agent of defendant, who had the boats in charge, and obtained a certain boat known as "D. & M. Ry. Co. No. 22" from the boat tender, which was a 14-foot steel rowboat. The boat was obtained by plaintiff's decedent for the purpose of taking a row on the waters of the bay, in company with three companions of about the same age. Soon after leaving the landing the children were lost sight of, and it was afterwards discovered that they had been drowned. The action was brought under what is termed the "death act," to recover the pecuniary damages which it is claimed the father and mother have sustained by the death.

The declaration, after averring the duty of the defendant, alleges that it failed to provide plaintiff's intestate and his three companions a reasonably safe and seaworthy boat; that it failed to provide for a careful and prudent inspection of said boat as to its repair before leasing the same as aforesaid; that it failed to maintain the ends, side, and bottom of said boat free from holes and leaks so that water could not enter to the inside of said boat when in use by plaintiff's intestate and his companions for rowing purposes upon said water; that it failed to maintain the strip of wood around the inner side of said boat, to which were attached the prow and stern seats, to which seats were attached the air bulkheads or tanks, free from rot and other defects, etc., and alleging that it failed in some six other particulars, including that of permitting said boat to be overloaded, and that said boat was a two passenger boat, etc.

The trial court having directed a verdict for the defendant upon the opening statement of plaintiff's counsel, without receiving any evidence, it becomes necessary to refer to such statement. In such statement plaintiff's counsel stated, in substance, that he would show upon the trial that the strip which went around the inner side of the boat, to which was attached the seats, was of wood; that at the time the defendant's agent permitted decedent to get into the boat to go upon the water for a boat ride, he permitted decedent to load into what was really a two passenger boat four people, although decedent asked for a larger boat, but was told that the boat was large enough; that this was the first day of the year that the rowboats were placed for the use of the public; that they had not been inspected to determine whether or not they were in a seaworthy condition, and safe repair; that decedent and his companions left the dock at said resort between 11 and 12 o'clock a. m. and that a watch found in the pocket of one of the decedents had stopped between 12 and 1 p. m.; that when last seen the boat and party were about three quarters of a mile out from shore; that at the time the boat left the dock in charge of said party, it was in bad condition, and water was entering into the boat through seams in the rusting metal, it being an old boat, and had not been repainted or overhauled; that there were lying upon the beach and at hand larger boats of sufficient capacity to carry four and six passengers; that the hull of the boat furnished by defendant to decedent was constructed of steel; that the boat was not found, but that there were found floating on the surface, supported by the rear seat, the stern bulkhead and the boat mark, "Boat No. 22 D. & M.;" that the bulkhead under the seat was an oblong can, which should have been air-tight; that around the edge of this seat, when it was found, there were several screw nails still sticking through the wood of the seat board; that on the ends of these screw nails were particles of decomposed rotten wood still adhering, the screw nails having pulled loose from the boat; that the air tank, which should have been nonsinkable, was full of water, and only floated by reason of the board's buoyancy; that although the inspector was there, he had received from defendant no orders to inspect said boat; that it had been the custom of defendant in prior years to furnish a beach patrol with a field glass, but that no patrol was provided by defendant at this time; that the bay or water adjacent to this resort was very dangerous, and subject to sudden wind squalls,—all of which was known to defendant, but not to decedent, and that defendant paid no attention to the safety of the plaintiff's decedent and his companions. Damages were claimed under §§ 6308 and 6309, Compiled Laws, relating to railroad companies, and §§ 10427 and 10428, Compiled Laws.

It was the claim of the defendant that by a proper construction of the statutes, above cited, there could be no recovery in the case, because if death had not ensued, the "party injured," Ion Lincoln, could not have sued the defendant for the recovery of his earning power, for that belonged to his parents, and also for the further reason that the cause of death was wholly conjectural.

The trial court, after a lengthy argument by counsel, but without stating any reasons therefor, directed a verdict and judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff has brought the case here by writ of error, and by proper assignments of error he claims: (1) That under the statutes above cited, the plaintiff may maintain an action for the drowning of his intestate, who was a minor sixteen years of age, occasioned by the wrongful act, neglect, and default of defendant, in having furnished plaintiff's intestate with an unsafe and unseaworthy boat; (2) that death by drowning is an instantaneous death; (3) that the measure of damages would be the amount found by the jury that they should deem fair and just with reference to the pecuniary injury resulting from such death, to the persons who may be entitled to such damages when recovered, to wit, the earning power of decedent from the time of his death until he became twenty one years of age, less what it would cost for his maintenance, under the rule as stated in Black v. Michigan C. R. Co. 146 Mich. 568, 109 N. W. 1052; (4) that damages recoverable under the statutes cited are held to be assets of decedent's estate, and should be so considered, even before recovery had thereunder; (5) that the case as stated by counsel did not leave the cause of death conjectural.

We quote the following from the brief of defendant and appellee: "In the statements made by plaintiff's counsel in the circuit court and in his brief filed in this court, the following admissions are made, which to some extent limit the scope of discussion on the questions of law: (1) That plaintiff's decedent, Ion Lincoln, was a minor, sixteen years of age at the time of his death; (2) that plaintiff's decedent came to his death on the 17th day of June, 1912, by drowning; that no one was a witness to the occasion of this death; (3) that the death of plaintiff's decedent was instantaneous; (4) that the measure of damages recoverable in this case was plaintiff's decedent's earning powers up to the time he became of age, less what it would cost for his maintenance," also quoting plaintiff's third proposition as above set forth; "(5) that no damages can be recovered under the common law for the death of an individual; (6) that no recovery can be had in this case, other than by virtue of the statute laws of this state, viz.," referring to the statutes cited by plaintiff. . . . "We shall assume that each and every one of the above allegations is agreed upon and conceded to be true, and from such premises we shall briefly consider the law which must control."

1. We summarize the following from the American authorities: The death loss act of the English statute of 1846 (Stat. 9 & 10 Vict. 93), commonly called "Lord Campbell's act," and the various laws of a similar kind that have been modeled after it, gave a new cause of action unknown to the common law, for the benefit of certain designated classes of surviving relatives. Such relatives do not take the cause of action for damages to the deceased by transfer to them by operation of law, or otherwise, but are enabled by the statute to recover the pecuniary loss to themselves caused by the wrongful taking off of the decedent, the continuation of whose life would have been beneficial to them. The action accrues to the surviving beneficiary mentioned in the statute by reason of the death of the injured person caused by the wrongful act of another. It is strictly not proper to say that it is a cause of action which survives; it is rather a new action given by §§ 10427 and 10428, Compiled Laws, which can be brought, not for the benefit of the estate, but solely for the benefit of the beneficiaries named in the statute. The above sections, when compared with § 10117, Compiled Laws, are made plain. They refer to entirely distinct losses recoverable in different rights. Section 10117 refers to the right of the deceased for the loss and injury occasioned to him. Sections 10427 and 10428 refer to the right of the surviving relatives as beneficiaries for the loss to them. Both are dependent on the injury. The language of one provision is that "actions for personal injuries shall survive," and of the other "in case of the death of a person by the wrongful act of another." Section 10117 creates no new liability, but prevents the lapsing by death of an old one, while §§ 10427 and 10428 create a new liability, one not known to the common law.

The case of Read v. Great Eastern R. Co. L. R. 3 Q. B. 555, 9 Best & S. 714, 37 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 278, 18 L. T. N. S. 82, 16 Week. Rep. 1040, is often referred to. The decision there is only to the effect that if an injured person have satisfaction of his claim before death, subsequent death from the injuries does not confer a right of action upon surviving relatives; that such right exists only where there is an existing claim for damages therefor at the time of his death. Justice Blackburn, who delivered the opinion, said, in substance, that the proper construction of the statute is that it gives a right of action to certain surviving relatives of a person when death was caused by the wrongful act of another, where he had not received satisfaction in his lifetime, and that to go further would be straining the language of the law. The language of our statute (§ 10427) is that liability of the wrongdoer exists where the deceased could have recovered if death had not ensued. That clearly excludes the idea that where the decedent receives satisfaction for his injuries, the conditions requisite to the right of surviving relatives may exist notwithstanding. There is nothing in Read v. Great Eastern R. Co. in conflict with Blake v. Midland R. Co. 10 Eng. L. & Eq. Rep. 443, where, in a very instructive opinion by Coleridge, J., it is said that Lord Campbell's act does not transfer to the surviving relatives mentioned the claim for damages previously possessed by the deceased, but gives to them an independent cause of action for damages peculiarly incident to their relations to the deceased. As was well said by Marshall, J., in Brown v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 102 Wis. 146, 44 L.R.A. 579, 77 N. W. 751, 5 Am. Neg. Rep. 255, in speaking of the last two cited cases: "The two cases are often cited to opposite views but are in fact, when correctly understood, in perfect harmony. The one holds that the right of the relatives named in the statutes is separate and distinct from that possessed by the deceased; the other, that the right of the relatives is contingent on the death of the injured person without having satisfied his claim for damages." See Id. 102 Wis. 137.

In Cooley on Torts, at page 263, that eminent author, in speaking of Lord Campbell's act, says: "It is seen, on a perusal of this statute, that it gives an action only when the deceased himself, if the injury had not resulted in his death, might have maintained one. In other words, it continues for the benefit of the wife, husband, etc., a right of action which, at the common law, would have terminated at the death, and enlarges its scope to embrace the injury resulting from the death. . . . If, therefore, the party injured had compromised for the injury, and accepted satisfaction previous to the death, there could have been no further right of action, and consequently no suit under the statute. It is a logical conclusion, also, that if the negligence of the person killed contributed proximately to the fatal injury, no action can be maintained on the statute, because he himself could have brought none had the injury not proved fatal. So, if the injury was caused by the negligence of a fellow servant, no action will lie under the statute against the master, unless the statute, by construction, appears to give it in such case. A question has also been made in some states whether suit could be maintained where the death was instantaneous; and in Massachusetts, under a somewhat nice and technical construction of the statute, it was decided that the action would not lie in such a case. But probably under no existing statute would it be so held now." In speaking of the measure of damages in such action, at page 272, the same author says: "If a parent sues for the killing of a minor child, who is yet too young to render services, it is manifest that for the time being there could be no pecuniary loss whatever, and whether the child, if living, would ever become serviceable, must be matter for speculation only. Yet, as the statutes plainly give the right of action for the benefit of the parent without restriction to circumstances, but manifestly assume that there is some injury in every case, the right to recover in these cases must be deemed unquestionable,"—citing cases.

The act known as "Lord Campbell's act," and frequently referred to as the "death act," was adopted by the legislature of this state in 1848. With a slight amendment in § 2, indicated below, the act is now embraced in §§ 10427 and 10428, Compiled Laws.

As originally enacted it was as follows: "Section 1. Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the state of Michigan, whenever the death of a person shall be caused by wrongful act, neglect or default, and the act, neglect or default is such as would (if death had not ensued) have entitled the party injured to maintain an action, and recover damages, in respect thereof, then and in every such case, the person who, or the corporation which would have been liable, if death had not ensued, shall be liable to an action for damages, notwithstanding the death of the person injured, and although the death shall have been caused under such circumstances as amount in law to felony."

"Sec. 2. Every such action shall be brought by, and in the names of the personal representatives of such deceased person, and the amount recovered in every such action, shall be for the exclusive benefit of the widow and next of kin of such deceased person and shall be distributed to such widow and next of kin in the proportions provided by law in relation to the distribution of personal property, left by persons dying intestate; and in every such action, the jury may give such damages as they shall deem fair and just, with reference to the pecuniary injury resulting from such death, to the wife and next of kin of such deceased person."

In § 2 amendment was by striking out words in italics and inserting "distributed to the persons and."

Counsel for defendant contend that the clause of the statute which must control is the following: "And the act, neglect or default is such as would (if death had not ensued) have entitled the party injured to maintain an action and recover damages in respect thereof,"—and the claim is asserted that, had not death ensued, Ion Lincoln could not have maintained an action for the recovery of his earning power, for that would belong to his parents. We do not agree with counsel's construction of this language. We have already shown, by quotation from Cooley on Torts, what that author understood by the words in parenthesis in the above quotation. He says: "It is seen, on a perusal of this statute, that it gives an action only when the deceased himself, if the injury had not resulted in his death, might have maintained one." The author then illustrates by showing that if the injured party had compromised for the injury, and accepted satisfaction previous to his death, there could be no further right of action, or if he had been guilty of contributory negligence, no action could be maintained on the statute, because he himself could have brought none had the injury not proved fatal. He then proceeds to show that if the injury was caused by the negligence of a fellow servant, the result would be the same. Let us suppose that instead of having been drowned, the decedent had, by the wrongful act of the defendant, lost a leg or an arm. Would it be contended that he, although a minor, could not, in such case, maintain an action for the injury, including his pain and suffering? True, his measure of damages in such a case would be different from that of the plaintiff in this case. But that fact does not meet or answer the question. The statute does not say that he must be able to maintain the same action and recover the same damages, but "an action and recover damages in respect thereof." In respect of what? Manifestly, for the same wrongful act, neglect, or default. So we say that, although the measure of damages may differ, the cause of action is the same; that is, the wrongful act, neglect, or default. We are of opinion that counsel place a wrong interpretation upon the language of the statute.

It is also claimed by defendant that the case of Verlinde v. Michigan C. R. Co. 163 Mich. 371, 130 N. W. 317, disposes of the question in favor of the contention of the defendant. That action was brought under the "survival act," so called, the boy having lived two hours after his injury. The declaration contained one count, and averred the right of the father and mother to recover damages for pecuniary loss and injury, and the deprivation "of the value of the services, assistance, aid, comfort, society, and prospective earnings of intestate until he would have arrived at the age of twenty-one years," to the amount of $5,000, and also that intestate would after becoming twenty-one years old, have earned $40 a month, and, in consequence of his injuries, he suffered great pain, and his estate had suffered a loss thereby through pain and suffering, and what he would have earned after he became twenty one years old during his expectancy of life, etc. At the beginning of the testimony, defendant's counsel objected to the reception of any testimony, for the reason that there was a misjoinder of causes of action in one count. The objection was overruled and exception taken. Later in the course of the trial, the following paper, executed by the parents, was received in evidence, against the objection and exception of counsel for defendant: "We, the parents of Peter Verlinde, formerly of Waters, Michigan, now deceased, hereby severally surrender to the estate of said Peter Verlinde, all right of action for damages for the injuries sustained by him and his consequent death on June 20, 1908, through the claimed negligence of the Michigan Central Railroad Company, and all loss of earnings and earning capacity during his minority, which otherwise would have existed in us, or either of us, hereby granting such rights and claims to the said estate, and severally releasing such company from all such rights and claims upon our several parts." The language of Justice Blair, who wrote the opinion, upon the points here involved, was as follows: "We are of the opinion that the defendant's objections to the declaration and charge based thereon are well founded. The plaintiff could not combine in one count a claim for loss of his son's services with his claim as administrator under the survival act, and recover for both in the same action. Walker v. Lansing & Suburban Traction Co. 144 Mich. 685, 108 N. W. 90; id., 156 Mich. 514, 121 N. W. 271; Fournier v. Detroit United R. Co. 157 Mich. 589, 122 N. W. 299. Neither could the administrator combine in one count a claim under the death act, so called and a claim under the survival act, and recover both classes of damages. Dolson v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 128 Mich. 444, 87 N. W. 629; Carbary v. Detroit United R. Co. 157 Mich. 683, 122 N. W. 367. Independent of statute, the father could only recover for the loss of services accruing between the injury and the death. Hyatt v. Adams, 16 Mich. 180; Merkle v. Bennington Twp. 58 Mich. 156, 55 Am. Rep. 666, 24 N. W. 776. No cause of action survived for loss of services, which belonged to the father. Walker v. Lansing & Suburban Traction Co. supra. And the father could not confer upon the administrator a cause of action for loss of services subsequent to death which he himself did not possess."

We cannot agree with the contention of defendant relating to the Verlinde and Walker Cases, for they should be view together. In the Walker Case, suit was brought under the "survival act," and the damages which the administrator could recover were those which Mrs. Walker could have recovered in her lifetime had she lived to prosecute the suit. Inasmuch as her services belonged to her husband, she not having been emancipated, her personal representative, under that act, could not recover for the loss of the services. The court properly said, therefore: "No action survived for the loss of services, which belonged to the husband." In the Verlinde Case, the father claimed the right to recover for the loss of his minor son's services in an action brought under the "survival act," and the court very properly, we think, said: "No cause of action survived for loss of services, which belonged to the father." In other words, this court said that, inasmuch as the case was brought under the "survival act," the only damages which the administrator could recover were such as the boy could have recovered, and as his services belonged to the father, he could not recover for those. We think that when the distinction between the two causes of action is kept in mind, the difficulty disappears.

We are here dealing with the "death act," as all agree, and we think that the instant case is readily distinguished from the cases above referred to.

Counsel for defendant have called our attention to Osborn v. Gillett, decided in the court of exchequer of England in 1873, and reported in L. R. 8 Exch. 88, 42 L. J. Exch. N. S. 53. In that case the declaration was for injuries caused to E., plaintiff's "daughter and servant," by the negligent driving of defendant's servant, by reason whereof she afterwards died; claiming as special damages the loss of E.'s services and her burial expenses. There was a special plea that E. was killed "on the spot." This plea was demurred to, and by a divided court the defendant was given judgment on the plea, and it was held that a master cannot maintain an action for injuries which cause the immediate death of his servant. Conceding, what does not appear in the case, that the daughter was a minor, this should be said of the decision: That it was not by a court of last resort, but by a court inferior to the King's bench and the common pleas. It was rendered twenty-five years after Michigan had adopted Lord Campbell's act, and after this court had construed that act in Hyatt v. Adams, 16 Mich. 180. Where a foreign statute has been construed by the courts of the state or county where first enacted, and subsequently such statute is adopted here, the general rule is that such construction will be followed by the courts of the adopting state, upon the principle of comity; but to this rule there are exceptions.

Our attention has also been called to Griffiths v. Dudley, L. R. 9 Q. B. Div. 357, decided in 1882, where Field, J., said: "Read v. Great Eastern R. Co. is a clear decision that Lord Campbell's act did not give any new cause of action, but only substituted the right of the representative to sue in the place of the right which deceased himself would have had if he had survived." We need only say that this language is opposed to the weight of authority in this country, as evidenced by the decisions and by text writers. Cooley, Torts, 264.

In Michigan C. R. Co. v. Vreeland, 227 U. S. 59, at page 69, 57 L. ed. 417, 421, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 192, Justice Lurton, in speaking of Lord Campbell's act, said: "This act has been, in its distinguishing features, re-enacted in many of the states, and both in the courts of the states and of England has been construed, not as operating as a continuance of any right of action which the injured person would have had but for his death, but as a new or independent cause of action for the purpose of compensating certain dependent members of the family for the deprivation pecuniarily resulting to them from his wrongful death. . . . In one of the earliest cases which arose under the act, Coleridge, J., said: 'It will be evident that this act does not transfer this right of action to his representative, but gives to the representative a totally new right of action, on different principles.' Blake v. Midland R. Co. 18 Q. B. 93, 109. In Seward v. The Vera Cruz, L. R. 10 App. Cas. 59, Lord Blackburn said: 'A totally new action is given against the person who would have been responsible to the deceased if the deceased had lived, an action which . . . is new in its species, new in its quality, new in its principle, in every way new, and which can only be brought if there is any person answering the description of the widow, parent, or child, who under such circumstances suffers pecuniary loss.' But as the foundation of the right of action is the original wrongful injury to the decedent, it has been generally held that the new action is a right dependent upon the existence of a right in the decedent immediately before his death to have maintained an action for his wrongful injury. Tiffany, Death by Wrongful Act, § 124; Louisville, E. & St. L. R. Co. v. Clarke, 152 U. S. 230, 38 L. ed. 422, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 579; Read v. Great Eastern R. Co. L. R. 3 Q. B. 555, 9 Best & S. 714, 37 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 278, 18 L. T. N. S. 82, 16 Week. Rep. 1040; Hecht v. Ohio & M. R. Co. 132 Ind. 507, 32 N. E. 302; Fowlkes v. Nashville & D. R. Co. 9 Heisk. 829; Littlewood v. New York, 89 N. Y. 24, 42 Am. Rep. 271; Southern Bell Teleph. & Teleg. Co. v. Cassin, 111 Ga. 575, 50 L.R.A. 694, 36 S. E. 881." See also Hurst v. Detroit City R. Co. 84 Mich. 539, 48 N. W. 44. By the great weight of American authority, the right to recover in such a case is maintained. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Henson, 7 C. C. A. 349, 19 U. S. App. 169, 58 Fed. 531; Chicago v. Major, 18 Ill. 349, 68 Am. Dec. 553; Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Baddeley, 150 Ill. 328, 36 N. E. 965; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Townsend, 71 Kan. 524, 81 Pac. 205, 6 Ann. Cas. 191.

In Watson v. St. Paul City R. Co. 70 Minn. 514, 73 N. W. 400, the right is recognized, but as the statute of that state specially names the recipients, and does not include the husband, it was held that he could not recover; and the court calls attention to the feature that distinguishes their statute from ours. This distinguishing feature controls the decisions of a number of the states. Steel v. Kurtz, 28 Ohio St. 191; Davis v. Guarnier, 45 Ohio St. 470, 4 Am. St. Rep. 548, 15 N. E. 350; Bream v. Brown, 5 Coldw. 168; Trafford v. Adams Exp. Co. 8 Lea, 96; East Tennessee V. & G. R. Co. v. Lilly, 90 Tenn. 563, 18 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

S. W. 243. There are states, notably Virginia, holding a different doctrine.

We think that the profession in this state would be surprised were we to hold, at this late day, that the father and mother of a minor child who had been instantaneously killed by the wrongful act of a defendant could not, through an administrator, maintain a suit for damages, or a husband for the wrongful death of a wife. Such right has been recognized in many cases in this state. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Bayfield, 37 Mich. 205, 16 Am. Neg. Cas. 87; Cooper v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 66 Mich. 261, 11 Am. St. Rep. 482, 33 N. W. 306; Rajnowski v. Detroit, B. C. & A. R. Co. 74 Mich. 20, 41 N. W. 847; Nelson v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 104 Mich. 582, 62 N. W. 993; Miller v. Meade Twp. 128 Mich. 98, 87 N. W. 131; Black v. Michigan C. R. Co. 146 Mich. 568, 109 N. W. 1052; Gorton v. Harmon, 152 Mich. 473, 116 N. W. 443, 15 Ann. Cas. 461. Many other cases might be added to this list. It is true that the precise question here discussed was not raised in those cases, but the right to maintain the action under the death act was determined. The latest case to which our attention has been called is that of Grand Trunk Western R. Co. v. Gilpin (U. S. circuit court of appeals, seventh circuit) — C. C. A. —, 208 Fed. 126. It was there held that under our statute an action may be maintained by a husband against a railroad company for the wrongful killing of his wife, by which he lost her services, though death was instantaneous.

That the right of action under the death act constitutes assets of the estate of deceased was held in Findlay v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co. 106 Mich. 700, 64 N. W. 732.

2. This brings us to the second question discussed: Was the cause of death conjectural? It should be borne in mind that there is no living witness to the drowning, and that decedent is not here to give his testimony. In the absence of such testimony the presumption is that he and his companions were in the exercise of due care, which presumption is sufficient to permit recovery if negligence is shown on the part of the defendant. Gilbert v. Ann Arbor R. Co. 161 Mich. 73, 79, 125 N. W. 745; Gates v. Beebe, 170 Mich. 107, 135 N. W. 934; Richardson v. Detroit & M. R. Co. 176 Mich. 413, 142 N. W. 832. We cannot say, as matter of law, that the defendant was not guilty of any of the alleged negligence.

In La Fernier v. Soo River Lighter & Wrecking Co. 129 Mich. 596, at page 604, 89 N. W. 353, this court said: "While it is true that, simply because an accident has occurred, negligence is not to be presumed, still, in determining the question of negligence, the fact that an accident has occurred may be and should be taken into consideration, in connection with all other facts and circumstances of the case, for the purpose of determining whether in fact there was negligence."

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and a new trial granted.

OKLAHOMA SUPREME COURT.

JAMES K. PERRINE, Plff. in Err.,
v.

JARASALOV HANACEK.

(40 Okla. 359, 138 Pac. 148.)

Assault — liability of aider.

If one present at a quarrel encourages a battery, he assumes the consequences of the Headnote by TURNER, J.

Note. — Civil liability of one who encourages an assault without physically participating therein.

The scope of this note is limited strictly to cases of encouragement, and therefore, does not include cases of assaults made in pursuance of requests of third persons or in execution of the orders of superiors. It is further limited to encouragement offered at the scene of the assault, either during the assault or immediately preceding.

General rule.

One who is present at the commission of an assault, encouraging it by words, gestures, looks, signs, or any other means, is liable for the damage as a principal. Abney v. Mize, 155 Ala. 391, 46 So. 230; Hildreth v. Hancock, 156 Ill. 618, 41 N. E. 155; Phillips v. Phillips, 7 B. Mon. 268; Miller v. Shaw, 4 Allen, 500; Kuney v. Dutcher, 56 Mich. 308, 22 N. W. 866; Brouster v. Fox, 117 Mo. App. 711, 93 S. W. 318 (obiter); Newman v. Marshall, 20 Jones & S. 202; Daingerfield v. Thompson, 33 Gratt. 136, 36 Am. Rep. 783; Hilmes v. Stroebel, 59 Wis. 74, 17 N. W. 539.

"If men present at a quarrel encourage a battery, by doing so they assume upon themselves the consequences of the acts done to the full extent, as much so as the party who does the beating. Often they are more culpable. It is not necessary that the encouragement should consist of appeals to the ruffian engaged in committing the battery, or that he should know what they are so doing. It is enough if they encourage and sanction what is being done, and manifest this by demonstrations of resistance to any who might desire to interfere to prevent it; or by words, gestures, or acts, indicating an approval of what is going on." Frantz v. Lenhart, 56 Pa. 365. 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

act to its full extent as much as the party who does the beating; and where the evidence reasonably tends to connect defendant therewith as an aider and abetter, this court will not disturb a verdict against him.

(December 9, 1913.)

ERROR to the Superior Court for Oklahoma County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for an alleged assault and battery. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Burwell, Crockett, & Johnson, for plaintiff in error:

A party is bound by the theory on which the case was tried in the court below.

Bullen v. Arkansas Valley & W. R. Co. 20 Okla. 819, 95 Pac. 476; Harris v. First Nat. Bank, 21 Okla. 189, 95 Pac. 781; Border v. Carrabine, 24 Okla. 609, 104 Pac. 906; Coyle v. Baum, 3 Okla. 695, 41 Pac.

And although a party may not be actually present, if he is near enough to afford aid, and encourages the trespass, he is jointly guilty as a principal with the perpetrator of the assault. Phillips v. Phillips, 7 B. Mon. 268.

Although one is not present when an arrest occurs, if he sees the person in the custody of the officers and encourages them in their proceeding, he is, as a matter of law, aiding and abetting them, and, where the arrest amounts to an assault, must be held to the same liability as if actually present offering encouragement when the arrest occurred. Cooper v. Johnson, 81 Mo. 483.

Where several engage in baiting a peddler without any intention of inflicting injury upon him, and one act induces another until the peddler is injured by an intoxicated member of the company, the jury is warranted in finding that those who do not inflict the injury encourage it by their conduct. Hirschman v. Emme, 81 Minn. 99, 83 N. W. 482.

So, in Haycraft v. Grigsby, 88 Mo. App. 354, it is said that "if excessive flogging or other punishment is inflicted, the teacher, and all who encourage, aid, or abet him, are answerable therefor, regardless of whether the motive which prompted him or them was malicious or not."

Generally, as to liability of teacher for personal injury to pupil, see note in 65 L.R.A. 891.

Gronan v. Kukkuck, 59 Iowa, 18, 12 N. W. 748, upholds an instruction to the effect that one who, with knowledge of another's intention to commit an assault, acts in concert with him, and is present and encourages the assault, is liable therefor.

Oral encouragement.

In Little v. Tingle, 26 Ind. 168, the court held proper an instruction to the effect that:

389; Morrison v. Atkinson, 16 Okla. 571, 85 Pac. 472, 8 Ann. Cas. 486; Blackwell, E. & S. W. R. Co. v. Gist, 18 Okla. 516, 90 Pac. 889; Dodder v. Moberly, 28 Okla. 334, 114 Pac. 714.

Messrs. Pruett & Sniggs and Selwyn Douglas for defendant in error.

Turner, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action in damages for an assault and battery brought by Hanacek, defendant in error, against Jas. K. Perrine, plaintiff in error, in the district court of Oklahoma county. The last amended petition substantially states that on August 23, 1909, defendant and his son, Walter, were owning and operating a livery stable in Oklahoma City; that on said date one Halas hired a buggy from defendant, and, when the same was returned, the son committed an assault and battery upon plaintiff, a companion of Halas, with a club; and if the defendant came up after the assault was commenced, and encouraged its continuance, and it was continued in pursuance of his counsel, he was equally liable with the principal therefor.

So, where the evidence in an action for assault and battery shows that the defendant, during the assault, expressed his interest in the cause of the principal, and his readiness to take part in the trouble, in an angry and excited manner, the jury is authorized in finding that the defendant aided or encouraged the assault. Cleveland v. Stilwell, 75 Iowa, 466, 39 N. W. 711.

One who curses another and directs a third person to throw him out is jointly liable with the third person, for the assault committed in pursuance of the direction. Sellman v. Wheeler, 95 Md. 751, 54 Atl. 512.

And it is held in Daingerfield v. Thompson, 33 Gratt. 136, 36 Am. Rep. 783, that a person who directs another to fire a pistol in the street, where it is an unlawful act, is responsible for the consequences of the act, and, although he expects the other to fire into the air, he is liable for damage done by firing through a door and hitting a person inside a building.

Where a husband who is in an adjoining room during an assault by his wife says that the assaulted is "not getting a lick amiss," he is jointly guilty of the assault. Phillips v. Phillips, 7 B. Mon. 268.

Brink v. Purnell, 162 Mich. 147, 127 N. W. 322, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 829, holds that it is not error to instruct a jury in an action for assault and battery that the defendant, who did not strike plaintiff, could be held liable if he instigated or encouraged the assault by such words as "kill him" uttered during the progress of the affray.

Where a person by his presence, words, and by actually holding a third person who is coming to the rescue, encourages, aids, and abets an assault, he is liable as a principal. L.R.A. (N.S.)

that defendant was then and there present aiding and abetting to his damage, etc. After answer filed in effect of a general denial, there was trial to a jury and judgment for plaintiff for $2,939, and defendant brings the case here.

It is contended that there is no evidence reasonably tending to prove that defendant aided and abetted by telling his son to strike plaintiff, and hence the court erred in overruling the demurrer to the evidence. The evidence discloses that defendant and his son, Walter, were, on that day, keeping a livery stable in Oklahoma City; that on said date the plaintiff and one Halas, who had been fellow students at the university of Prague, and who were Bohemians, with a very imperfect knowledge of the English language, went to the stable where Halas hired a horse and buggy from defendant, paying $2 in full therefor, and drove to the country. On their return to the stable they drove in, and Halas, who was a surveyor, principal therefor. Cooney v. Burke, 11 Neb. 258, 9 N. W. 57.

And where the evidence shows that one defendant in an action for assault and battery took off his coat and "wanted to go at" the person threatened with assault; that another defendant said he could "lick" the one threatened, and that a third defendant held off assistance during the assault, it should go to a jury upon the question whether the three defendants were present encouraging, aiding, or exciting the assault. Hilmes v. Stroebel, 59 Wis. 74, 17 N. W. 539.

Persons who are present taking pleasure in an assault upon an aged drunken man, holding off assistance by their appearance of force, encouraging the assault by cries and words, and interfering only to prevent murder, are responsible for the consequences of the assault. Gillon v. Wilson, 3 T. B. Mon. 216.

Limitations of rule.

Mere presence at the commission of an assault, without encouraging it by word, act, or gesture, will not render one liable therefor. Lister v. McKee, 79 Ill. App. 210; Cooper v. Johnson, 81 Mo. 483; Daingerfield v. Thompson and Hilmes v. Stroebel, supra; Rhinehart v. Whitehead, 64 Wis. 42, 24 N. W. 401.

And silent approbation of or pleasure in an assault will not render one liable for the consequences thereof. Blue v. Christ, 4 Ill. App. 351, where the court says: "One is not responsible for a beating inflicted by another, however wrongful it may be, simply because he thinks the punishment deserved, or is pleased with it, or thinks well of it;" Ryan v. Quinn, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 1613, 71 S. W. 872, where the court says that "a man is not responsible for a beating inflicted by another because he thinks the got out and took his tripod, photograph machine, and field glasses from the buggy. As he did so, Walter Perrine stepped up and said, "Give me a dollar more." Halas asked him why, whereupon young Perrine got mad and grabbed his tripod and called for defendant, who came out and laid hold of the machine, which Halas had in his hand, whereupon the latter called, in Bohemian, to plaintiff, who was on the sidewalk in front of the stable, to come and explain to him what they wanted; that, as he joined them, defendant, who had taken the machine away from Halas, said to his son, "God damn, God damn, get him," whereupon his son, who had a club in his hand, struck plaintiff a savage blow with it over the head, cutting it frightfully, causing him to bleed profusely, and the permanent loss of an eye. While there is no evidence that defendant struck the plaintiff with a club, the foregoing was abundant evidence tending to prove that he incited and encouraged his son to the commission of the violence complained of. That being true, whether he aided or abetted the assault was a question of fact properly sent to the jury. 28 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 566, says: "One who aids, abets, or incites, or encourages or directs by conduct or words, in the perpetration of a trespass, is liable equally with the actual perpetrator."

In Frantz v. Lenhart, 56 Pa. 365, several defendants were joined in an action of trespass for an assault and battery upon the plaintiff. The trial judge charged that any of them might be liable, although they did not put a finger on the plaintiff, provided they aided, encouraged, or abetted the act. The court, in reviewing on the charge, said: "If men present at a quarrel encourage a battery, by doing so they assume upon themselves the consequences of the acts done to the full extent, as much so as the party who does the beating. Often they are more culpable. It is not necessary that the encouragement should consist of appeals to the ruffian engaged in committing the battery, or that he should know what they are so doing. It is enough if they encourage and sanction what is being done, and manifest this by demonstrations of resistance to any who might desire to interfere to prevent it; or by words, gestures, or acts, indicating an approval of what is going on. It is contrary to law—contrary to duty—and the law will not weigh very nicely the acts of particular individuals, to ascertain whether what was said or done by them has enhanced the injury, more or less than the acts of others. All so engaged are answerable for all the injury, and, had the judge charged the opposite of this, he would have committed a great error." In that case it seems the only evidence of defendants' participation was that, while standing on the pavement in front of a certain house with his wife and children, he stretched out his arms to catch plaintiff and said, "Here he is, kill him," as he came running down the street, and the verdict of the jury for $1,000 was sustained after a remittitur down to $700.

In Donovan v. Consolidated Coal Co. 88 Ill. App. 589, in the syllabus it is said: "One who in any manner indicates his desire that an act be done may be said to request it, and one who does anything in furtherance of an act may be said to aid or abet it."

In *Clark v. UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, EIGHTH CIRCUIT.

LEWIS P. PARTEE, Admr., etc., of William McCain, Deceased, Plff. in Err.,
v.

ST. LOUIS & SAN FRANCISCO RAIL-ROAD COMPANY.

(123 C. C. A. 292, 204 Fed. 970.)

Limitation of action — wrongful death — failure of first action.

1. Section 5945, art. 17, chap. 87, Statutes of Oklahoma 1909, creates a cause of action unknown to the common law for death caused by the wrongful act of another, and requires such action to be commenced

Headnotes by SANBORN, Circuit Judge.

Note. — Limitation of actions: applicability of general provision giving additional time for bringing new action after failure of a previous suit, to cause of action created by a statute which prescribes a special limitation period.

As to the applicability of a tolling provision in a general statute, when the defendant is absent from the state, to a special limitation imposed by a statute creating a cause of action for wrongful death, see note to Casey v. American Bridge Co. 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 521.

As to fault of plaintiff causing failure of suit as affecting his right to additional time allowed by statute for bringing new action, see note to Minton v. LaFollette Coal, Iron & R. Co. 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 479.

As to the relation of new pleadings to statutes of limitation, generally, see notes to Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Bagley, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 259, and Bourdreaux v. Tucson Gas, E. L. & P. Co. 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) 196.

As to the amendment of pleadings after the limitation period, by changing from common law to statute, or vice versa, or from a statute of one jurisdiction to a statute of another, see note to Allen v. Tuscarora Valley R. Co. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1096.

The rule is well settled in a majority of the jurisdictions where the question has arisen, that, as a statute which creates a cause of action not known to the common law, and fixes the time within which an action must be commenced thereunder, is not a statute of limitation, but the right given thereby is a conditional one, and the commencement of the action within the time fixed is a condition precedent to any liability under the statute,—a general provision of the limitation statutes for additional time within which to bring a new suit after the failure of a previous action for the same cause, notwithstanding the new suit would otherwise be barred, has no application to a purely statutory cause of action upon which the statute creating it within two years. Section 5547, art. 3, of that chapter, provides that civil actions may be brought within the times limited in that article only, but that where in special cases a different limitation is prescribed by statute, the action shall be governed by such limitation. Section 5555 of article 3 declares that if any action be commenced within due time, and a judgment for the plaintiff therein be reversed, or he fail otherwise than on the merits after the time limited has expired, he may commence a new action within one year after the reversal or failure.

Held, § 5555 is inapplicable to actions created or permitted by § 5945, and the former section neither modifies nor extends the condition of the liability and action imposed by the latter section, that the action must be commenced within two years after the wrongful act or death.

provides that action must be brought within a certain time.

Thus, it has been held, as in PARTEE v. ST. LOUIS & S. F. R. Co. that a general provision of limitation statutes, for an extension of the time within which to sue, where there has been a failure, otherwise than upon the merits, of a previous action brought for the same cause, has no application to a cause of action for damages for wrongful death, created by a statute which expressly limits the time within which an action thereunder may be commenced. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Dylinski, 67 Ill. App. 114; Rodman v. Missouri P. R. Co. 65 Kan. 645, 59 L.R.A. 704, 70 Pac. 642; Cavanagh v. Ocean Steam Nav. Co. 19 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 391, 13 N. Y. Supp. 540.

And a statute concerning general limitations, which permits the commencement of a new action within one year after a judgment is reversed or given against the plaintiff in certain contingencies, although the time limited for bringing such action has expired during the pendency of the first suit, does not apply to the filing of a bill in chancery to test the validity of a will, which is authorized solely by a statute which gives only three years after the probate of the will within which to file the bill,—such latter statute being not a statute of limitations, but a jurisdictional or enabling statute, and the court having no power to entertain the bill after the three years have passed. Peacock v. Churchill, 38 Ill. App. 634.

Likewise, a statute which provides for the renewal of an action after a dismissal thereof within six months does not apply to an action against a railroad company to recover an excess of money paid for freight, over and above the sum allowed by the railroad commission, brought under a statute giving a right of action and recovery against any railroad company for any wrong or injury inflicted on any person in violation of any rule or regulation provided by the railroad commissioners, which statute provides that all suits brought thereunder shall be brought within twelve months after Same — statutory period — condition of action.

2. The time fixed for the commencement of an action unknown to the common law, by act of Congress or statute which creates or permits the action, is a condition of the liability and action thus created, and not a statute of limitations.

3. A special statute upon a particular subject and a general law must stand together, the one as the law of the specific subject and the other as the general rule, unless it clearly appears that it was the intention of the legislature to modify or repeal one or the other.

the commission of the alleged wrong or injury. Parmelee v. Savannah, F. & W. R. Co. 78 Ga. 239, 2 S. E. 686.

And a section of the Code of Civil Procedure providing "that where an action is commenced within the time limited therefor, and it is terminated by a reversal of a judgment without awarding a new trial, or in any other manner than by voluntary discontinuance, dismissal for neglect to proceed, or a final judgment on the merits, the plaintiff may commence a new action for the same cause within one year after such reversal or termination," does not apply to a cause of action against a county, for compensation for the destruction of property in consequence of a mob or riot, which cause of action is created by a special law which fixes a special limitation period within which an action thereunder must be brought,—especially where, by another section of the Code, the chapter on limitations does not apply in "a case where a different limitation is specially prescribed by law." Hill v. Rensselaer County, 119 N. Y. 344, 23 N. E. 921, affirming 53 Hun, 194, 6 N. Y. Supp. 716.

Nor does a provision of the general statute of limitations, that a new action may be commenced within one year after a non-suit suffered in a previous action duly commenced for the same cause, apply to an action against a railroad company to recover damages for the killing of stock on the railroad at a point where it was not fenced, brought under a statute creating a cause of action for such killing, without proof of negligence, which statute provides a special limitation period for all actions instituted by virtue thereof (Gerren v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 60 Mo. 405); or to an action against a mining corporation for personal injuries, brought under a statute "relating to safety and inspection of mines," which provides a special limitation as to the time within which actions shall be brought thereunder (De Both v. Rich Hill Coal & Min. Co. 141 Mo. 497, 42 S. W. 1081),—where the general limitation law also provides that the provisions thereof "shall not extend to any action which is,

ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Oklahoma to review a judgment in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's intestate, alleged to have been caused by the wrongful act of defendant. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Sanborn, Circuit Judge, and William H. Munger and Trieber, District Judges.

Messrs. J. J. Henderson and G. W. Hutchins, for plaintiff in error:

Statutes of limitation must be construed strictly.

Angell, Limitations, § 485; Re James, 4 Okla. Crim. Rep. 94, 111 Pac. 947.

Where the legislature makes no excep-or shall be, otherwise limited by any statute; but such action shall be brought within the time limited by such statutes."

A state statute which permits the commencement of a new action for the same cause within one year after the determination against the plaintiff, in certain cases, of a prior suit which was duly commenced, does not apply to a cause of action created by a Federal statute which fixes the limitation period within which an action must be commenced, in favor of a private individual, upon a contractor's bond given to the United States. United States use of Gibson Lumber Co. v. Boomer, 106 C. C. A. 164, 183 Fed. 726; United States use of Tom J. Gardner Lumber Co. v. Boomer, 106 C. C. A. 168, 183 Fed. 730.

And in the former case the court said: "We are also of the opinion that the limitation prescribed . . . is not merely a limitation on the remedy, but on the liability itself. The statute created a new legal liability, with a right to a suit for its enforcement, provided the suit was brought within one year after the performance and final settlement of the contract, and not later. The time within which the suit must be brought operates as a limitation of the liability itself, and not of the remedy alone. It is a condition attached to the right to sue at all. Time has been made of the essence of the right, and the right is lost if the time is disregarded. The liability and the remedy are created by the same statute, and the limitation of the remedy is therefore to be treated as a limitation of the right."

But a statute allowing the bringing of a new action within one year after a reversal of the judgment, or a failure otherwise than upon the merits, in a previous action, duly commenced, notwithstanding the time limited for the action has expired, does apply to an action to foreclose a mechanics' lien, which is required by the mechanics' lien law to be brought within one year after the building has been completed, where such law also provides that "the practice, pleadings, and proceedings in such action shall be in conformity with the rules prescribed tions in the statutes of limitations, the courts can make none.

And in North Carolina it is held that a Code provision that "if any action shall be commenced within the time prescribed therefore, and the plaintiff be nonsuited . . . the plaintiff . . . may commence a new action within one year after such nonsuit," does apply to an action for damages for wrongful death under another section of the Code, which prescribes the time within which such an action must be brought. Meekins v. Norfolk & S. R. Co. 131 N. C. 1, 42 S. E. 333; Trull v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. 161 N. C. 545, 66 S. E. 586.

So, in Meisse v. McCoy, 17 Ohio St. 225, it was held that a section of the Code giving the right to commence a new action within one year after a failure of the plaintiff, otherwise than upon the merits, in an action duly commenced, notwithstanding the time limited for the action should have expired, applied to the plaintiff's case, which was in fact an action for wrongful death under a statute which prescribed a special limitation period,—of which fact, however, no point was made, the only question here having been as to whether or not the summons in the original action was so served that the action could be said to have been "commenced" within the meaning of the statute giving the additional time after failure otherwise than upon the merits.

And in Hoffman v. Delaware & H. Co. 85 Misc. 535, 147 N. Y. Supp. 475, it is held that a Code provision (§ 405) that, "if an action be commenced within the time limited therefor, and be terminated in any other manner than by a voluntary discontinuance, a dismissal of the complaint for neglect to prosecute the action, or a final judgment on the merits, the plaintiff may commence a new action for the same cause, after the expiration of the time so limited, and within one year after such reversal or termination," does apply to a right of action for damages for wrongful death, given by another section (1902) of the Code, which provides that "such an action must be commenced within two years after the decedent's death,"—notwithstanding the provision of another section (414), that the provisions of the chapter containing it and the first provision above quoted apply, and constitute the only rules of limitation applicable to a civil action or special proceeding, "except in a case where a different limitation is specially prescribed by law;" the provisions of § 414 having been held not to apply to or affect those of § 405, which is not one of the sections which relate to and prescribe rules of limitation, so that the benefits thereby conferred are in no wise diminished or affected by § 414.

In the Meekins Case, supra, the court said: "The defendant contends that this [general] provision is under the title in the Code applying to limitations, and that the time prescribed under § 1498 [giving the cause of action] is not strictly a statute of limitations. . . . But the original action was brought within the time prescribed in § 1498, and therefore it does not here matter what the nature of that prescription is. On the other hand, the time within which a new action may be commenced after a nonsuit, etc., is a statute of limitation, and applies to all cases where a nonsuit, etc., has been sustained. This statute . . . contains no exception of cases under § 1498, or of any other cases where the time prescribed for bringing the original action might not be strictly a statute of limitation. We know no cause why the privilege to commence a new action within a year after nonsuit should not apply equally to all cases of nonsuit. The statute makes no distinction, and there is certainly none in the reason of the thing, which is the same as to that class of cases as in any others."

And in the Trull Case, supra, the court said: "True, we have held in several well-considered decisions that the requirement of the statute . . . giving a right of action for death caused by the wrongful act, neglect, or default of another, that such action shall be 'brought within one year after such death,' is not in strictness a statute of limitation, but is a condition affecting the defendant's demurrer confessed the allegations as being true, and such allegations are sufficient to remove the bar of the statute of limitation.

De Roberts v. Cross, 23 Okla. 888, 101 Pac. 1114.

Messrs. W. F. Evans, R. A. Kleinschmidt, and Fred E. Suits, for defendant in error:

Plaintiff's cause of action, being purely statutory, and one which did not exist at common law, is controlled by the limitation of two years prescribed in § 5945, and such limitation is a condition imposed upon the exercise of the right of action granted, and said cause of action is not affected by the saving clause contained in § 5555.

App. 508, 64 Fed. 84.

Sanborn, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for the death of William McCain, which is alleged to have been caused by the wrongful act of the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Company. The action was not commenced within two years after the wrongful act or the death; but the plaintiff had commenced a similar action within the two years, had failed in that action otherwise than upon the merits, and had commenced this action within one year after the failure. He set forth these facts in his pleading, and the court below sustained a demurrer to it, and dismissed the action. This ruling is assigned as error.

Article 3, which is entitled, "Time of Commencing Civil Actions," of chapter 87 of Snyder's Compiled Laws of Oklahoma of 1909, contains these provisions:

"Section 5547. Limitations.—Civil actions can only be commenced within the periods prescribed in this article, after the cause of action shall have accrued; but where, in special cases, a different limitation is prescribed by statute, the action shall be governed by such limitation."

"Section 5555. New Action—Limitation.—If any action be commenced within due time, and a judgment thereon for the plaintiff be reversed, or if the plaintiff fail in such action otherwise than upon the merits, and the time limited for the same shall have expired, the plaintiff, or, if he die, and the cause of action survive, his representatives, may commence a new action within one year after the reversal or failure."

Article 17, which is entitled, "Causes of Action Which Survive, and Abatement of Actions," contains this provision:

"Section 5945. Action for Death—Limitation, etc.—When the death of one is caused by the wrongful act or omission of another, the personal representatives of the former may maintain an action therefor against the latter, if the former might have maintained an action had he lived, against the latter for an injury for the same act the cause of action itself. . . . But in Meekins's Case, supra, the court held that when an action has been originally instituted within one year from the death, this requirement of the statute was complied with, and thereafter the action was subject to the provisions of the Code, § 166, now § 370, Revisal, to the effect that if an action shall be commenced within the time prescribed therefor, and the plaintiff be nonsuited, etc., the plaintiff, etc., may commence a new action within one year after such nonsuit, etc. . . . Not only is this the primary significance of the language of the statute, giving a right of action in case of wrongful conduct causing death, and its true meaning, as established by these authoritative interpretations, but this construction is in accord with right, reason, and justice. No doubt the chief consideration for this 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) requirement of the statute was to notify defendants, frequently the employers of labor in large numbers, that their attention might be drawn to the occurrence, and the evidence bearing upon it noted and in some way secured and preserved, and this purpose is reasonably met by the original institution of the action within the time specified. On the contrary, after action is commenced, a trial can rarely ever be had within the year. A deserving plaintiff is sometimes unavoidably interrupted in the preparation of his case. At times he may be presently surprised on the trial; and to hold that a nonsuit, rendered necessary in some such way, should bar any further action, would in many cases work grave injustice and amount to denial of a substantial right."

or omission. The action must be commenced within two years. The damages cannot exceed $10,000, and must inure to the exclusive benefit of the widow and children, if any, or next of kin, to be distributed in the same manner as personal property of the deceased."

The complaint in this court is that the court below held that § 5555 was inapplicable to this action, and that it could not be sustained because the plaintiff failed to comply with the condition of its maintenance fixed by § 5945, which created it,—failed to commence his action within two years of the wrongful act or death. In support of this complaint counsel argue that § 5555 is general in its terms and without exception, and that it should be held to apply to this and every action which is commenced within due time, wherein a judgment is reversed or the plaintiff fails on the merits after the time limited has expired, and he brings a new action within one year after the reversal or failure. In support of this contention they cite, and we have carefully read and considered, the opinions of the courts in Meekins v. Norfolk & S. R. Co. 131 N. C. 1, 42 S. E. 333; Kenney v. Parks, 137 Cal. 527, 70 Pac. 556; Swift & Co. v. Hoblawetz, 10 Kan. App. 48, 61 Pac. 969, and Trull v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. 151 N. C. 545, 66 S. E. 586, 587. But by the common law no civil action lies for an injury which results in death. Mobile L. Ins. Co. v. Brame, 95 U. S. 754, 757, 24 L. ed. 580, 582. The only foundation for this action is § 5945. In the absence of that section the plaintiff could have no action, and the defendant would have been exempt from liability for the death of McCain.

A statute which in itself creates a new liability gives an action to enforce it unknown to the common law, and fixes the time within which that action may be commenced, is not a statute of limitations. It is a statute of creation, and the commencement of the action within the time it fixes is an indispensable condition of the liability and of the action which it permits. Such a statute is an offer of an action on condition that it be commenced within the specified time. If the offer is not accepted in the only way in which it can be accepted, by a commencement of the action within the specified time, the action and the right of action no longer exist, and the defendant is exempt from liability. The Harrisburg, 119 U. S. 199, 214, 30 L. ed. 358, 362, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 140; Pollard v. Bailey, 20 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Wall. 520, 526, 527, 22 L. ed. 376, 378; Fourth Nat. Bank v. Francklyn, 120 U. S. 747, 756, 30 L. ed. 825, 829, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 757; Brunswick Terminal Co. v. National Bank, 48 L.R.A. 625, 40 C. E. 869, 870; International Nav. Co. v. Lindstrom, 60 C. C. A. 649, 651, 123 Fed. 475, 477.

Because a special act and a general law must stand together, the one as the law of its particular subject and the other as the general rule, unless it clearly appears that it was the intention of the legislative body to modify or repeal one of them, because it does not appear that the legislature of Oklahoma intended by § 5555 to annul or to modify the specific conditions on which new actions were created or permitted by special statutes, but that body seems to have enacted this section to extend the time fixed by the general statutes of limitation of the state for the commencement of the ordinary actions governed by that statute, and because it is expressly provided by § 5547, which is found in the same article as § 5555, that where in special cases a different limitation from those fixed in that article is prescribed by statute, as there is in this case, the action shall be governed by such limitation, and not by those prescribed in that article, the provisions of § 5555 are inapplicable to actions for death by wrongful acts, and neither modify nor extend the condition of these liabilities and actions fixed by § 5945, that they must be commenced within two years after the respective injuries or deaths. Rodman v. Missouri P. R. Co. 65 Kan. 645, 649-653, 59 L.R.A. 704, 70 Pac. 642; Gerren v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 60 Mo. 405, 411; Theroux v. Northern P. R. Co. 12 C. C. A. 52, 53, 27 U. S. Insurance — certificate in favor of bigamous wife — validity.

A benefit society which issues a certificate in favor of a woman who married assured with knowledge that he had a wife living, under the belief that she was his lawful wife, cannot, as against the claim of the lawful wife, justify payment of the benefit to her upon his death, on the theory that she was dependent on him for support, since, although he had supported her, he was not obliged to do so, either legally or morally.

(February 21, 1914.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First District, reversing a judgment of the Circuit Court for Cook County in her favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a benefit certificate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Tinsman & Blocki and Rankin, Howard, & Donnelly, for appellant:

Where the person designated as beneficiary in the certificate is not within any eligible class, and there are persons living who are eligible, the fund does not lapse, but is held by the insurance order in trust for the eligible who then stands first in the order of eligibles.

This note supplements notes on the same subject appended to Caldwell v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 653; Royal League v. Shields, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 208; and Goff v. Supreme Lodge, R. A. 37 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1191.

In a recent case it was held that where the constitution and by laws of a fraternal benefit association, and the statute under which its charter is obtained, each authorize the issuance of beneficiary insurance certificates to members of the family, heirs, blood relations, or persons dependent upon the member, the term "dependent" as therein used is intended to include persons other than members of the family, heirs, or persons related by blood. A woman living with a man as his concubine, mistress, or paramour is not a member of his family within the meaning of the statutes and the constitution and by-laws of the defendant order, nor is she a dependent.

Mary Eva Roth was not a dependent, either under the by-laws of the order or the statutes, hence could not take as such.

There is no written evidence in this case to show the dependency of Mary Eva Roth upon William Bandlion, as required by the by-laws. When a party fails to produce evidence in his possession or under his control, the law presumes that if such evidence had been produced, it would be against the party so failing to produce it.

No person can be eligible to receive or participate in the benefit fund who did not bear to the deceased member some one of the relations provided for in the constitution and by-laws of the society, and who did not come within the scope provided for or permitted by the statutes of the state where the society was incorporated.

Neither the act of a member of a beneficiary society, in naming a person who is not within the classes of eligibles to be benefited, nor the act of the corporation making the certificate which is issued to such person, can deprive the beneficiaries designated by the by-laws of the order of their right to or interest in the funds under the certificate.

The act of a member of a benefit society in naming an ineligible beneficiary, or the act of the society in issuing a certificate payable to such beneficiary, cannot defeat the right of the beneficiaries designated by law to claim the fund, as courts can control the payment of such fund in accordance with the rules of law.

Mr. George H. Miller, with Messrs. Musgrave, Oppenheim & Lee, for appellee:

Craig, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of assumpsit originally brought in the circuit court of Cook county by Mary Anne Bandlion against the Supreme Council of the Royal Arcanum, to recover a benefit of $3,000, which the appellee undertook by its constitution and by-laws to pay to the person, within certain classes, who should be designated by William Bandlion, and this suit is brought upon the obligation of appellee as evidenced by its constitution and by-laws. Subsequent to the institution of this suit, Mary Anne Bandlion died, and her daughter, Sophia Duenser, was appointed administratrix of her estate, and, by order of court, she, as such administratrix, was substituted as plaintiff.

The declaration in this case consists of three counts. The first count alleged the issuance to William Bandlion of a benefit certificate for $3,000 on the 5th day of October, 1880, by appellee, and the designation therein as beneficiary of Mary Eva (Roth) Bandlion, his wife; that the defendant was a fraternal mutual benefit association organized under the laws of the state of Massachusetts; that on the 14th day of May, 1906, William Bandlion departed this life intestate, a member of the appellee order in good standing, and that due proof of his death was furnished to appellee; that, at the time of the issuance of the certificate, Mary Anne Bandlion was the lawful wife of William Bandlion, and so remained until his death, which facts were known to Mary Eva (Roth) Bandlion; that, under the statutes of Massachusetts, benefits could be payable only to the husband, wife, betrothed, child by legal adoption, parent by legal adoption, or relative of or a person dependent upon the member named in the certificate, and that the benefit was payable to Mary Anne Bandlion, as she was the only person in the line of eligibles entitled thereto; that, under the constitution, by-laws, and regulations of the defendant, in the event that the person designated as beneficiary was unable to take under the laws of the order, then the benefit should be payable, first, to the wife of the member. The second count alleges, among other things, that, under the statutes of Massachusetts and the by-laws and rules and regulations of the defendant, the beneficiaries are limited to certain classes, and that, Mary Eva (Roth) Bandlion not being within those classes, her designation as beneficiary was void. The third count consists of the common counts.

The plaintiff filed an amendment to the first and second counts of her declaration, in which she averred that the common law relating to what is known as common-law marriages was in full force in the state of Pennsylvania in the years 1853 and 1854, and that said common law was also in existence and in full force and effect in the state of Iowa in the year 1858, and for several years thereafter.

The evidence sufficiently shows the foregoing facts charged in the declaration, and further shows, and the appellate court so found as a fact, that William Bandlion, the assured, married Mary Anne Schiel, plain-tiff's intestate, in the state of Pennsylvania in the year 1853 or 1854. In 1858 said William Bandlion and said Mary Anne, his wife, with their children, removed to Dubuque, Iowa. Five children were born to them in Pennsylvania and Iowa. He left his family and came to Chicago in April, 1864. His wife, Mary Anne, lived in Dubuque until after his death. Mary Eva (Roth) Bandlion, the beneficiary designated in the benefit sued on, lived in the city of Dubuque in the same block with and a few doors from William Bandlion and his family for several years prior to 1864, and there knew the Bandlions, visited at their home, and knew that they were living together as husband and wife, and there is evidence that William Bandlion was in the habit of going to see her. In 1864 she came to Chicago and there met the assured. On March 12, 1868, they were married in Chicago by the pastor of the German Lutheran church, and lived together as husband and wife from the time of their marriage until the death of the assured, May 14, 1906. In 1871 a daughter was born to them and lived with them as their child until her marriage, in 1890. On the death of the assured, Mary Eva (Roth) Bandlion submitted proofs of the death of the assured, and the defendant society paid the amount of the benefit certificate to her on July 5, 1906. Thereafter the attorneys for Mary Anne Bandlion wrote to the supreme secretary of the appellee company demanding payment of the amount provided in the benefit certificate, which the appellee refused. On November 19, 1906, Mary Anne Bandlion brought this suit. She died on August 11, 1907, and her daughter, Sophia Duenser, her administratrix, as stated above, was substituted as plaintiff. There was a verdict and judgment for plaintiff for $3,000 in the circuit court, from which the defendant prosecuted an appeal to the appellate court for the first district, where the judgment of the circuit court was reversed, but the case was not remanded. The case is brought to this court by appeal, a certificate of importance having been granted.

The constitution and by-laws of the appellee order, from the record in the case, show the object of the order was to establish a widows' and orphans' benefit fund, which, on satisfactory evidence of death, should be paid to the wife, children, relatives, or other persons dependent upon such member, as limited and described in the laws of said order. Section 323 provides that each applicant shall enter upon his application the name, residence, relation, or dependence of the person or class to whom he desires his benefit paid. Section 324 is as follows:

"Section 324. A benefit may be made payable to any one or more persons of any of the following classes only: Class First, Grade 1.—Member's wife. Grade 2.—Member's children, and children of deceased children, and member's children by legal adoption. In either of which cases no proof of dependency of the beneficiary designated shall be required. . . . Class Second:

(1) To affianced wife, or to any person who is dependent upon the member for maintenance (food, clothing, lodging, or education), in either of which cases written evidence of the affianced relation or dependency, within the requirements of the laws of the order, must be furnished to the satisfaction of the supreme secretary before the benefit certificate can be issued.

(2) Neither the decision of the supreme secretary nor the issuance of the benefit certificate shall be conclusive as to the facts of the affianced relation or dependency.

(3) If such satisfactory evidence, either of the affianced relation, dependency, or legal adoption, is not furnished, as hereinbefore provided, prior to the decease of the member, no benefit shall be paid unless such evidence is furnished satisfactory to the supreme secretary and the examiner of claims."

It is further provided, under the heading "Failure of designation and the death of beneficiaries," that the dependency must exist at death. Sections 329 and 330 read as follows:

"Section 329. No benefit shall be payable to a person or persons of class second, mentioned in § No. 324, unless the dependency therein required to be shown exists at the time of the member's death, in which case proof of such dependency at the member's death shall be furnished in writing, to the satisfaction of the supreme regent, whose decision thereon shall be final and conclusive upon all parties in interest before payment of the benefit shall be made.

"Section 330. If, at the time of the death of a member who has designated as beneficiary a person of class second, the dependency required by the laws of the order have ceased or shall be found not to have existed, or if the designated beneficiary is his wife and they shall be divorced upon the application of either party, or if any designation shall fail for illegality or otherwise, then the benefit shall be payable to the person or persons mentioned in class first, if living, in the shares and order of precedence, by grades, as therein enumerated, the persons living of each precedent grade taking in equal shares, per capita, to the exclusion 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) of all persons living of subsequently enumerated grades."

The appellate court found, in substance, that, notwithstanding the fact found by it and herein set out, that appellant's intestate, at the time of bringing suit, was the lawful wife of the assured, the appellee company was justified in paying the amount of the benefit certificate, as it did, to Mary Eva (Roth) Bandlion, on the grounds that the constitution of the defendant society gives express power to provide that on the death of a member a sum not exceeding $3,000 be paid to "persons dependent upon such member," and the by-laws provide that a benefit may be made payable "to any person who is dependent upon the member for maintenance (food, clothing, lodging, or education)." Section 1 of our statute relating to fraternal benefit societies provides that death benefits shall be paid only to the families "or to persons dependent on the member." Such finding of the appellate court is the principal error assigned by appellant and relied on for reversal.

There is no doubt but that the appellee company could, under proper circumstances, issue a policy of insurance or benefit certificate payable, in the event of death, to someone dependent on the assured. But the benefit certificate in this case was not so issued. It was issued supposedly to the wife of the assured, and for the reason that she stood in the relation of wife to the assured, and not because of the fact—even if such were the fact—that, by reason of living with the assured as his wife, she was a person dependent for food, clothing, etc., upon him. It is also apparent that the policy was paid by the appellee company for the same reason, namely, that the company supposed it was paying to one who had been the wife, and was then the lawful widow, of the assured, and there is nothing in the record to show that any evidence of such dependency was given or required, either at the time of the issuance of the benefit certificate or at the time of its payment, which under the rules of the society would be necessary in the case of issuing or paying benefit certificates to those who were dependent. This being true, can the appellee company now justify the payment it made by establishing the fact, or assuming, that the person to whom payment was made was, in fact, a dependent, under the meaning of the constitution and by-laws of the said society?

The assured was a married man, living with his wife and children in Dubuque, Iowa, at the time he first became acquainted with Mary Eva Roth, and she knew that. The evidence shows that, after the assured left Dubuque, Mary Eva Roth was not seen there. It is certain that he came to Chicago, and that she came there about the same time he did, and that shortly after her arrival in Chicago they met, and a few years afterwards a marriage ceremony was performed between them. At that time, as shown by the record, she was twenty-four years old. She admitted that prior to the marriage she saw him frequently. Her testimony was as follows: "He asked me if I would marry him. I asked him, 'What's the matter with them out there?' He said he didn't know anybody had any right on him. Then he asked me to write my father, and they objected, and I wrote him." Her marriage was bigamous and void, for the reason that the assured then had a living wife. Cartwright v. McGown, 121 Ill. 388, 2 Am. St. Rep. 105, 12 N. E. 737; Schmisser v. Beatrice, 147 Ill. 210, 35 N. E. 525. She was never the legal wife of William Bandler. Her family were still living in Dubuque, Iowa. It appears from the evidence that she was in correspondence with them, and she could easily have ascertained whether the assured was in a position to make her his legal wife. It would be different if he had met her as a stranger, claiming to be single, and she had married him in entire good faith, believing him to be a single man, and was without any means of learning otherwise, and had no reason to suspect that he was not free to contract with her a lawful marriage. Under the circumstances, she was not one who was, in law, dependent upon him. She could not have compelled him to support her under the laws of this state. Alexander v. Parker, 144 Ill. 355, 19 L.R.A. 187, 33 N. E. 183; Palmer v. Welch, 132 Ill. 141, 23 N. E. 412; Supreme Council, A. L. H. v. Perry, 140 Mass. 580, 5 N. E. 634; Britton v. Supreme Council, R. A. 46 N. J. Eq. 102, 19 Am. St. Rep. 376, 18 Atl. 675; Royal League v. Shields, 251 Ill. 250, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 208, 96 N. E. 45. Besides, there is no evidence in this case to show that she was dependent upon the assured at the time of his death, or that the proof of such dependency at the time of his death was furnished in writing, which was required by the by-laws of the appellee company before she was entitled to take as a dependent.

In the case of Story v. Williamsburgh Masonic Mut. Ben. Asso. 95 N. Y. 474, it was held that Mary Story, who had married the assured in good faith and lived with him for sixteen years prior to his death, believing herself to be his lawful wife, could recover against the defendant company, and that it was unnecessary to examine the evidence and determine whether the assured was the husband of another woman whom he had previously married in England, and who was living and undivorced at the time of his death; that, while the society had a by-law which prescribed the object and duty of the association on the death of a member, and contemplated a payment to the person who should be his lawful widow, this was not such a limitation of the power of the company as to prevent it from requiring as the beneficiary a person who might be designated by the member as holding to him the relation of wife. The rules and by-laws of the defendant company were different from those of appellee here, as appears from the opinion in that case, and it was not a question whether the lawful wife should recover, or one who in good faith supposed she was the lawful wife. The action was by the beneficiary named in the policy, against the association, which was attempting to defeat recovery.

In James v. Supreme Council, R. A. (C. C.) 130 Fed. 1014, the court held that the defendant association had the power to insure the life of its member for the benefit of any person who occupied a relation of dependency to such member, and that the question of dependency was not determined solely by the legality of the marriage relation.

It is true that there might be cases where a valid policy of insurance could be issued in favor of some person who was dependent upon the assured, and there might be cases where the question of dependency would be the controlling fact, and not the relationship of the assured or the legality of such relationship as stated in the policy, but those cases are distinguishable from the case at bar. We are referred to no case which holds that a woman can live with a man under a void marriage, with a knowledge of the facts such as Mary Eva Roth possessed in this case, and bring herself within the class of those who are dependent for support, legally or morally, upon the man whom she so lived with. The fact, if such be the fact, that he did live with her and support her for many years, does not in any way make the so-called dependency binding upon him as against his lawful wife.

We do not think that, under the facts of this case, Mary Eva Roth was a dependent upon the assured, or that the amount of this benefit was paid to her by the appellee association as such dependent, or could have been legally paid to her as such dependent. The by-laws of the association provide that, where the person designated as beneficiary in the certificate is not within any eligible class, and there are persons living who are eligible, the fund does not lapse, but is held by the insurance order in trust for the eligible who then stands first in the order of eligibles. The appellee, then, was liable, in the event of the death of the assured, to pay the amount of said benefit certificate to Mary Anne Bandlion, his lawful widow. Royal League v. Shields, 251 Ill. 250, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 208, 96 N. E. 45; Supreme Lodge, K. L. H. v. Menkhause, 209 Ill. 277, 65 L.R.A. 508, 101 Am. St. Rep. 239, 70 N. E. 567; Baldwin v. Begley, 185 Ill. 180, 56 N. E. 1065; Palmer v. Welch, 132 Ill. 141, 23 N. E. 412; Alexander v. Parker, 144 Ill. 355, 19 L.R.A. 187, 33 N. E. 183.

For the reasons given, the judgment of the Appellate Court will be reversed, and the judgment of the Circuit Court will be affirmed.

However, in Cincinnati v. Broadwell, 3 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 286, it was held that an ordinance providing for a penalty for anyone following the business of weighing other than the city weigher and his deputies was unconstitutional.

In Dawson v. Thornton, 134 Ga. 476, 68 S. E. 73, an ordinance creating the office of public weigher and making it his duty "in all cases of disagreement between seller and buyer, to weigh all cotton and other products sold by weight when requested to do so, and give his certificate for the same," was held to be valid, inasmuch as it does not compel all persons buying or selling cotton to have it weighed by the public weigher, but provides for his weighing only when there is a dispute and he is requested to do so.

And in Barfield v. Stevens Mercantile Co.

Anderson, Clayton, & Company, of Oklahoma City, are dealers in cotton, which they buy from local dealers for resale and export; that said Morgan, as the owner of the twenty bales aforesaid, theretofore sold the same to said Anderson, Clayton, & Company, and agreed to deliver the same to them f. o. b. Norman, with weights guaranteed at the compress at Oklahoma City; that said Taylor, whose yard is the only one in Norman, refused and still refuses to surrender possession of said twenty bales of cotton to plaintiffs on demand, and refuses to permit them to remove the same, except after the same are reweighed and 10 cents per bale paid him therefor as weigher, which plaintiffs refused to pay; that defendant threatens to and will reweigh not only that but all cotton belonging to plaintiffs which may be stored in his said yard from time to time, and will claim and charge such fee for reweighing, and will not deliver said cotton except upon the payment of the fee aforesaid. It is further charged that defendant in so doing pursuant to said act, which is alleged to be unconstitutional for certain reasons set forth in the petition. The prayer is that the defendant be enjoined from so doing, and for general relief. After answer filed, in effect a general admission and a 85 S. C. 186, 67 S. E. 158, a statute providing for a public cotton weigher at certain places was held invalid as being a special law where a general law could be made applicable, and the contention that such a statute unduly abridges the constitutional right of a citizen in the conduct of his private business of buying and selling cotton, by private weighing satisfactory to seller and buyer, is discussed, but not decided.

But while the legislature has power to authorize cities to appoint a weighmaster, and to require all coal sold in the city to be first weighed by him, an ordinance making such provision will not be sustained unless power to pass it is clearly given by statute. Savanna v. Robinson, 81 Ill. App. 471.

Thus, authority to a municipality to establish public scales and weights to be the standard to which all others in the town should conform did not authorize it to require that all cotton be weighed by the public weigher before sale. Sumter v. Deschamps, 4 S. C. 297.

So, without special statutory authority, a municipality cannot apply its ordinance requiring coal sold within the city to be weighed by the public weighmaster, to coal purchased by a state institution which is located within the municipality. Fulton v. Sims, 127 Mo. App. 677, 106 S. W. 1094.

Such ordinances should provide reasonable facilities for the accommodation of the public. Davis v. Anita, 73 Iowa, 325, 35 N. W. 244.

They are not invalid as in restraint of trade. Raleigh v. Sorrell, 46 N. C. (1 Jones, L.) 49; State v. Tyson, 111 N. C. 687, 16 S. E. 238; State v. Smith, 123 Iowa, 654, 96 N. W. 899; Stokes v. New York, 14 Wend. 87; Yates v. Milwaukee, 12 Wis. 673; Gaines v. Coates, 51 Miss. 335.

therefor, whether such article is to be offered for sale in the city or not, is invalid. Lamar v. Weidman, 57 Mo. App. 507.

An ordinance requiring coal and certain other products to be weighed by the city weigher is not arbitrary or unfair because sales under a certain weight are excluded from its provisions. State ex rel. Stone v. Eck, 121 Minn. 202, 141 N. W. 106; St. Charles v. Elsner, 155 Mo. 671, 56 S. W. 291.

The fees charged must be for purposes of regulation only. If they are so large as to make it apparent that they are intended for revenue purposes, they are unlawful. Taylor, C. & Co. v. Pine Bluff, 34 Ark. 603; Logan v. Logan, 2 B. Mon. 143.

But inasmuch as the exact fee necessary to cover the cost of maintaining a city scale could not be determined in advance, the courts will not declare such an ordinance, providing for the weighing of coal, to be invalid unless the fee is plainly unreasonable and excessive. Wills v. Ft. Smith, 70 Ark. 221, 66 S. W. 922.

And in Yates v. Milwaukee, 12 Wis. 673, it was held that the fact that the official weigher was appointed on condition that he pay $500 per annum to the municipality for the privilege of weighing, and collecting the fees provided for, did not render the ordinance invalid.

In accord with Taylor v. Anderson is Vega S. S. Co. v. Consolidated Elevator Co. 75 Minn. 308, 43 L.R.A. 843, 74 Am. St. Rep. 484, 77 N. W. 973, in which it was held that a statute making the weight of wheat as found by the state weighmaster conclusive is unconstitutional, as in effect depriving the party of his day in court.

As in State ex rel. Hadley v. Goffee, 192 Mo. 670, 91 So. 486, the court said (dictum) that a statute could not give the certificates of a state weigher the force of conclusive evidence, but could make them prima facie evidence.

However, in Vega S. S. Co. v. Consolidated Elevator Co. supra, it was further held that the constitutionality of the statute can be impeached only when the party complaining is free from fault or negligence, and the evidence is strong and clear that there was in fact a substantial mistake.

plea of justification under the act, there was judgment for plaintiffs upon the pleadings, the act was declared unconstitutional, the injunction granted as prayed, and defendant brings the case here.

The act assailed is entitled: "An Act to Require the Reweighing of Baled Cotton Before Removing the Same from Any Local Cotton Yard, and Fixing the Penalty for the Violation Thereof."

It provides:

"Section 1. Every person, firm, or corporation in the state of Oklahoma, engaged in the business of cotton buying, where lists of baled cotton are purchased from local buyers, and the said cotton stored in cotton yards or cotton warehouses owned or operated by cotton weighers, shall, before removing same, have said cotton reweighed.

"Sec. 2. Every owner or operator of a cotton yard or warehouse in the state of Oklahoma shall be required, before allowing any cotton to be removed from his yard or warehouse, to reweigh same in the presence of the owner or purchaser, or some agent of said purchaser or owner of same; and, with indelible ink, mark on the bale, in figures, the weight of the bale."

Section 3 provides for testing the scales and a second weighing.

"Sec. 4. Persons, firms, or corporations engaged in the cotton business, coming under the provisions of this act, shall have the right to be present at the reweighing of any cotton they may purchase or desire to purchase, and when any cotton shall be reweighed in their presence, they shall accept the weights as being correct and make final settlement on the same.

"Sec. 5. When a list of cotton has been reweighed before leaving the cotton yard, according to the provisions of this act, the transaction between the buyer and seller as to the weights shall be at an end, and neither party shall have any recourse on the other."

Section 6 provides the penalty for a violation of the act. Which means (§ 1) that when Morgan bought this cotton and had it stored in this yard, before he can deliver it to the purchasers, his coplaintiffs, he must have it reweighed by the weighmaster of the yard. Not only that, but § 2 makes it the duty of the weighmaster to reweigh it, before it is removed, in the presence of one of the contracting parties or his agent, and to mark the weight of the bale thereon. After § 3 makes provision for any person in interest not satisfied with the weights to require a reweighing, § 4 provides that the purchasers may be present at the reweighing, and that when they are, and the cotton is reweighed in their presence, "they shall accept the weights as being correct and make final settlement on the same." Not only that, but, whether the purchaser is present or not, § 5 provides that, when the cotton is reweighed as provided, "the transaction between the buyer and seller as to weights shall be at an end, and neither party shall have any recourse on the other." Which means that such finding of the weights by the weigher is conclusive as to that fact, and, should either buyer or seller sue the other and base his claim on over or under weights resulting from fraud, accident, mistake, or anything else, the other has the right to plead the weights, as found by the weighmaster, in bar of the action, and the same will be conclusive evidence of the weight of the cotton. Whether the act is an attempt to confer upon the weighmaster the exercise of judicial power, or denies to either party to the sale the equal protection of the law, or whether it interferes with plaintiffs' right to contract, or whether it constitutes a taking of private property for private use (and it seems to be open to objection on any of these grounds), and for any of the reasons stated is unconstitutional, we need not say, for true it is it was beyond the power of the legislature to make the finding of the weighmaster conclusive evidence of that fact, and hence the act must fall, as denying to the party sued, whether buyer or seller, due process of law.

Cooley's Const. Lim. 7th ed. p. 526, says: "Except in those cases which fall within the familiar doctrine of estoppel at the common law, or other cases resting upon the like reasons, it would not, we apprehend, be in the power of the legislature to declare that a particular item of evidence should preclude a party from establishing his rights in opposition to it. In judicial investigations the law of the land requires an opportunity for a trial; and there can be no trial if only one party is suffered to produce his proofs. The most formal conveyance may be a fraud or a forgery; public officers may connive with rogues to rob the citizen of his property; witnesses may testify or officers certify falsely, and records may be collusively manufactured for dishonest purposes; and that legislation which would preclude the fraud or wrong being shown, and deprive the party wronged of all remedy, has no justification in the principles of natural justice or of constitutional law,"—citing Blackwell, Tax Titles, pp. 100 et seq.

In McCready v. Sexton, 29 Iowa, 356, 4 Am. Rep. 214, the court said: "Wantlan v. White, 19 Ind. 470, which was a proceeding by habeas corpus in behalf of an enlisted minor who had taken the usual oath of his age. His discharge was resisted on the ground that the act of Congress provided that 'the oath of enlistment taken by the recruit shall be conclusive as to his age.' The court held 'that it is not competent for the legislative power to declare what shall be conclusive evidence of a fact.' . . . In Groesbeck v. Seeley, 13 Mich. 329, Quinlon v. Rogers, 12 Mich. 169, and Case v. Dean, 16 Mich. 12, a statute making the tax deeds conclusive evidence of title was held absolutely void, as being in conflict with the constitutional provision guarantying due process of law for the protection of life, liberty, and property."

In Wilson v. Wood, 10 Okla. 279, 61 Pac. 1045, the court, in the syllabus, said: "The legislature has no power to declare a tax deed or the recitals therein conclusive evidence of a compliance with those matters which are essential to the exercise of the taxing power, or to those matters which are necessary to be done in order to divest the title of the former owner or those claiming through him, and to execute a valid deed of conveyance. In judicial investigations the law of the land requires an opportunity for trial, and there can be no trial if only one party is suffered to produce his proofs. Except in those cases which fall within the established doctrine of estoppel at the common law, or cases resting on like reasons, it is not within the power of the legislature to declare that a particular item of evidence shall preclude a party from establishing his rights in opposition to it,"—and after quoting approvingly from Judge Cooley, as we have done, cited Weeks v. Merkle, 6 Okla. 714, 52 Pac. 929.

In Graves v. Northern P. R. Co. 5 Mont. 556, 51 Am. Rep. 81, 6 Pac. 16, it was held that a statute rendering a railroad company liable for cattle killed by it, at a valuation to be conclusively fixed by appraisers, was unconstitutional as denying a right to trial by jury.

In Vega S. S. Co. v. Consolidated Elevator Co. 75 Minn. 308, 43 L.R.A. 843, 74 Am. St. Rep. 484, 77 N. W. 973, plaintiff was a common carrier of freight on the Great Lakes between two certain points; defendant owned and operated a public grain elevator at one of them. On a certain day S. M. & Co. proceeded to transport, on one of plaintiff's ships, a certain number of bushels of wheat stored in said elevator, to the other point. The wheat, while being delivered from the elevator to the ship, was weighed out by the assistant state weighmaster, under the laws of Minnesota. Gen. Stat. 1894, § 7675, after prescribing the duties of the weighmaster, one of which was to weigh said grain, provided that "the action and certificates of such weighmaster and his assistants in the discharge of their aforesaid duties shall be conclusive upon all parties either in interest or otherwise, as to the matters contained in said certificates." When the grain was delivered to consignee, there was a shortage, which was paid for by the carrier pursuant to the terms of the bill of lading, who thereupon, becoming subrogated to his rights, brought suit against the elevator company for the amount of the shortage. On the trial the court directed a verdict for defendant, and in effect held that the statute in question made the finding of the weighmaster as to the weights conclusive of that fact as between the parties. In passing, speaking to the statute, the court said: "But is it competent for the legislature to make the weight thus ascertained absolutely conclusive? We are of the opinion that it is not. The legislature cannot in this manner provide for the arbitrary exercise of power, so as to deprive a person of his day in court to vindicate his rights. And the law which closes his mouth absolutely when he comes into court is the same, in effect, as the law which deprives him of his day in court. See Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. p. 452; 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1050; Graves v. Northern P. R. Co. supra; Johns v. State, 55 Md. 350; Wantlan v. White, 19 Ind. 470."

Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Simonson, 64 Kan. 802, 57 L.R.A. 765, 91 Am. St. Rep. 248, 68 Pac. 653, was a suit against the railway company for a shortage of hay shipped over its lines. There was judgment for plaintiff and the company appealed. The action was brought under Gen. Stat. 1901, §§ 5938-5947, which among other things provided that the railway company should furnish track scales for weighing hay and issue duplicate bills of lading, and concluded one of the sections thus: "And in any action hereafter brought against any railway company, for or on account of any failure or neglect to deliver any such grain, seed or hay to the consignee, or his heirs or assigns, either duplicate of such bill of lading shall be conclusive proof of the amount of such grain, seed or hay so received by such railway company." To escape liability the railway company offered to prove that the full amount of hay receipted for in the bills of lading had not in fact been received by it. In passing upon the admissibility of the evidence, the court held that part of the statute quoted to be unconstitutional, admitted the evidence, and said: "Is it in the power of the legislature thus to create a conclusive presumption" of evidence "in a matter of private contract? We are constrained to believe that it is not. Every suitor is entitled to his day in court, and to have his case determined on such evidence as legal policy will allow. It is doubtless competent for the legislature to prescribe many of the rules of evidence. The subjects of the competency of witnesses, the order of trial, the burden of proof, the effect of public records, the certification of copies of official documents, the prima facie character of certain evidence, and other like matters which pertain to the practice rather than the right of proving causes, are lawfully within the sphere of legislative regulation; but it is not within the power of the legislature to exclude from the courts that which proves the truth of a case, nor, on the other hand, to compel them to receive that which is false in character." And in the syllabus: "The provision of chapter 100 of the Laws of 1893 (Gen. Stat. 1901, §§ 5938-5947) which makes the specification of weights in bills of lading issued by railroad companies for hay, grain, etc., shipped over their lines, conclusive evidence of the correctness of such weights, is unconstitutional because denying to the companies due process of law, and because wrongfully depriving the courts of the judicial power to determine the weight and sufficiency of evidence." See also People ex rel. Hillel Lodge No. 72 I. O. B. B. v. Rose, 207 Ill. 352, 89 N. E. 762; McNulty v. Toof, 116 Ky. 202-210, 75 S. W. 258; State v. Schlenker, 112 Iowa, 642, 51 L.R.A. 347, 84 Am. St. Rep. 360, 84 N. W. 698; Southern P. Co. v. Railroad Comrs. (C. C.) 78 Fed. 236; Ramish v. Hartwell, 126 Cal. 443, 58 Pac. 920; Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Minnesota 134 U. S. 418, 33 L. ed. 970, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 209, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 462, 702; Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Payne, 33 Ark. 816, 34 Am. Rep. 55; Corbin v. Hill, 21 Iowa, 70; Weeks v. Merkle, 6 Okla. 714, 52 Pac. 929; White v. Flynn, 23 Ind. 46; Groesbeck v. Seeley, 13 Mich. 329; Wantlan v. White, 19 Ind. 470; Marx v. Hanthorn, 148 U. S. 172, 37 L. ed. 410, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 508; Abbott v. Lindenbower, 42 Mo. 162.

We are therefore of the opinion that the whole act is unconstitutional and must fall. We say the whole act for the reason that the purpose of the act was to accomplish one object only, which was to make the determination of the weights by the weighmaster conclusive evidence of that fact. Where such is the case, the whole act must fall, for it is impossible to suppose that the legislature would have passed the act with its ultimate object eliminated therefrom.

No other question being raised, the judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

S. H. PATE, Appt.,

v.

T. H. RALSTON.

(— Iowa, —, 139 N. W. 906.)

Sale — repudiation of contract — right to recover purchase price.

1. To enable the seller to recover the purchase price when a contract for personalty is repudiated before time for delivery arrives, he must so far perform his part of the contract as to vest title in the purchaser.

Same — notice not to ship — effect.

2. That a purchaser of personal property notifies the seller that he will not receive it, and that shipment will be at seller's risk, does not obviate the necessity of delivery or tender to entitle the seller to recover the purchase price of the property.

Scope.

Attention is called to a distinction between a wrongful repudiation and a mere breach of the contract, by the purchaser. While, of course, a wrongful repudiation of a contract constitutes a breach of it, the purchaser may breach the contract with-

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Woodbury County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover the purchase price of nursery stock alleged to have been sold by plaintiff to defendant. Affirmed.

Statement by Ladd, J.:

Action for the purchase price of fruit shrubs and trees resulted in a verdict being directed for defendant and judgment entered thereon. The plaintiff appeals.

Messrs. J. W. Hallam and C. H. Rinker, for appellant:

Defendant had no right to rescind the contract without the consent of the nursery company.

out repudiating it. Indeed, he may breach the contract and at the time be insisting upon its performance. It is intended to include herein only cases where the purchaser repudiates the contract. This excludes cases where the purchaser denies liability on the contract of sale, on the ground that the property has not been delivered to him, as where it has been destroyed in transit; also cases where the purchaser refuses to accept property tendered to him, where he bases his refusal on the claim that the property tendered does not conform to the contract, either because of defects existing in it originally or injuries to it during transportation. It is, of course, impracticable to point out all the different classes of cases excluded, but the foregoing are sufficient to illustrate where the line of exclusion is drawn.

A case illustrative of one type of cases excluded is United States v. Andrews, 207 U. S. 229, 52 L. ed. 185, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 100, construing a contract of sale to intend delivery to a carrier for transportation, and holding that the risk of transportation was on the buyer, and he could not lawfully refuse to receive the goods on the ground that they were injured during transportation, and that notwithstanding such injury the seller was entitled to recover the purchase price.

I. Executed contracts.

The authorities are agreed that a contract of sale of goods, executed to the extent at least that title has passed to the buyer, will entitle the seller to recover the purchase price, where he has fully performed upon his part, although he still retains possession of the goods, and although the buyer has refused to accept and settle for them. Upon this point the cases are so harmonious that no attempt has been made to gather them. The following, while by no means exhaustive of such authorities, are sufficient to illustrate the rule:

H. 394, holding that as a general rule under a contract for the sale of specific chattels at a stated price, where nothing remains to be done to designate the property sold or the price to be paid, title immediately vests in the buyer, and the seller has the right to recover the purchase price;

—Hunter v. Wetsell, 84 N. Y. 549, 38 Am. Rep. 544, holding that on the sale of a designated lot of hops at a stipulated price per pound, it was a sufficient offer of performance to support an action for the purchase price, for the seller to offer to deliver the hops, which by the terms of the contract were to be delivered at a place to be designated by the purchaser, where the latter refused to designate any place of delivery, since in such case the seller did all he could do, and stood in such a capacity of complete performance as to entitle him to recover the purchase price. It is said that such a case was not one of merely an executory contract, in which the title did not pass;

—Heiser v. Mears, 120 N. C. 443, 27 S. E. 117, stating the rule that in a contract for the sale of specified articles then in existence and ready for delivery, if the purchaser refuses compliance with the contract, the seller has three remedies, one of which

Ladd, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

The defendant, at the solicitation of one Shearer, an agent of plaintiff, purchased fruit shrubs and trees. The order therefor read:

No 49. December 6, 1909.

I, Thomas H. Ralston, have this day bought of Saddler Bros. Nurseries, Bloom-

The ground of this decision is that the seller had a lien upon the animal for the purchase price, and would not be required to waive this lien by a tender in order to maintain an action to recover the purchase price. Wade v. Moffett, 21 Ill. 110, 74 Am. Dec. 79.

II. General rule as to executory contracts.

While there is much confusion and more or less conflict among the authorities as to when the seller of goods may maintain an action for the purchase price where the purchaser refuses to receive the goods, the cases are practically uniform in holding or recognizing that an action to recover the purchase price of an article cannot be maintained if, at the time of the commencement of the action, the contract is still executory in the sense that title has neither actually nor constructively passed to the purchaser. See upon this point notes to Acme Food Co. v. Older, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 808, and Fairbanks, M. & Co. v. Heltsley, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 248.

This doctrine is either expressly held or clearly recognized by substantially all the cases considering the question, including the cases asserting in general terms, that one of the remedies of a seller of goods by executory contract, where the contract is breached by the buyer, is to retain the goods for the latter and recover the purchase price; for the very assertion of the rule includes, as a condition of recovering the purchase price, the appropriation of the goods to the contract, thereby vesting the title in the purchaser, the seller simply retaining a lien on the property to secure the purchase price. Hence, it is fair to presume that the cases asserting the right of the seller under an executory contract to recover the purchase price, where the purchaser refuses to perform, in characterizing the contract as executory, refer to it either as of the date of its execution or as of the time of its breach by the purchaser, or at least as of some time prior to the commencement of the action. 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Many of the cases which deny the right of the seller of goods by executory contract to perform on his part and thereafter recover the purchase price, on the ground that his performance had vested title in the purchaser, are inconsistent in that they at the same time sustain the right of the seller of goods by executory contract to sell the goods for and in behalf of the purchaser, and recover the difference between the proceeds of such sale and the contract price, where the purchaser refuses to perform. For this remedy can be sustained only on the theory that title has vested in the purchaser. If the title has not vested in him, it is of course clear that the sale would be by the seller of his own goods. This distinction is pointed out in Lincoln v. Charles Alshuler Mfg. Co. 142 Wis. 475, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) 780, 125 N. W. 908, holding that where an executory contract of sale has never been completed by the seller, he cannot treat the goods as property of the purchaser and sell them as the latter's goods; hence he cannot base a cause of action on the theory of a resale and recover the difference due between the proceeds of the resale and the original contract price, but in such case his action is for damages for breach of contract, determinable as of the time of the breach, and limited according to the familiar rule that the damages can be only such as may be reasonably considered to have been in mutual contemplation by both parties at the time of making the contract, as the natural result of the breach.

The really important question therefore, and the question herein considered, is whether the seller of personal property by executory contract may recover the purchase price where he has appropriated the goods to the purchaser at the time of or before he brings his action. Upon this question the courts are at variance, owing largely to different views as to the specific application of very general rules, which frequently result in the creation of some very arbitrary distinctions not required by expository law or demanded by expediency. Indeed, some of these distinctions are inington, Illinois, the following bill of trees, etc., to be forwarded in the spring of 1910, which I agree to pay for in cash, value received, when they arrive at Anthon, Iowa. [Here follows list.] Total amount of my order is $2,215. I will not countermand this order. The articles are to be delivered in good condition.

[Signed] T. H. Ralston,
P. O. Anthon, Iowa,
R. R. No. 1, Residence 1½ N. W.
J. C. Shearer, Canvasser.

The defendant wrote plaintiff February 15, 1910: "I withdraw the order for trees, etc., given Dec. 6th, 1909." To this plaintiffs responded two days later: "Kindly read copy of your contract for nursery stock and you will note that the contracts read that you will not countermand the order, therefore your trees will be shipped in proper time for planting, next spring." The defendant, on February 19, 1910, answered: "I decline to receive the trees, and, if you ship them, you will do so at your own risk." A member of plaintiff's firm testified on cross-examination that "the stock was taken from the ground somewhere between the 10th or 15th of December. We sold no other stock of that grade that year except some pear trees, but sold a great deal of other stock and put it away until the next season whether we have orders for it or not." In the spring following the goods were shipped from Bloomington, Illinois, into Iowa, but there was no showing that expedient in that their application occasions confusion and uncertainty in the law relating to the seller's remedy upon breach of an executory contract of sale. This is particularly true as to the distinction between executed and executory contracts as affecting the remedy of the seller for breach thereof by the buyer. This distinction is largely arbitrary, and raises an issue frequently difficult to determine, as to whether the particular contract is executory or executed. In each case the result must be more or less uncertain, since the intention of the parties is the controlling factor.

It is needless to say that a party's remedy should not be made to depend on an arbitrary distinction, wholly disassociated from the wrongful act complained of. It is not in keeping with twentieth century standards of justice to make the right to recover for an alleged wrongful act depend in the particular case, not upon the finding of the issue as to the wrong complained of in favor of the plaintiff, but upon so uncertain a thing as the finding of a court or jury upon the question of fact as to the character of the contract, whether executed or executory. Under such a rule the first issue, as to the wrongful breach of the contract of sale, may be found in favor of the seller, but he may nevertheless be defeated in an action to recover the purchase price, because the second issue, as to the character of the contract, is found against him, and this too where he has so clearly and unequivocally appropriated and set apart to the buyer the goods called for by the contract, as to preclude him from subsequently asserting ownership over them, should the purchaser, either before or after judgment, discharge his lien for the purchase price.

To illustrate, where a purchaser of a car of grain before the delivery thereof breaches his contract to purchase, if the distinction between executory and executed contracts is applied, the seller must not only assume the burden of establishing the breach, but at his peril must also determine the character of the contract, whether executory or executed, in order to determine the remedy 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) he is entitled to pursue. If the car was a specifically designated car, prima facie the contract was an executed one; if it was a car of grain from a larger mass, the contract was prima facie executory. But these are presumptions merely, and not conclusive. The ultimate question is one of fact as to the intention of the parties. See note in 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1.

That this distinction is an important one, having a vital effect upon the seller's rights, is made apparent by an examination of Acme Food Co. v. Older, 64 W. Va. 255, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 807, 61 S. E. 235. In this case the seller of a designated quantity of poultry food was denied the right to recover the purchase price on the ground that the contract was executory and the purchaser had repudiated it before the seller had tendered the goods, although from a letter of the seller accepting the purchaser's order for the food, it appears that before the purchaser repudiated the contract, the seller had manufactured the food for the purchaser, and marked and set the same aside for him in the seller's warehouse, to be held until the arrival of the date of shipment. This decision is based upon the ground that an action for the purchase price cannot be sustained where based upon an executory contract of sale, and the purchaser, by repudiating the contract before tender or attempted delivery by the seller, thereby precludes him from completing the contract by vesting title in the buyer, and hence the latter cannot be held for the purchase money.

As will hereafter appear, the courts are in conflict upon this point. A rule more promotive of justice as well as certainty in the law is that which makes the right of the seller to recover the purchase price, where the purchaser refuses to receive the goods, depend not upon the question whether or not the contract is executed, but rather upon the question whether at the time of the breach the situation of the seller with reference to the property is such that by his own act he can, constructively at least, transfer to the buyer the title thereto, without doing anything which will have the these ever reached Anthon or were ever delivered or tendered to the defendant. The same witness testified that plaintiff "always stood ready to deliver the goods called for by the order, . . . to do so at any time in the shipping season." The state of facts as thus recited was held not to entitle plaintiff to the recovery of the purchase price, and, as no evidence of market value was adduced as a basis for the measure of damages recoverable on a breach of the contract, verdict was directed to be returned for the defendant.

1. As the order for the fruit trees and shrubs had been accepted, the contract was complete long before the letters were sent to plaintiff, undertaking to repudiate the order. Ordinarily in these circumstances effect of unnecessarily increasing the damage, viewed from the situation of the parties at the time of the breach. That is to say, if, at the time of the breach of the contract, the property is owned by the seller and is substantially in deliverable condition according to the terms of the contract, then the purchaser, by repudiating the contract, cannot prevent the seller from completing performance sufficient to transfer the title, thereby entitling himself to recover the purchase price; while on the other hand, if, at the time the purchaser repudiates the contract, the property is not in deliverable condition, and to put it in such condition will require either the acquirement of the property by the seller or the expenditure of substantial labor and material in its completion, the rule requiring the injured party to make his damages from the breach of a contract as light as possible forbids the seller from acquiring or completing the property in order to put it in a deliverable state, and requires him to cease his efforts in this regard, and limits him in his recovery to the loss sustained by him, considered with reference to the condition of the property at the time of the repudiation. This statement as to the measure of damages is intended to be very general, as that question is not discussed herein.

This general rule as to the right of the seller is the conclusion of the writer based upon all the authorities hereafter considered; it cannot, however, be said that the rule receives full support from any individual case, and, as pointed out, it is clearly denied by some cases.

III. Necessity of delivery, tender, or appropriation.

a. In general.

Upon the general question of necessity of tender or delivery, see note to Stewart v. Henningsen Produce Co. 50 L.R.A.(N.S.) 111; also note to Barber v. Andrews, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1. As to the effect of the character of the pleadings upon the neces-any of three remedies is available to the vendor: (1) He may retain the property for the vendee and recover the purchase price; or (2) keep it as his own and sue for the difference between the market value and the contract price; or (3) he may sell the property for the highest price he can get and recover the balance of the purchase price. Hamilton v. Finnegan, 117 Iowa, 623, 91 N. W. 1039. It does not appear that plaintiff sold the property, and, as no evidence of market value was adduced, it is evident that neither of the methods last mentioned was contemplated. The remedy first named then must have been relied on, and it has been repeatedly recognized as available in this state. McAlister v. Sasley, 65 Iowa, 719, 23 N. W. 139; McCormick of a tender or delivery, see the subject, "Pleading," infra, VIII.

It is settled law that there must be a delivery, actual or constructive, of the property sold, or an appropriation of it to the contract, in order to entitle the seller to recover the purchase price:

—Burnham v. Roberts, 70 Ill. 24, holding that, to warrant an action to recover the purchase price of an article sold, there must be a delivery sufficient to pass title to the purchaser. In Barrow v. Window, 71 Ill. 214, Noy's Maxims, chap. 42, is quoted to the effect that "if I sell my horse for money, I may keep him until I am paid, but I cannot have an action of debt until he is delivered; yet the property of the horse is, by the bargain, in the bargain-or or buyer. But if he do presently tender me my money, and I do refuse it, he may take the horse and have an action of detainer. And if the horse die in my stable, between the bargain and the delivery, I may have an action of debt for my money, because, by the bargain, the property was in the buyer." Applying this maxim, it is held that if the horse is still living and capable of delivery, the seller cannot maintain an action for his money before delivery or tender of delivery, unless discharged in this regard by the act of the buyer;

—PATE v. RALSTON, holding that, in order to recover the purchase price where the buyer has repudiated the contract before delivery, everything required of the seller to pass title must be performed by him;

—F. C. Austin Mfg. Co. v. Colfax County, 67 Neb. 101, 93 N. W. 145, holding that delivery or proffer of delivery is essential to the right to recover the purchase price;

—Gordon v. Norris, 49 N. H. 382, holding that an action to recover the purchase price of hay cannot be maintained where the seller has not parted with the possession or title to the property, and there has been no delivery or effort to deliver. Bailey v. Smith, 43 N. H. 143 (stating rule);

—Indianapolis, P. & C. R. Co. v. Maguire, 62 Ind. 140, holding that there can be no

Harvesting Mach. Co. v. Markert, 107 Iowa, 340, 78 N. W. 33.

In order to recover the purchase price, however, everything required of the vendor to pass title must have been performed. Moline Scale Co. v. Beed, 52 Iowa 307, 35 Am. Rep. 272, 3 N. W. 96. As said by Cole, J., in McClung v. Kelley, 21 Iowa, 508: "No sale is complete so as to vest in the vendee an immediate right of property so long as anything remains to be done between the buyer and seller in relation to the thing sold." Snyder v. Tibbals, 32 Iowa, 447; Augustine v. McDowell, 120 Iowa, 401, 94 N. W. 918. The theory on which recovery of the purchase price is allowed notwithstanding the vendee's repudiation of the contract is that by performance on his part the vendor has vested title in the vendee, possession being retained by the vendor for him; and for this reason the latter is entitled to the purchase price. Oklahoma Vinegar Co. v. Carter, 116 Ga. 140, 59 L.R.A. 122, 94 Am. St. Rep. 112, 42 S. E. 378; Unexcelled Fireworks Co. v. Polites, 130 Pa. 531, 17 Am. St. Rep. 788, 18 Atl. 1058; Ganson v. Madigan, 13 Wis. 67; Pusey & J. Co. v. Dodge, 3 Penn. (Del.) 63, 49 Atl. 248; 35 Cyc. 5311; 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 1118. "In all cases of contracts for the sale of personal property, where it has any market value, the vendor, before he can recover of the vendee, . . . must have delivered the property to the vendee, or have done such acts as vested the title in the vendee, or would have vested the recovery of the purchase price of articles, in the absence of proof of something done on the part of the seller to vest the buyer with title to the property, or to restrict the former in any manner in his control over it;

—Hamilton v. Finnegan, 117 Iowa, 623, 91 N. W. 1039, stating rule that, in order to recover the purchase price for shares of stock under a contract to purchase the same, the specific property must have been appropriated to the contract by the seller, and everything done except actual acceptance under the terms of the sale by the purchaser;

—Price v. Weisner, 83 Kan. 343, 31 L.R.A.(N.S.) 927, 111 Pac. 439, stating the rule that until delivery the seller cannot maintain an action for the purchase price, except in those cases where the contract contemplates that he shall retain possession;

—Blish Mill Co. v. Detherage, 155 Ky. 319, 159 S. W. 816, holding that where a contract of sale is executory, to entitle the seller to recover the purchase price, he must tender the property to the purchaser or offer to ship it to him;

—Gross v. Ajello, 132 App. Div. 25, 116 N. Y. Supp. 380, stating the rule that where a contract of sale is executory, the obligation of the purchaser to pay, and of the seller to deliver, is mutual and dependent, and in the absence of delivery, the seller can recover the purchase price only by showing a readiness to perform and a tender of performance;

—Kelley v. Upton, supra, holding that where a contract for the sale of stock is executory, the seller cannot maintain an action for the purchase price without showing either delivery or tender of the stock, or that such delivery or tender has been waived by the purchaser. But a tender is not necessary in order to entitle the seller to maintain an action for the purchase price, where the purchaser refuses to receive the property. Hagar v. King, 38 Barb. 200, Holmes & G. Mfg. Co. v. Morse, 53 Hun. 58, 5 N. Y. Supp. 940;

—Haynes v. Brown, 18 Okla. 389, 89 Pac. 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

1124, holding that the seller of shares of stock must prove a delivery or tender thereof, and the refusal of the purchaser to accept the same, in order to be entitled to recover the purchase price;

—Jenner v. Smith, L. R. 4 C. P. 270, holding that under a contract for the sale of unascertained hops, the price depending upon the weight, and the quality to be according to the sample furnished the buyer, the seller, by designating the hops and setting them apart for the buyer in a warehouse, did not thereby entitle himself to recover the purchase price, where the warehouseman continued to hold them at his risk.

It has been held that to be effectual, and sufficient to pass title to the purchaser of property, and entitle the seller to treat the property as sold and delivered and recover the purchase price thereof in an action for goods sold and delivered, the delivery must be such as will amount to a waiver or discharge of any right of lien in the seller. Messer v. Woodman, 22 N. H. 172, 53 Am. Dec. 241.

Hughes v. United States, 4 Ct. Cl. 64, holds that, under a contract for the sale of grain to be delivered at a certain place, it is not necessary that the seller shall make a tender at the place of delivery of all the grain, but it is sufficient to have tendered part within the time fixed by the contract, and to have been in possession of, and ready to supply, the balance within the prescribed time; and where the buyer fails to take the grain within the time agreed upon, the seller has the right to deliver the grain to the purchaser and sue for the contract price. In this case, however, the seller did not elect to follow this remedy.

Under any circumstances an action cannot be maintained for the price where the seller has not the possession of the property sold, and never had the possession thereof, and hence was never in a position to transfer the title to the purchaser. Brown v. McCaffrey, 40 W. N. C. 69.

But the title to goods may pass so as to support an action for the purchase price, title in him if he had consented to accept it, for the law will not tolerate the palpable injustice of permitting the vendor to hold the property, and also to recover the price of it." Shippa v. Atkinson, 8 Ind. App. 505, 36 N. E. 375; Dwiggins v. Clark, 94 Ind. 49, 48 Am. Rep. 140. To permit the vendor to retain title and recover the purchase price would be intolerable, but this is precisely the situation of plaintiff. The fruit trees and shrubs had not been set apart for defendant as had the butter for the vendee in Mitchell v. Le Clair, 165 Mass. 308, 43 N. E. 117. Nor had delivery been effected or even tendered.

That defendant, in countermanding the order, said he declined to receive the trees, and that shipping would be at plaintiff's risk, would not obviate the necessity of delivery at the time stipulated, if plaintiff insisted on performance of the contract. Of course, the rule would be otherwise were although the possession thereof remains in the seller. Bristol Mfg. Corp. v. Arkwright Mills, 213 Mass. 172, 100 N. E. 55. Actual delivery is not always essential to pass title to goods sold; it may pass even though something remains to be done to determine the price to be paid. Scotten v. Sutter, 37 Mich. 526.

In Bement v. Smith, 15 Wend. 493, it is said that there are many cases in which an offer to perform an executory contract is tantamount to performance.

Where the contract is for the sale of a part of a mass or large parcel of goods, or some of a larger number of articles, to be selected by the seller, he cannot recover the purchase price therefor, until he has selected goods or articles complying with the contract and appropriated them thereto, so that the title has vested in the buyer:

—New England Dressed Meat & Wool Co. v. Standard Worsted Co. 165 Mass. 328, 52 Am. St. Rep. 516, 43 N. E. 112, holding that in a sale of a portion of a larger mass, the whole remaining in the possession of the seller with the right and power to make the separation, no title passes entitling him to recover the purchase price until this is done;

—McCormick Harvesting Mach. Co. v. Balfany, 78 Minn. 370, 79 Am. St. Rep. 393, 81 N. W. 10, holding that to be entitled to recover the purchase price, the seller must show the appropriation to the contract of the particular article out of a larger number of similar articles in his possession;

—Rhode v. Thwaites, 6 Barn. & C. 388, 9 Dowl. & R. 293, 5 L. J. K. B. 163, 30 Revised Rep. 363, 3 Phillippa, Ev. 410, holding that the seller of a number of hogsheads of sugar out of a larger quantity was entitled to recover the purchase price where, some time subsequently to the sale, he appropriated to the contract and set apart for the purchaser the quantity of sugar designated, and the purchaser accepted a small portion thereof and agreed to accept the balance, but thereafter refused to do so; the rule being stated that where a man sells part of a large parcel of goods, and it is his option to select the goods for the purchaser, he cannot maintain an action for goods bargained and sold until he has made the selection, but as soon as he appropriates property for the benefit of the purchaser, the property in the article passes to the latter, although the seller is not bound to part with the possession until he has paid the price.

In Boswell v. Kilborn, 8 Jur. N. S. 443, 6 L. T. N. S. 79, 15 Moore, P. C. C. 309, 10 Week. Rep. 517, following the old French law, it is held that under an executory contract for the sale of hops to be gathered, the seller cannot maintain an action for the purchase price where he tendered a quantity of hops in excess of the amount called for by the contract, and offered to permit the purchaser to select therefrom the quantity agreed upon, and the latter refused to accept the hops, and the seller then stored the entire quantity, and at no time prior to bringing suit set apart therefrom the exact quantity called for, unless a more complete delivery was waived by the purchaser. Referring to the English law on this point, it is said that under the English law an action cannot be maintained to recover the purchase price where some further acts are to be performed by the seller in order to identify the thing to be delivered. But see infra, III. a, "Waiver of delivery or tender."

b. Where contract contemplates some act by purchaser.

The courts are not in harmony on the question as to whether the seller can recover the purchase price of articles sold under a contract containing provisions contemplating some further act by the purchaser before acceptance by him, where he refuses to perform on his part.

It has been said that where one party has been prevented by the wrongful act or refusal of the other party from performing a condition precedent or completing his contract, he is entitled to recover as though the contract had been fully performed. Dobbins v. Edmonds, 18 Mo. App. 307, holding that where logs are sold to be delivered on the banks of a stream, there to be measured, scaled, and settled for by the purchaser, if the latter refuses to perform, the seller may have the logs measured and scaled, and may float them to the mill to the purchaser, and tender them to him, and upon the latter's declining to receive them, the seller may recover the purchase price, although most of the logs are lost after tender by reason of a flood.

In Storm v. Rosenthal, 156 App. Div. 544, 141 N. Y. Supp. 339, it is held that where the contract for the sale of a designated quantity of oak flooring of a brand to be specified by the buyer is repudiated by him, and he fails to exercise his op-the countermand treated as a breach of the agreement and recovery of damages only sought. Roehm v. Horst, 178 U. S. 1, 44 L. ed. 953, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 780. But in electing to stand on the contract, instead of treating it as breached, he undertook to perform the terms exacted of the seller, and these were not to be performed until spring, and not until performed was defendant required to pay the purchase price. In other words, nothing was then done to pass title to the buyer, and, in the absence of any proof of delivery as stipulated, or tender or waiver thereof, the seller was not entitled to recover the purchase price. Williams v. Triplett, 3 Iowa, 518, and McCormick Harvesting Mach. Co. v. Markert, 107 Iowa, 340, 78 N. W. 33, are not inconsistent herewith.

The court rightly directed a verdict for defendant, and the judgment is affirmed.

tion to designate the flooring, the seller may exercise such option for him, and may store and hold the property for him and recover the purchase price thereof.

And in Carlson v. Crescent Woodenware & Box Mfg. Co. 20 Idaho, 794, 120 Pac. 460, it is held that the seller of all of a certain kind of timber cut from designated lands was entitled to recover the purchase price of all of such timber that he sawed and delivered at the place designated in the contract, although the contract also provided that the buyer was to scale the logs when delivered, which he refused to do.

In Outwater v. Dodge, 7 Cow. 85, however, it is held that where, by the terms of the contract for the sale of an article, the purchaser is to have the right of inspection, until that right is exercised, nothing but absolute acceptance by the purchaser can be considered a delivery which will vest the property in him.

So, where by the terms of a contract for the sale of ties they are to be delivered at a certain place and there inspected by the buyer, the parties thereto agree upon the purchase price, title does not pass until such inspection, and a delivery of the ties at the place designated does not entitle the seller to recover the value thereof from the buyer, where the latter refuses to inspect or accept the ties. Indiana Tie Co. v. Phelps, — Ky. —, 124 S. W. 833.

In Massman v. Steiger, 79 N. J. L. 442, 75 Atl. 746, it is asserted that the purchase price cannot be recovered by the seller, where it is to be paid by notes of the purchaser, which, as to form and sufficiency of indorsement, are to be passed upon by the seller, and the purchaser refuses to perform.

And see Manning Mfg. Co. v. Miller Bros. — Vt. —, 89 Atl. 479, holding that where machinery was purchased to be installed by the seller upon the premises of the purchaser, the former cannot recover the purchase price in an action of assumpsit, where he has failed to install the machinery, although this failure was due to the conduct of the purchaser. In this case the machinery was shipped to the purchaser, but it did not appear that it was ever removed from the station.

Under a contract for the manufacture of an article according to a model to be furnished by the buyer, where the latter fails to furnish the model, the seller cannot furnish such a model as he believes the buyer would have furnished, and manufac- 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

ture the article according to such model, and upon its completion recover the contract price. Savage Mfg. Co. v. Armstrong, 19 Me. 147.

c. As affected by terms of contract.

1. Necessity of complying with contract.

If the contract stipulates as to the place and manner of delivery, delivery in accordance with such stipulation is sufficient to support an action for the purchase price:

—Harris Mfg. Co. v. Marsh, 49 Iowa, 11, holding that under an agreement to take at a certain price, all the grain delivered to the promisee by a third person, the promisor becomes liable for the purchase price when the grain is delivered to the promisee, and notice thereof given the promisor, providing the promisee retains the grain up to the time of trial;

—Benton v. Bidault, 6 La. Ann. 30, holding that to maintain an action for the purchase price of goods, the seller must show that he tendered delivery thereof at the place, if any, designated in the contract;

—Obery v. Lander, 179 Mass. 125, 60 N. E. 378, holding that the purchase price of shares of stock may be recovered where the seller deposits the same in escrow for the purchaser in accordance with the terms of the contract, although the latter refuses to pay for and receive them;

—Jones v. Schneider, 22 Minn. 279, holding that where the only delivery or tender claimed was not made in accordance with the terms of the contract, although the contract authorized the seller to select the article purchased and appropriate it to the purchaser, nevertheless no action can be maintained for the purchase price;

—Barton v. McKelway, 22 N. J. L. 165, holding that in the sale of a quantity of shrubbery, it is a sufficient delivery to entitle the seller to maintain an action for the purchase price, where the contract required the delivery of the articles purchased at a certain time and place, for the seller to leave the property at such place, since the purchaser, being aware of the time and place fixed for delivery, was under the duty of being there, either in person or by agent, to receive the articles when tendered. He could not avoid his contract by absenting himself on that occasion, so that no tender could be made to him personally.

B. Delivery to carrier.

While not pointed out in any of the cases considering the point, there is a distinction between the application of the general rule that in the ordinary contract of sale contemplating a shipment of goods by carrier, delivery to the carrier will be regarded as delivery to the buyer, and the rule that a delivery to the carrier is a sufficient appropriation of the goods to the buyer to entitle the seller to recover the purchase price, where the buyer repudiates the contract. For the first rule mentioned is based upon the ground that delivery to the carrier, under the ordinary contract of sale contemplating shipment by the carrier, prima facie at least, passes title to the buyer, unless title is expressly reserved by the seller. It is not necessary that the courts go to this extent, however, in order to hold that delivery to the carrier of goods sold by executory contract constitutes such an appropriation of the goods to the buyer as to entitle the seller to recover the purchase price, where the former wrongfully repudiates his contract of purchase. Under a case of the latter character, although the actual tender of the goods, in the absence of a repudiation of the contract by the buyer, might be held to be necessary to entitle the seller to recover the purchase price, yet the fact of repudiation, at least while the goods were in transit, would generally be a sufficient appropriation of the goods to the contract to entitle the seller to recover the purchase price. See, on this question, "Waiver of delivery or tender," III. e.

While the following cases do not specifically point out the distinction mentioned, they nevertheless hold where the seller of goods by executory contract delivers goods complying with the terms of the contract to a carrier for shipment, in accordance with the express or implied terms of the contract, that this constitutes a sufficient appropriation of the goods to the contract to entitle the seller to recover the purchase price, where, after delivery to the carrier, the buyer repudiates the contract.

Where, from extrinsic facts or the express provisions of the contract, it appears that a shipment of the goods by the seller to the buyer is contemplated, delivery to a carrier for transportation to the buyer is generally a sufficient delivery to support an action for the purchase price, although, as subsequently shown, the cases are not in harmony as to whether or not such a delivery is sufficient where the contract of sale is executory, and before such delivery it is repudiated by the buyer:

—St. Louis Hay & Grain Co. v. American Cast Iron Pipe Co. 167 Ala. 442, 52 So. 904, holding that where property purchased upon an executory contract is delivered to a carrier for shipment to the purchaser before the latter undertakes to repudiate the contract, an action may be maintained to recover the purchase price, although the 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

purchaser refuses to accept and pay for the property;

—Castlen v. Marshburn, 8 Ga. App. 400, 69 S. E. 317, holding that where, before the purchaser of goods repudiates the contract, the seller delivers them to a carrier for shipment to the purchaser, such delivery passes title and entitles the seller to maintain an action for the purchase price, although the purchaser refuses to accept the goods from the carrier, and the latter sells the same in foreclosure of its lien;

—Martyn v. Westerd P. R. Co. 21 Cal. App. 589, 132 Pac. 602, holding where an order for goods is accepted and the goods shipped by carrier to the purchaser, that the latter cannot, by revoking the order, preclude the seller from recovering the purchase price, although the purchaser never received the goods;

—Pittsburgh & I. Coal Co. v. Hostler Coal & Coke Co. 147 Ill. App. 387, holding that the contract price for coal may be recovered by the seller where the coal was delivered to a common carrier to be forwarded to the purchaser;

—Loftus v. Riley, 83 Iowa, 503, 50 N. W. 17, sustaining the right to recover the purchase price of property delivered to a carrier for shipment to the purchaser, although the latter refused to accept it;

—Barrie v. Quinby, 206 Mass. 259, 92 N. E. 451, holding that where sets of books to be manufactured are to be delivered to a carrier for transportation, delivering them to the carrier will pass the title, and a refusal of the purchaser to give notes for the purchase price according to the terms of the contract will entitle the seller to sue for the price of each instalment, or hold them until the time of full performance has expired and then sue for the whole amount;

—Meagher v. Cowing, 149 Mich. 416, 112 N. W. 1074, holding that title passes by delivery to a carrier, where the purchaser afterward refuses to accept the property, and the seller may treat the contract as completed and sell the property for and in behalf of the former;

—Pacific Iron Works v. Long Island R. Co. 62 N. Y. 274, holding that where, by a contract of sale, the goods are to be shipped by steamer, and are to be delivered on board the steamer free of charge the purchase price may be recovered when such delivery is made, although the purchaser refuses to receive the goods;

—Fountain City Drill Co. v. Peterson, 126 Wis. 512, 106 N. W. 17, holding where the seller performs an executory contract for the sale of chattels by delivering them at the place, and in the manner, specified in the contract, that he is entitled to recover the stipulated price (delivery through common carrier).

The rule that when delivery is made to a common carrier according to the stipulations of the contract of sale, the carrier is thereby made the agent of the buyer, and such delivery implies an acceptance, and is prima facie sufficient to pass title, and enable the seller to maintain an action for goods sold and delivered, amounts only to prima facie evidence, and does not apply where delivery is not according to contract, as where it is premature. Arons v. Cummings, 107 Me. 19, 31 L.R.A.(N.S.) 942, 78 Atl. 98.

In Home Pattern Co. v. W. W. Mertz Co. 86 Conn. 494, 86 Atl. 19, it is held that under a contract to manufacture patterns to be shipped to the purchaser when completed, the seller may ship the goods according to contract and recover the price, since the title thereby passes to the purchaser, although the latter, prior to the shipment, gave notice to the seller of his repudiation of the contract. The court said that a repudiation of the contract without the acquiescence of the seller did not put an end to it; the seller might still treat it as subsisting notwithstanding notice of repudiation, and assume that the purchaser would perform his part when the time for performance arrived. For there can be no anticipatory breach of a contract by one party without the acquiescence of the other; a breach by one party alone can occur only after the time for performance has arrived. Hence, the repudiation is not a breach of the contract, and the seller, having declined to acquiesce therein, is bound to tender performance when the time for delivery arrives. And delivery to the carrier, as designated in the contract, is a delivery to the purchaser, and the title passes to him. This decision apparently is based upon the sales of goods act.

But it has been held that where a purchaser of goods by executory contract countermands his order before the goods have been set apart or shipped to him, the repudiation of the contract or the direction not to ship is a revocation of the carrier's agency to receive for the purchaser, and a subsequent delivery of the goods to the carrier by the seller is therefore unauthorized, and does not constitute a delivery to the purchaser. Unexcelled Fire-Works Co. v. Polites, 130 Pa. 536, 17 Am. St. Rep. 788, 18 Atl. 1058.

d. Where contract does not require delivery.

The contract price for articles to be manufactured may be recovered without making a delivery thereof, where the contract is silent as to delivery. In such case it is sufficient if the seller notifies the purchaser of the completion of the article, and requests him to settle for and remove the same. E. W. Bliss Co. v. United States Incandescent Gaslight Co. 149 N. Y. 300, 43 N. E. 859.

So, where, by the terms of a contract of sale, the purchaser is to settle for and remove property to be manufactured for him, when it is completed, no tender of delivery by the seller is necessary to entitle him to recover the purchase price, where the purchaser fails or refuses to remove the property within a reasonable time after its completion and notice to him thereof: 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

—Barrie v. Quinby, 206 Mass. 259, 92 N. E. 451, stating the rule that if the purchaser of sets of books to be manufactured was to have taken the sets as manufactured, at the seller's place of business, an appropriation by setting them apart as the buyer's goods would have passed the title, and a refusal to give notes for the purchase price according to the contract would have permitted the seller to sue for the price of each instalment, or, when the time for full performance had expired, to sue for the full amount;

—Crookshank v. Burrell, 18 Johns. 58, 9 Am. Dec. 187; Muckey v. Howenstine, 3 Thomp. & C. 28, holding, that a tender or delivery is not necessary where, by the terms of a contract for the manufacture of articles, upon completion, the purchaser is to remove the same;

—Ballentine v. Robinson, 46 Pa. 177, holding that a contract for the sale of a machine to be manufactured, and removed by the purchaser, vested the property in the purchaser when it was completed and notice of completion given him, and upon his failure to remove and settle for it, the seller was entitled to recover the purchase price.

And tender is unnecessary to entitle the seller to maintain an action for the purchase price where, by the terms of the contract, the purchaser agrees to tender a certain sum of money on or by a designated day, and if he fails to do so, to accept the property at a designated price. Prest v. Cole, 183 Mass. 283, 67 N. E. 246 (shares of stock).

And see Dunlop v. Grote, 2 Car. & K. 158, holding that where, by the terms of a contract for the sale of a quantity of iron, the purchaser agreed to pay therefor on a certain day, if prior thereto he had not required the seller to deliver the same, after the expiration of the agreed time the latter is entitled to recover the purchase price, although the purchaser has not asked for a delivery of the property.

e. Waiver of delivery or tender.

The cases are not agreed whether the purchaser, by unlawfully repudiating a contract to purchase, thereby relieves the seller from the necessity of delivering or tendering the property to him. If the buyer has clearly, unequivocally, and wrongfully repudiated the contract and notified the seller thereof, and of his intention to refuse to receive the goods or articles purchased if tendered to him, it would seem that no tender or offer to deliver or attempted delivery should be required from the seller as a condition to recovering the purchase price, provided he clearly and unequivocally appropriates the property to the contract, and thereafter holds it for the purchaser. And this is especially true where, to make a tender, the seller would be obliged to have the property transported a considerable distance by a carrier.

In New York it is held that a tender is unnecessary where the purchaser wrongfully repudiates his contract to purchase prior thereto:

—Stokes v. Mackay, 147 N. Y. 223, 41 N. E. 496, holding that a tender is not necessary to entitle the seller to recover the purchase price, where, before the tender is made, the purchaser repudiates the contract and refuses to perform on his part (sales of shares of stock);

—Gourd v. Healy, 206 N. Y. 423, 99 N. E. 1099, in which case the purchaser wrongfully repudiated the contract to purchase a quantity of wine before the wine had been separated from a larger quantity, and the court said that his conduct in this regard was such as to relieve the seller from the duty of segregating the purchaser's wine, even if segregation was necessary to pass title thereto;

—Lackawanna Mills v. Weil, 21 App. Div. 492, 47 N. Y. Supp. 585, affirmed in 162 N. Y. 642, 57 N. E. 1114, holding that where goods are to be manufactured and furnished the purchaser in instalments, if he, after having accepted several instalments, refuses to accept subsequent instalments, such refusal renders it unnecessary for the seller to make a tender of further instalments as a condition to recovering the purchase price of all the articles sold;

—Weil v. Unique Electric Device Co. 39 Misc. 527, 80 N. Y. Supp. 484, holding that where the purchaser of goods, upon receiving a portion of them, notifies the seller that he will not accept the balance, if this refusal on his part is wrongful, the seller may recover the purchase price without making a tender of the balance of the goods;

—Lekas v. Schwartz, 56 Misc. 594, 107 N. Y. Supp. 145, stating the rule that where an executory contract for the sale of an article is repudiated by the purchaser before delivery, a tender or delivery by the seller is not necessary to entitle him to recover the purchase price.

In Keppert v. Aultman, M. & Co. 25 Tex. Civ. App. 495, 61 S. W. 410, the court said that if the purchase price may be recovered at all, in order to entitle the seller of a machine to maintain an action for the purchase price, tender of the property must be made, although the buyer has repudiated the contract.

In Stewart v. Scott, 54 Ark. 187, 15 S. W. 463, on the ground that the seller of articles under an executory contract did not make a tender after the purchaser refused to receive the property, it was held that the former's remedy was to recover for the damages sustained from the breach of the contract, and that he could not recover the purchase price.

And see PATE v. RALSTON, holding that the fact that the buyer countermanded the order given by him for fruit trees, and gave notice that he would refuse to receive the trees, and that the shipping thereof would be at the seller's risk, did not obviate the necessity of delivery at the time stipulated, if the seller insisted on performance of the contract. In this case, however, it does not appear that the seller in any manner, clearly and unequivocally, appropriated the property to the contract.

In Fairbanks, M. & Co. v. Heltsley, 135 Ky. 397, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 248, 122 S. W. 198, the right was denied the seller to recover the purchase price of a gasoline engine sold under a contract to make the same and deliver it on board cars at a designated place, where, before the engine had been shipped or before it had been seen, tendered, or delivered to the purchaser, he notified the seller that he would not take it, and at the time of the suit the engine remained at the seller's factory. The court said that the property was the seller's and was subject to its control, it having in no manner relinquished its control thereof, and that, in such a state of the case, an action for the price could not be maintained.

The foregoing case is not necessarily inconsistent with the New York doctrine, since in the Fairbanks Case, the seller had not so unequivocally appropriated the property to the buyer as, constructively at least, to transfer the title to him.

In Webber v. Minor, 6 Bush, 463, 99 Am. Dec. 688, where the purchaser of a quantity of wood refused to receive it, the seller was denied the right to recover the purchase price on the ground that he had not sufficiently appropriated the wood to the contract. The court points out that, although the evidence tends to show the seller's readiness and offer to deliver the wood, and the refusal of the purchaser to receive it, these facts do not, actually or constructively, constitute a complete performance of the contract. For, conceding that a substantial compliance did not require the seller to leave the wood upon the premises of the buyer against the will of the latter, nevertheless the seller should have set it apart for the buyer, and relinquished his own control of it at, or as near to, the place of delivery as was reasonably practicable. This, the court says, would have been a constructive delivery, not merely an offer or tender of delivery.

IV. Refusal of buyer to accept property when tendered.

a. In general.

Many of the foregoing cases, inferentially at least, hold the effect of a delivery or attempted delivery, where the property is appropriated to the contract, is to entitle the seller to recover the purchase price, although the buyer refuses to receive the property. It has been asserted, however, that an action for the purchase price of an article to be made by the seller cannot be maintained until the article has been appropriated to the purchaser, and he has assented to the appropriation. Atkinson v. Bell, 8 Barn. & C. 277, 6 L. J. K. B. 258, 2 Mann. & R. 292.

But where the matter of selection rests with the seller, this is not the rule, although, as will subsequently appear, according to some cases such selection or appropriation cannot be made after the purchaser has repudiated the contract. (As to the general rule as to the necessity of acceptance by the purchaser to pass title to him to an article to be produced or manufactured, see note in 50 L.R.A.(N.S.) 111.)

And by the weight of authority, however, it is held that where the purchaser of goods by executory contract refuses to accept goods which comply with the contract, where tendered to him according to the terms thereof, the seller may treat the goods as the property of the purchaser, retain them in some safe and convenient place for him, and sue and recover the purchase price:

—Kinkead v. Lynch, 132 Fed. 692, stating the rule that where a purchaser wrongfully refuses to accept property which he had ordered under an executory contract of sale, the seller may avail himself of either of three remedies, one of which entitles him to retain the property for the purchaser and recover the purchase price;

—Cuthill v. Peabody, 19 Cal. App. 304, 125 Pac. 926, stating the rule that where the sale of shares of stock is completed, and title to the property, in contemplation of law, has passed to the buyer by reason of a tender thereof duly indorsed to him, the seller may recover the purchase price;

—Leeper v. Schroeder, 24 Colo. App. 164, 132 Pac. 701, stating the rule that upon breach by the purchaser of his executory contract to purchase property, by refusing to receive and pay for the same upon tender or delivery by the seller, in case title has not passed, he may store the goods for the purchaser, giving notice thereof, and thereupon sue and recover the full contract price (action to recover difference between contract price and amount received on resale);

—Commercial Register Co. v. Drew, 168 Ill. App. 347, asserting the rule that if there has been no actual delivery of personal property, the seller, who has offered performance on his part, may consider the property as the purchaser's, and may either sell it and sue for the unpaid balance of the purchase price, or he may hold it subject to the call or order of the purchaser, and recover the purchase price;

—Olson v. Wabash Coal Co. 126 Ill. App. 253 (rule stated);

—Dill v. Mumford, 19 Ind. App. 609, 49 N. E. 861, holding that where grain is purchased to be shipped to the buyer, and shipment is made according to the agreement, and all that remains to complete the contract is acceptance by the buyer and payment of the purchase money, the contract becomes so far executed that, if the buyer refuses to accept the grain, the seller may treat it as the former's property and maintain an action against him for the purchase price;

taining the right of the seller to recover the purchase price of mills, where he tendered a portion of the mills purchased, and the purchaser refused to receive them, and the former then stored them for the benefit of the latter. The court said that under these circumstances a tender of all the machines was not necessary;

—Cook v. Brandeis, 3 Met. (Ky.) 555; Webber v. Minor, 6 Bush, 463, 99 Am. Dec. 688; Bell v. Offutt, 10 Bush, 639, stating the rule that where a purchaser refuses to receive the thing bargained for, the seller may consider it as the property of the purchaser subject to his call or order, and recover the full purchase price. And in Zinsmeister v. Rock Island Canning Co. 145 Ky. 25, 139 S. W. 1068, this general rule is asserted as applicable to executory contracts of sale. In Webber v. Minor, 6 Bush, 463, 99 Am. Dec. 688, while the general rule is recognized, the right of the seller to recover the purchase price in that case is denied, on the ground that the seller did not set apart the article sold to the buyer, or relinquish his control over it at or as near the place of delivery as was reasonably practicable; —American Cotton Co. v. Herring, 84 Miss. 693, 37 So. 117 (rule stated);

—Riley v. Stevenson, 118 Mo. App. 187, 94 S. W. 781, holding that an offer to deliver property purchased, on the purchaser's refusal to accept the same, entitles the seller to recover the purchase price (sale of telephone and stock in telephone company);

—Crown Vinegar & Spice Co. v. Wehrs, 59 Mo. App. 493, holding that the seller of a quantity of vinegar from a larger quantity is entitled to recover the purchase price where he subsequently drew off and set apart for the purchaser the quantity purchased, but the latter refused to receive it. To the same effect is Campbell v. Woods, 122 Mo. App. 719, 99 S. W. 468;

—Ozark Lumber Co. v. Chicago Lumber Co. 51 Mo. App. 555, stating the rule that if the seller tenders the goods contracted for to the purchaser at the time and place agreed upon, then, although the latter may refuse to receive and pay for the goods, the seller may nevertheless store them for him at the place of delivery, or may hold them for his use, and recover the contract price;

—Lincoln Shoe Mfg. Co. v. Sheldon, 44 Neb. 279, 62 N. W. 480 (sale of shares of stock or subscription to shares of stock), disapproved in Funke v. Allen, 54 Neb. 407, 69 Am. St. Rep. 716, 74 N. W. 832;

—Ackerman v. Rubens, 167 N. Y. 405, 53 L.R.A. 867, 82 Am. St. Rep. 728, 60 N. E. 750, stating the rule that when a purchaser of personal property under an executory contract of sale refuses to complete his purchase, the seller may keep the article for him and sue for the entire purchase price;

—Van Brocklen v. Smeallie, 140 N. Y. 70, 35 N. E. 415, stating the general rule as applicable to executory contracts of sale;

—Mason v. Decker, 72 N. Y. 595, 28 Am. Rep. 190, holding that where, by the terms of the contract, the seller agrees to sell and the purchaser to buy shares of stock, the seller is entitled to recover the purchase price where he tenders performance on his part and demands payment, although the purchaser refuses to perform; his remedy being based upon the theory that title to the property, by the contract and tender, and assent of the seller, has become vested in the buyer;

—Hayden v. Demets, 53 N. Y. 426, holding that a tender of warehouse receipts for copper sold by executory contract entitled the seller to recover the purchase price, where the purchaser refused to receive the copper and the seller retained it for him. In this case the contract was for the sale of a part of a larger quantity of copper, and it was said that no title passed at the time of the execution of the contract, and not until the amount sold had been designated and set apart for the purchaser. The court said that the storing of the property in effect gave the purchaser the title, but not the right to possession until the purchase price was paid. And the rule is asserted that upon a valid sale of specific chattels, when nothing remains to be done by the vendor except delivery, whether contingent upon demand or not, the right of property passes to the purchaser, and the same consequences as to title result as where a valid tender is made under an executory contract of sale;

—Dustan v. McAndrew, 44 N. Y. 72, stating the general rule that, as one remedy for the failure of the purchaser to accept property sold by executory contract, the seller may store or retain the property for the purchaser, and recover the purchase price;

—Merriam v. Kellogg, 58 Barb. 445, holding that under a contract for the sale of shares of stock, where the seller tenders the stock and the purchaser refuses to receive it, the former may sue for the purchase price, treating the property as belonging to the latter;

—Munn v. Barnum, 24 Barb. 283, holding that the purchase price of shares of stock may be recovered where a tender thereof is made to the buyer, with a power of attorney to transfer the same indorsed upon the certificates, where he refuses the tender, but makes no objection as to the sufficiency thereof;

—Heilbrunn v. Weislow, 129 App. Div. 532, 114 N. Y. Supp. 50, holding that where the purchaser of goods refuses to pay for them when they are tendered to him according to the terms of the contract, the seller may retain the goods and recover the purchase price;

—Cowan v. DeHart, 84 N. Y. Supp. 576, holding that the seller of shares of stock, upon the purchaser refusing to accept the same, may retain the property for him and recover the purchase price;

—Mackie v. Fgan, 6 Misc. 95, 26 N. Y. Supp. 13, holding that under a contract for the sale of a large quantity of palms to be shipped from Florida to New York, a tender of delivery is sufficient to entitle the seller to maintain an action for goods sold and delivered;

—Daniels v. Morris, 65 Or. 298, 132 Pac. 958, affirming on rehearing 65 Or. 289, 130 Pac. 397, stating the rule that when the buyer refuses to take and pay for property offered by the seller in performance of an executory contract of sale, the latter may keep the property on hand subject to the order of the buyer, after making a tender thereof, and may maintain an action for the purchase price (sale of hops);

—Mayberry v. Lilly Mill Co. 112 Tenn. 564, 85 S. W. 401, holding that, although a contract for the sale of a quantity of corn was executory in the beginning, it became absolute and executed when the corn was measured, stacked, set apart, and delivered at the purchaser's mill, and there tendered to him, and upon his refusal to accept the same, the seller was entitled to retain the corn as the property of the purchaser and recover from him the purchase price;

—Leventhal v. Hollamon, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 165 S. W. 6, sustaining the right to recover the purchase price of a car of melons to be shipped to the purchaser, where he refused to accept them on the groundless claim that they did not comply with the contract;

—Avant v. Watson, 57 Tex. Civ. App. 304, 122 S. W. 586, stating the rule that where a purchaser refuses to receive personal property contracted for, the seller may hold the property for him and sue for the contract price, the contract under consideration in this case being a sale of a designated number of cattle out of certain specified brands. And see Weathered v. Golden, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 34 S. W. 761, holding that where cattle not specifically described, and forming a part of a larger herd, are sold by executory contract, and the purchaser refuses to receive and pay for them according to the terms of the contract, and the seller holds the cattle for him, they are at the risk of the purchaser.

It has been denied, however, that the purchaser of personal property by executory contract may be held for the purchase price where he refuses to receive the property when tendered to him by the seller in accordance with the requirements of the contract;

—Star Brewery Co. v. Horst, 58 C. C. A. 362, 120 Fed. 246, holding that under an agreement for the sale of a crop thereafter to be grown, the parties must mutually agree to an appropriation to the contract of the crop grown, and that hence the seller could not tender a crop to the purchaser and, upon his refusal to receive it, recover from him the purchase price;

—Atwood v. Lucas, 53 Me. 508, 89 Am. Dec. 713, holding that where title does not pass and the seller retains possession of the property sold, an action cannot be maintained to recover the purchase price, but the action must be to recover damages for a breach of the contract. It is, however, said that if the purchaser of goods refuses to accept and pay for them, the owner may resell them for the most he can get, and charge the first purchaser with the difference in the contract price and the price actually obtained;

—Greenleaf v. Gallagher, 93 Me. 549, 74 Am. St. Rep. 371, 45 Atl. 829, denying the right to maintain assumpsit for goods sold and delivered, to recover the purchase price of a book subscribed for by the defendant, which when completed was tendered to him, and which he refused to accept. It is said that actual delivery and acceptance must appear, and tender and refusal will not do. The test of the right of a seller to maintain an action in this form for the purchase price is said to be: "Where the vendee may not maintain trover against the vendor for the goods, he should not have an action for the price as goods sold and delivered, but damages only for the breach of the contract of bargain and sale;"

—Greenleaf v. Hamilton, 94 Me. 118, 48 Atl. 798, holding that, in order to maintain an action for goods sold and delivered, proof not only of an actual delivery, but of acceptance of the goods by the purchaser, is essential, and that where the seller left the property purchased, a set of books, at the buyer's place of business in his absence, under all the circumstances, the question whether this constituted a delivery was one for the jury;

—Newport & S. Valley R. Co. v. Seager, 19 Pa. Co. Ct. 465, holding that upon the refusal of the purchaser to accept bonds purchased by executory contract, the seller cannot recover the purchase price;

—Jones v. Jennings Bros. & Co. 168 Pa. 493, 32 Atl. 51, holding that a contract for the sale of a designated quantity of steel scrap was executory, and hence the seller, upon tender thereof to the purchaser and refusal of the latter to receive the same, was entitled to recover only the difference between the market value of the property and the contract price;

—American Hide & Leather Co. v. Chalkley, 101 Va. 458, 44 S. E. 705, stating the rule that where a contract of sale is executory, and title and possession still remain in the seller, his remedy against the buyer, who wrongfully refuses to accept and pay for the goods, is an action of assumpsit on a special count to recover damages for the breach of contract and the seller cannot maintain an action for the agreed price, as he could had the title passed, but he must sue for indemnity for the loss of his bargain.

b. Where article is manufactured for the buyer.

In some jurisdictions the foregoing doctrine declaring the right of the seller of an article by executory contract, upon the refusal of the purchaser to accept the same when properly tendered, if the property meets the requirements of the contract, to treat the title thereto as having passed to the purchaser, and to hold it for him and recover the purchase price, is limited to cases where some specific article has been manufactured, produced, or procured for the purchaser, and where it has not an easily ascertained market value. And in view of these decisions, the cases have been classified with reference to the question whether the article was to be manufactured or procured for the purchaser, although a majority of the cases sustaining the right to recover assert the right as a general proposition, without limiting it to cases where the article has been manufactured, produced, or procured especially for the purchaser. In fact in the majority of the cases the article manufactured for the purchaser was an ordinary article having a fairly certain market value:

—Morris v. Cuthbert, 157 Ill. App. 175, holding that where a boat is manufactured according to contract, if the purchaser, upon tender thereof by the seller, refuses to accept it, the latter may nevertheless recover the purchase price;

—Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Heck, 50 Ind. 303, 19 Am. Rep. 713, holding that in all cases of contracts for the sale of personal property, where it has no market value, the seller, before he can recover of the purchaser the contract price, must have delivered the property or done such act as vested the title in the purchaser, or would have vested the title in him had he consented to accept it; and the same doctrine is asserted in Rastetter v. Reynolds, 160 Ind. 133, 66 N. E. 612, in sustaining the right of a seller of strips to be sawed, to recover the purchase price, where the purchaser refused to accept the same;

—Akers v. Central Kentucky Lunatic Asylum, 10 Ky. L. Rep. 817, holding that under a contract to manufacture and deliver a quantity of brick, the seller may tender the brick to the purchaser, and, upon the latter's refusal to receive the same, may set them apart for him at some reasonably safe place as near the place of delivery as can be, and may then maintain an action for the purchase price;

—McIntyre v. Kline, 30 Miss. 361, 64 Am. Dec. 163, holding that the seller of articles to be manufactured according to certain specifications, upon completion of the article, may entitle himself to recover the purchase price by delivering the article according to the contract, or preparing it for delivery and setting it apart for the purchaser;

—Black River Lumber Co. v. Warner, 93 Mo. 374, 6 S. W. 210, holding that where the seller of a specific article to be manufactured tenders the completed article to the purchaser, and in every way fully performs the contract on his part, if the purchaser refuses to accept the article, the seller may recover the purchase price, he holding the article as the property of the purchaser;

—Walker v. Nixon, 65 Mo. App. 326 (suit of clothes);

—Stumpf v. Mueller, 17 Mo. App. 283, holding that where the seller fails to deliver articles manufactured to the purchaser, such failure does not preclude him from recovering the contract price where the purchaser refuses to pay for or accept the article;

—Gordon v. Morris, 49 N. H. 382, recognizing the rule that where some specific article is made expressly for a person, and the article is not readily marketable, the purchase price thereof may be recovered although the purchaser refuses to receive it;

—Moore v. Potter, 155 N. Y. 481, 63 Am. St. Rep. 692, 50 N. E. 271; Donnell v. Hearn, 12 Daly, 230;

—Bement v. Smith, 15 Wend. 493, holding that where the purchaser fails to receive and pay for an article manufactured expressly for him, the seller is entitled to recover the purchase price;

—Mersereau v. L. K. Hirsch Co. 136 App. Div. 271, 121 N. Y. Supp. 11, affirmed without opinion in 204 N. Y. 564, 97 N. E. 1109; Wolfshelm v. Ammann Mfg. & Constr. Co. 110 N. Y. Supp. 943; Hass v. Pettin-gill, 29 Misc. 318, 60 N. Y. Supp. 495; Kaufman v. Canary, 21 Misc. 302, 47 N. Y. Supp. 152;

—Nicholson v. Paston, 33 N. Y. S. R. 496, 11 N. Y. Supp. 567, holding that the seller of a suit of clothes to be manufactured may recover the purchase price thereof upon the failure or refusal of the purchaser to receive the same. To the same effect are Walker v. Nixon, supra; Silver v. Connolly, 12 N. Y. S. R. 616;

—Marshall v. Macon County Sav. Bank, 108 N. C. 639, 13 S. E. 182, holding that in an action for damages for breach of contract to purchase a ledger, index, check book, and other stationary to be specially manufactured for the purchaser, which were worthless to anyone else, the contract price is the proper measure of damages, if the property is in fact worthless in the hands of the seller and the purchaser refused to receive it;

—Shawhan v. VanNest, 25 Ohio St. 490, 18 Am. Rep. 313, holding the seller entitled to recover the purchase price of a carriage manufactured upon a special order of the purchaser, where he tendered the completed article to the purchaser and the latter refused to accept it;

—Smith v. Wheeler, 7 Or. 49, 33 Am. Rep. 698, sustaining the right of the seller to recover the purchase price of an engine manufactured for the purchaser, where, after completion, the purchaser breached his contract and refused to receive and pay for it;

—Trenton Rubber Co. v. Small, 3 Pa. Super. Ct. 8;

—Gammage v. Alexander, 14 Tex. 414, holding that where property was manufactured in accordance with a contract for its sale, and it has been delivered or appropriated to the purchaser, or he has accepted or refused it, an action can be maintained for the purchase price;

—Victor Safe & Lock Co. v. O'Neil, 48 Wash. 176, 93 Pac. 214;

—Fox v. Utter, 6 Wash. 299, 33 Pac. 354, holding that the tender of an article to be manufactured, when completed, if it conformed to the contract, was sufficient to entitle the seller to maintain an action for the purchase price, although there was no acceptance by the purchaser;

—Moore v. Perrott, 2 Wash. 1, 25 Pac. 906, holding the seller entitled to recover the purchase price of a boat constructed under a contract, although the purchaser refused to receive or pay for it;

—In Elliott v. Pybus, 10 Bing. 512, 4 Moore & S. 389, 3 L. J. C. P. N. S. 182, referring to Atkinson v. Bell, 8 Barn. & C. 277, 2 Mann. & R. 292, 6 L. J. K. B. 258, and Mucklow v. Mangles, 1 Taunt. 318, 9 Revised Rep. 784, and pointing out that in these cases which deny the right of the seller of goods to recover the purchase price where the purchaser refused to receive the goods, there was no agreement between the parties as to the price to be paid for the articles, and, since the purchase price was undetermined, title did not pass upon tender of delivery. And it is further pointed out that in the case under consideration, being the sale of a machine to be manufactured, the price was agreed upon, and the machine was tendered the purchaser, but the latter at that time refused to accept it on the ground that he was unable to furnish the money, and he never accepted the property. This transaction was held to be a sufficient delivery and acceptance to sustain an action for the purchase price.

In a few jurisdictions it is held that the seller of property to be manufactured is not entitled to recover the purchase price where the purchaser refuses to accept the goods, although they were made in accordance with the terms of the contract. These decisions rest upon the ground that the purchaser's assent to the appropriation of the goods to the contract is essential to passing the title thereto, and hence is essential to the recovery of the purchase price:

—River Spinning Co. v. Atlantic Mills, 155 Fed. 466, holding that where the goods are of a marketable character, an action for the contract price cannot be maintained, even where the goods are manufactured according to the contract, in the absence of the purchaser's consent to the appropriation to his contract of the particular goods;

—Grier v. Simpson, 8 Houst. (Del.) 7, 31 Atl. 587, holding that where there is a contract to make and deliver an article, the purchaser cannot be sued for the price unless he accepts it, that is, receives and appropriates it as his own. In this case, however, the article was sold on approval, and the claim was made that it did not work satisfactorily, and hence the purchaser refused to accept it;

—Moody v. Brown, 34 Me. 107, 56 Am. Dec. 640, holding that although the buyer contracts for an article to be made for him, title thereto does not pass upon tender of the article to him by the seller upon its completion, where he refuses to accept it, since, for the title to pass, there must be proof of acceptance, or of acts or words respecting the property from which the acceptance of it may be inferred;

—Tufts v. Grewer, 83 Me. 407, 22 Atl. 382, holding where a soda water fountain is manufactured especially for a person and upon completion is tendered to him, that nevertheless the contract price cannot be recovered, where he refuses to receive the article. This decision is based upon the rule obtaining in Maine that a tender of personal property by the seller to the buyer does not transfer the title to the latter;

—Maine Farmer Pub. Co. v. Rowe, 108 Me. 194, 79 Atl. 471, holding that an offer of books to the defendant and his refusal to accept them, where the books were printed under a contract with him, will not entitle the seller to recover the purchase price, and the remedy in such case is an action for damages for the refusal of the purchaser to accept the property when tendered;

—Thomas D. Murphy Co. v. Exchange Nat. Bank, 76 Neb. 573, 107 N. W. 845, holding that where a contract to purchase goods to be manufactured was repudiated by the purchaser a few days after its execution, the seller cannot, upon arrival of the day fixed for delivery, tender a delivery of the articles and recover the purchase price. It does not appear whether or not the articles had been manufactured at the time the order for them was countermanded.

V. Repudiation of contract by buyer before tender or appropriation.

a. In general.

In some jurisdictions the rule prevails that where one party to a contract gives notice before the time of performance arrives that he does not intend to perform, the other party may treat such notice as a breach and bring his action, or he may decline to accept the notice as a breach and insist that the contract shall continue in force up to the time fixed for its final performance, holding the party refusing to perform responsible for the consequences of such refusal. And it is said that one party to a contract cannot, by simply refusing to carry out his part of it, compel the other party to rescind it. The latter has the right to keep it alive notwithstanding such refusal. John A. Roebing's Sons' Co. v. Lock Stitch Fence Co. 130 Ill. 660, 22 N. E. 518.

In Ridgley v. Mooney, 16 Ind. App. 362, 45 N. E. 348, the court says that although a contract of sale is executory at the time of its execution, it may subsequently become so far executed that the title to the property passes to the purchaser, although possession is still retained by the seller; and this is true although the contract is repudiated by the purchaser before the property is tendered to him.

But see Danforth v. Walker, 37 Vt. 239, asserting the rule that where a contract of sale is executory, the purchaser has the power to stop performance by the seller by an explicit direction to that effect, thereby subjecting himself to such damages as will compensate the other party for being stopped in the performance on his part at that particular point or stage in the execution of the contract. To the same effect are Collins v. Delaporte, 115 Mass. 159; Wigent v. Marra, 130 Mich. 609, 90 N. W. 423; Lincoln v. Charles Alshuler Mfg. Co. 142 Wis. 475, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) 780, 125 N. W. 908; Badger State Lumber Co. v. G. W. Jones Lumber Co. 140 Wis. 73, 121 N. W. 933.

The soundness of the doctrine stated in the foregoing case, as a general or abstract proposition, is unquestionable. By the weight of authority, however, it is not applicable where the circumstances and the condition of the property are such that the seller may complete performance merely by appropriating the goods sold to the contract.

Massachusetts cases.

In Barrie v. Quinby, 206 Mass. 259, 92 N. E. 451, the rule is asserted that the purchaser of property has an unqualified right to abandon the contract at any stage of performance, and the seller, even if not in default, cannot insist upon proceeding under it by tendering the property, which the purchaser not only might be unable to dispose of, but did not want, and thereby compel him to pay the contract price for goods sold and delivered. This doctrine was asserted in denying the right of the seller of sets of books to be printed, to tender the books and recover the purchase price, where, after the books had been completed, but before the delivery thereof had been tendered, the purchaser repudiated the contract. It is pointed out that, although not specified in the contract, the parties mutually understood delivery was to be at the purchaser's place of business, where the sale would be completed. In this case a tender of a portion of the books was made, but not of the whole. But no point is apparently made of a failure to tender the balance, the court apparently distinguishing between a case where, under the contract, an article to be manufactured is to be received by the purchaser at the place of manufacture or to be delivered to him by the aid of a carrier. In the latter class of cases, it is said that the appropriation of the goods to the contract, or the delivery to a carrier for transportation, would pass title and entitle the seller to recover the purchase price. In this connection it is of interest to observe that in Bristol Mfg. Corp. v. Arkwright Mills, the goods were also to be delivered by the aid of a carrier, and while the contract was apparently repudiated before delivery, and the purchaser was held liable for the purchase price, it is, however, pointed out that nothing re-maintained to be done by the seller under the contract except to appropriate the goods thereto.

On this point the rule in Massachusetts is involved in considerable doubt and it is not clear to just what extent is sustained the seller's right to recover the purchase price, where the buyer repudiates his contract of purchase.

In Mitchell v. LeClair, 165 Mass. 308, 43 N. E. 117, where, upon accepting by telegram an offer to sell a quantity of butter out of a larger mass, the seller weighed, set apart, and marked the butter for the purpose of designating it as the buyer's property, and at once sent him a bill for it marked "Cash on demand," and where a portion of the butter had been delivered and accepted, but, owing to a dispute as to the terms of payment, the seller had refused to deliver the balance, the seller was held entitled to recover the purchase price, on the ground that the buyer, on accepting the seller's offer to sell, impliedly at least, made the latter his agent to set apart and appropriate to him the goods called for by the contract, and when the seller did this act he completed the sale and passed the title.

And New England Dressed Meat & Wool Co. v. Standard Worsted Co. 165 Mass. 328, 52 Am. St. Rep. 516, 43 N. E. 112, while denying the right of the seller of wool to be manufactured, to recover the purchase price therefor, where the purchaser breached his contract of purchase, on the ground that the seller had not, at the time of the bringing the action, segregated or apportioned to the buyer the quantity of wool called for by the contract, nevertheless points out that the parties to the contract contemplated that the seller was to manufacture the wool, and in connection with the work of manufacture, to separate it from the mass then in its possession, and determine its weight, so that it would appear to be the property called for by the contract, and that its price would be ascertained; and Benjamin on Sales is approvingly referred to and quoted to the point that "in a sale of a portion of a larger mass, the whole remaining in the possession of the vendor, with a right and power in him to make a separation, both upon principle and the weight of authority, no title passes until that is done, so as to enable the vendor to recover the price." And it is said that this doctrine is well established in Massachusetts.

And Bristol Mfg. Corp. v. Arkwright Mills, 213 Mass. 172, 100 N. E. 55, sustains the right of the seller of a quantity of cloth to be manufactured, to recover the purchase price thereof, where the buyer refuses to accept and pay for the goods. In this case, after a portion of the goods had been delivered, the buyer wrongfully canceled the contract on the untenable ground that the goods did not in quality comply with the requirements thereof. The right to recover the purchase price under these circumstances was held to depend on the 51 L.P.A. (N.S.) question whether there had been a separation and appropriation by the seller of the goods, so as to constitute a constructive delivery thereof. The court points out that the cloth was of a common grade, well known in the general market, and such as the buyer also manufactured, and it is said that it was not an unusual kind made upon special order. It is further pointed out that the manufacture was completed, and nothing remained in order to execute the contract on both sides, except for the buyer to take the goods and pay for them, and it is said that under these circumstances, as between the immediate parties, nothing was necessary in order to pass title to the buyer beyond setting apart the goods for him. "It might have been found that the seller was impliedly authorized to make such appropriation by the buyer. Title may pass although the goods remain in the actual possession of the vendor."

In Collins v. Delaporte, 115 Mass. 159, the rule is asserted that a party to an executory contract may stop its performance by an explicit order or repudiation thereof, and thereby subject himself only to such damages as will compensate the other party for being deprived of the benefits of the contract. The court, however, refused to commit itself upon the question whether the seller of lumber who receives notice from the purchaser, after the logs are partially sawed into lumber, that he will not receive the same, may nevertheless finish sawing the lumber, and, upon offering performance on his part, recover the purchase price.

It is held in this jurisdiction that an action may be maintained to recover the purchase price of shares of stock which the purchaser refused to accept upon their being tendered to him before suit was brought, the tender being renewed on the trial of the suit. Pearson v. Mason, 120 Mass. 53.

And in Thompson v. Alger, 12 Met. 428, it is held that the contract price of shares of stock is the proper measure of recovery, where, before the contract of purchase was repudiated, the seller caused the certificate to be transferred upon the books of the corporation to the purchaser.

And in Thorndike v. Locke, 98 Mass. 340, it is held that a purchaser of shares of stock, under a contract authorizing him to return them to the seller and receive back the purchase price, may maintain an action to recover the stipulated price, where he undertakes to exercise the option and tenders back the stock to the seller, and the latter refuses to accept it.

Wisconsin cases.

In Wisconsin the rule obtaining is to be gathered from several decisions on the subject, which, while apparently inconsistent, may nevertheless, in part at least, be reconciled. In Ganson v. Madigan, 13 Wis. 67, the court holds that before an action can be maintained for the purchase price of a machine, it must have been so designated for, or appropriated to, the purchaser, as to vest title in him, thus apparently recognizing the rule that the seller, by appropriating the article to the purchaser, thereby vesting the title in him, may entitle himself to recover the purchase price.

In Crawford v. Earl, 38 Wis. 312, it is held that where the seller of fruit trees tendered the same to the purchaser, and upon the latter refusing to accept them, left them for him at a convenient place, and notified him thereof, he had done all that the contract of sale required him to do, to vest the title in the purchaser, and hence was entitled to recover the purchase price.

And in Boyington v. Sweeney, 77 Wis. 55, 45 N. W. 938, in holding that the risk of certain property was on the purchaser after tender and a lapse of a reasonable time to remove the same, the doctrine was asserted that in an action upon an executory contract for the sale and delivery of personal property, the seller may recover the value of the goods contracted for, if he tenders a delivery thereof in accordance with the terms of the contract.

And in Pratt v. S. Freeman & Sons Mfg. Co. 115 Wis. 648, 92 N. W. 368, the general rule is stated that where a buyer neglects or refuses to perform an executory contract of sale, one of the remedies of the seller is to retain the property for the buyer, and sue for and recover the purchase price.

In Fountain City Drill Co. v. Peterson, 126 Wis. 512, 106 N. W. 17, involving the sale of a machine out of a large number of machines which were shipped by a common carrier, it is held that, since the seller performed an executory contract of sale of chattels by delivering the same at the place and in the manner specified in the contract, he is entitled to recover the stipulated price. The question was also raised as to what would have been the effect upon the seller's right in this regard, had the purchaser repudiated the contract before performance; but the court refused to pass upon it. Reference, however, is made to Woodman v. Blue Grass Land Co. 125 Wis. 489, 103 N. W. 236, 104 N. W. 920, which is not in point as to the facts, but in which the doctrine is asserted that unless a contract is one in which a court of equity will decree a specific performance, either party may terminate it pending its performance, subject only to the payment of the damages which the other party sustained thereby. The court said that the effect of such termination is to stop the performance at the point then reached, subject to payment of damages. In a rehearing opinion, the court also refers to the rule with regard to an anticipatory breach of an executory contract, and it is said that the other party may treat it as a breach, and if he does not do so, but continues to demand performance, he will be held to have kept the contract alive for the benefit of both parties.

W. 908, however, the doctrine is stated that it is an elementary principle that in case of a bargain and sale of goods not specific, before they are set aside for the purchaser, if he notifies the executory seller that he elects to and does cancel the contract, and will not receive the goods, he cannot be made liable for the purchase price as on a sale of goods, but only for damages for his breach of contract. This being upon the theory, often declared, that, ordinarily, any person has a right to breach his executory agreement and submit to damages therefor. This doctrine, however, is asserted in an action involving an executory contract for the sale of cloth to be manufactured, the purchaser to give shipping directions, where the goods were never tendered to the purchaser, owing to a disagreement between the parties with reference to time of payment, and they were sold by the seller as the goods of the purchaser, and he then undertook to recover the difference between the proceeds of this sale and the contract price.

And see Tufts v. Weinfeld, 88 Wis. 647, 60 N. W. 992, holding that where the purchaser of an article to be manufactured by the seller countermands the order before the seller has done anything toward the production of the article, the latter's legal right to perform the contract is terminated, and he is relegated to an action for damages sustained by reason of such breach.
